REFORM OF THE FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS

PART III

SUBPART C (COMPARATIVE LAWS)

TUESDAY, MARCH 21, 1972

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant, to notice, at 10 a.m. in room 2228, New Senate Office Building, Senator Roman Hruska (acting chairman) presiding.

Present: Senator Hruska.

Also present: G. Robert Blakey, chief counsel; Malcolm D. Hawk, minority counsel; Kenneth A. Lazarus, Robert H. Joost, and Elizabeth Bates, assistant counsels; and Mrs. Mable A. Downey, clerk.

Senator HRUSKA. This morning the subcommittee will focus its attention on the relation between the proposed code and foreign law. We are fortunate in having two distinguished scholars. In addition, we have a number of letters and several studies from the Library of Congress which will be inserted into todays record. Our first witness is Prof. Gerhard Mueller of New York University.

You have submitted some material to the committee, Professor. It is quite extended and will be included in the record, because it will lend itself much more as a matter of reference and study than it will for current comment.

(The material follows:)

MEMORANDUM: SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES, U.S. SENATE, COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Re: Response to questionnaire memorandum containing twenty questions for a Comparative Law evaluation of the proposed final draft of a new Federal criminal code. Title 18, United States Code.

Submitted by: Prof. G. O. W. Mueller, Director, Criminal Law Education and Research Center, NYU.

INTRODUCTION

The Criminal Law Education Research Center of New York University obtained a detailed questionnaire, composed of approximately 50 questions, pertaining to provisions of the Draft of the Federal Criminal Code. In the extremely limited time available, the Criminal Law Education Research Center has done its best to provide some answers to the very difficult questions posed. The CLEAR Center has been in consultation with the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Law at an earlier stage and at that time advised the Commissioners on a range of subjects, including mistake, regulatory, offenses, assault, crimes, consent, duress, necessity, immaturity, jurisdiction and some other provisions. At that time we tried to urge upon the Commission the need to make a major commitment toward the assembly of comparative law data and on the experience of other nations, so as to get the best possible input for the American Federal Code. In this respect we did not succeed, since contact with the Comparative Criminal Law Project of the Criminal Law Education and Research Center of New York University remained minimal and no further specific requests for comparative evaluations were received.

In this connection we would like to point out that all of the major continental penal codifications recently produced have operated with the comparative method. Particularly the codifiers of Japan, Germany and Sweden have undertaken considerable comparative research on solutions adopted by foreign legal systems.

There are special departments in several Ministries of Justice, concerned with matters of comparative criminal law. As for Germany, considerable federal funds are made available to maintain the Institute of Foreign and International Criminal Law at the University of Freiburg, Germany, as an adjunct of the government's reform effort, in criminal justice.

It would not be amiss to point out to the National Commission, that while we have done our best to provide it with some comparative data, the Commission ideally is entitled to more and better data. Consequently, we propose that the National Institute of Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice be urged or instructed to create a research branch competent in the area of comparative criminal law and criminology or, in the alternative, to sub-contract for such services with an Institute like the Comparative Criminal Law Project of the Criminal Law Education and Research Center. A funded and well staffed agency, which is constantly at the disposition of federal government agencies, is needed, so as to aid legislative reform efforts by means of reliable experience data from other countries.

Q.1. The National Commission, following the lead of the American Law Institute in its Model Penal Code (1962), has proposed what is primarily a code of substantive criminal law. The proposed Code is divided into the Part A, General Provisions; Part B, Specific Offenses; Part C, Sentencing. Is such a tripartite division followed in the foreign codes? How are foreign codes structured?

A. It is almost universal practice for nations of the civil law system to divide their penal codes into two parts: (1) the General Part, (2) the Special Part. The General Part deals with those provisions that have general applicability regardless of the nature of the crime; for example the temporal and territorial applicability, attempts and accessoryship, justifications and excuses, etc. In England in 1953, with the publication of Glanville William's work "Criminal Law: The General Part," the thinking now likewise goes in terms of dividing problems of substantive Criminal Law into a General Part and a Special Part. Note that all procedure are being dealt with in separate Codes of Criminal Procedure.

Only one Code of Europe has a tripartition in terms of General Part, Special Part and provision on sentencing and corrections. This is Europe's most recent penal code, the Royal Swedish Code of 1965. Consequently, the scheme of the Federal Draft Penal Code, envisaging a tripartition into General Provisions, Specific Offenses and Sentencing, is paralleled by Europe's most modern penal code. We are entirely in aggreement with the draft code's tri-partition.

Parenthetically, it is to be noted that some codes of Europe purport to have a partition into three or four parts. This, however, is purely the result of dividing the Special Part into several sub-parts. For example, the French Penal Code divides the Special Part into separate parts for felonies and misdemeanors.

Q.2. The proposed code contains 350 sections (Part A: 73; Part B: 238; Part C: 39), but the numbering system runs from Section 101 to Section 3601. Is it customary in foreign codes to leave so many blank numbers for future statures? What is the usual numbering system?

A. The Code's proposed 350 sections appear to be at a par with the standard number of provisions in foreign penal codes. For example, the French Penal Code has 477 sections. The Norwegian Penal Code has 436 sections. The German Penal Code has 370 sections. The relationships between General Part and Special Part, likewise, are quite comparable. In the proposed Code there are 73 sections in the General Part and 39 sections in the Corrections Part or a total of 112 sections, comparing with the General Part of the French Penal Code of 74 sections, the Norwegian Code of 82 sections and the German Penal Code of 87 sections. Of course, the number of sections alone does not give us a proper basis of comparison, since sections may be wordy or terse, may have sub-divisions or none, may cover little or may cover a lot. Prima facie, however, we have comparability.

In foreign penal codes, it is not customary to have blank numbers between sections. The majority of foreign jurists consider the penal code to have an almost immutable permanence. The very idea of "adding" anything to it once it is promulgated is quite antithetical. This is not to say that the whole corpus juris stands still, but rather that either new laws are added by means of subsections or sections marked "a" "b" "c", etc., or "bis", or that they are placed in special legislation outside the penal code. The question of immutability of the code, however, does not strike us as an overpowering factor. The fact is that penal codes are not immutable, that they all have a limited life expectancy, which in the modern and age probably is no more than half a century, and that during the first years after promulgation any penal code will have to undergo a considerable amount of interpretation. Most of that interpretation will be by adjudication, some of it may have to be by legislation. It is to be expected and cannot be avoided. Consequently, provisions may have to be made for a proper way of inserting amendments into the code. The code itself and its amendments are meant to serve a very modern society, which in the immediate, foreseeable future will be governed largely by computer programing. Consequently, a system for the numbering of penal code provisions ought to be adopted which is capable of the most rational system of computerization. Neither the European nor the American modes seem to be particularly suitable for that purpose. It would seem to appear that a modified version of the decimal system should be used, according to which each major chapter has a decimal number, the section thereunder has a sub-decimal number, and each particular provision under which has a sub-sub-decimal number, for the best possible computerization.

Of course, the number of sections in itself is not indicative of the actual coverage of a penal code. Conceptually, a code of less than one hundred sections (like the Swedish Code) can cover as much as a code of over four hundred sections like the German Penal Code. What counts is whether a code does, indeed, cover substantially all of the criminal law material of a given country. What counts also is in how many words the penal code is capable of expressing these conceptions. That last point I have explained in another connection, (infra).

Q.3. Combined with Q10 The proposed Code defines the various "intent" requirements or the mental elements necessary for criminal conduct in §302(1). The Code would establish four different kinds of culpability: intentionally, knowingly, recklessly and negligently. How do the foreign criminal codes regard and use the element of the defendant's state of mind? Is it used to determine guilt or innocence? Degree of guilt? Sentence? How do the kinds of culpability proposed in the draft code compare with foreign provisions.

A. In our view, this is the most crucial question of the entire penal code. We at once recognize the progressive approach of the Draft Penal Code, but also notice a fundamental inconsistency within the code itself, to be noted (infra).

1. The forms of culpability: The forms of "culpability" proposed by the penal code are not totally different from European forms of culpability. Of course, most European penal codes speak of only two "forms" of culpability: (1) intent (dolus), and (2) negligence (culpa). In European and other civil law countries, it is left to the judiciary to define the exact meaning of these terms, and particularly to find a place for what in American Law we call "recklessness." Thousands of dissertations have been written in all civil law countries about the forms of culpability and, in particular, about the placing of recklessness either within the form of intent or the form of negligence. No useful purpose would be served in even attempting to summarize them here. In passing, it might merely be noted that the commission of a crime "knowingly" is universally regarded as tantamount to the commission of the crime "intentionally". We suggest that no particularly useful purpose seems to be served by utilizing two terms in the draft code where one could do.

2. Significance of forms of culpability: We are now turning to the second paragraph of your question number three. There is a vast literature in continental countries on the topic of that question, the relevance of the differentiation between more and less intense attitudes toward the harm created, as measured by intention, recklessness or negligence, does play a significant role in a number of contexts in all continental countries:

(1) The basic requirement in most penal codes of the world is that of §302(2) namely, that intentional or willful commission of the harm is necessary and that the intent must, indeed, cover every element of the crime. Consequently, where there is no such intent or willfulness, the defendant will not be held liable for the commission of the harm. In this sense then, the absence of intention amounts to impunity. This is expressed by the Latin American Model Penal Code, Article 24, which pretty well codifies the law of most Latin American countries.

(2) In all foreign penal codes, the form of mens rea is used to determine the degree of guilt. Thus, universally the intentional production of the harm is threatened with more severe punishments than the negligent production of the harm. Nota bene, that recklessness, as previously stated, is not a commonly used form of mens rea in continental countries. A high degree of risk-taking with respect to the production of the harm, and a prospective approval of the harm on the part of the actor, should the harm follow his reckless conduct, is regarded as tantamount to an intention in virtually all civil law countries (this is the so-called dolus eventualis).

(3) The state of the defendant's mind is also taken into account for the purposes of sentencing. The intensity of the defendant's desire to produce the harm is regarded as aggravating or mitigating circumstance, particularly in crimes where the defendant's emotions have played a significant role, for example, in crimes of passion. Many foreign codes, especially those Latin American ones having their origins in the Spanish codes of the last century, deal separately with mitigating and aggravating circumstances. In effect this amounts to saying that a mere intent, recklessness or negligence alone is never quite adequate to measure the crime or to assess the perpetrator. What is needed is an additional evaluation of motivations. While American law supposedly refuses to consider the defendant's motives and motivations at sentencing motives and motivations do, in fact, play a significant role as well.

3. Awareness of wrongdoing—the essence of culpability: The "forms" of "culpability" are quite sensible, and in particular, the requirements of §302(2), that willfulness is required unless some lesser form of culpability is specified, is quite in accord with the best thinking all around the world. What is disturbing about the requirement of culpability is the provision of §302(5) to the effect that, unless otherwise provided, "knowledge or belief that conduct is an offense is not an element of the conduct constituting the offense." It has been fundamental throughout this history of Anglo-American Criminal Law, as well as Continental Criminal Law, that criminal liability is imposed on persons who commit a wrongful act knowing that they are doing something wrongful, in other words, acting with "an awareness of wrongfulness."

The very idea of exculpation based on the existence of mental illness rests on freedom from liability of those who could not harbor an awareness of wrongdoing. Likewise, when it comes to the exculpation of persons laboring under a mistake of fact, only those are exculpated who by reason of the mistake had no awareness of wrongdoing. Consequently, the provision of subsection (5) of §302 is inconsistent with the basic commitment of Anglo-American as well as Continental Law, namely to punish only guilty parties.

Moreover, §302(5) is also inconsistent with the provision of §304 to the effect that "a person does not commit an offense if, when he engages in conduct, he is ignorant or mistaken about a matter of fact or law and the ignorance or mistake negates the kind of culpability required for commission of the offense." Section 304 is a superb provision, in line with the most established thinking on the European continent, to the effect that anybody who labors under such a mistake that he does not recognize wrongfulness of his act, whether due to an error of fact or law, should not be held guilty. When a person labors under a mistake of fact or law with respect to his right to commit a homicidal act, he is not intending to commit the wrong of a criminal homicide, even though he may be intending to cause the death of a human being.

The matter can be easily remedied by striking subsection (5) of §302 of the Draft Code. This would be totally in accord with established Anglo-American Criminal Law. When the rule was framed that ignorance of law is no excuse, the common law of crimes was restricted to those offenses which were universally known to be wrong. Consequently, nobody could be heard to maintain that he was unaware of the law outlawing the conduct in question. Consequently, it was true at common law that every intentional or knowing commission of an offense included within it the idea that the perpetrator was aware of the wrongfulness of his action. Liability was excluded when the awareness of the wrongfulness of action was wiped out either by mistake of fact or by mental illness, or some other such cause.

As a matter of comparative law, it is interesting to note that the Supreme Court of the German Federal Republic in a fundamental decision of March 18, 1952 ruled that every case of criminal liability requires the awareness of wrongdoing. Criminal liability cannot be imposed unless the defendant was aware that he was doing something wrong, or, in the case of a crime committed by negligence, that the defendant was under an obligation to investigate the potential wrongfulness of his action.

4. Exculpation in case of lacking awareness of wrongdoing: In the preceding sub-section I have already moved into the question of exculpation due to lacking awareness of wrongdoing. This question is inextricably interwoven with criminal intent and negligence. Theoretically, most foreign penal codes subscribe to the same theory which we supposedly have in America, to the effect that ignorance of of criminal law is no excuse. But nearly all legal systems provide a much more pragmatic answer to the question of mistake or ignorance of law. While in nearly all systems, including ours, mistake of private law has always been regarded as a defense, and while, indeed, there are decisions in virtually all countries, including ours, that absolutely invincible ignorance of the law serves as a defense, there is a growing realization all over the world that in this modern day and age, with its proliferation of regulatory statutes, it is no longer possible to administer a system of criminal justice justly, which does not allow for excusable and explainable ignorance of certain regulatory penal laws. Consequently, there is a growing recognition that where the awareness of wrongdoing is dependent on knowledge of a given prohibition, and there is error or ignorance in this regard, the criminal intent of the actor is missing. Among others, this is now recognized in the Latin American Model Penal Code, Article 27, and in the new version of the German Penal Code, Section 17, which reads as follows:

> If the perpetrator while committing the act lacks the awareness that he is doing something wrong, he acts without guilt if the error is not attributable to his own fault. If the perpetrator could have avoided the error, his punishment may, nevertheless, be reduced in accordance with §49(1).

While it is not customary in foreign penal codes to combine mistakes of fact and law in one section, we think that §304 in combining error or mistake about a matter of fact or law is well-drafted and understandable. Its succinctness is particularly praiseworthy. In our view, however, §302(9) falls out of the pattern and is totally inconsistent with the contents of §304.

5. Mistaken belief in the existence of exculpating circumstances: Similarly, §303 is quite inconsistent with the general principle embodied in the penal codes of the entire world—including our own—that where there is no awareness of wrongdoing, criminal punishment would be misplaced. As being in fundamental conflict with §304, §303 should be stricken. The matter of mistake is fully covered by §304.

As regards the shifted burden of proof of §303, all codes of the world, except ours, treat mistake of fact pertaining to the existence of a defense in the same manner in which other mistakes of fact are treated. In view of the fact that Anglo-American law does have the institution of affirmative defenses, a concept which does not exist in civil law countries, it may be justifiable to put the burden of proof on the defendant when he claims that he erroneously assumed the existence of facts which permitted him to exercise one of the defensive measures authorized by law. But it is inconsistent even with American theory of law to state flatly that mistaken belief in the existence of an affirmative defense it not a defense unless otherwise expressly provided. Section 303, therefore, is totally inconsistent with §304 and ought to be revised.

6. Mistaken law vs. mistake of law: Moving on to §610, which is called "Mistake of Law", we have difficulty reconciling §610 with §304. It occurs to us that 304 says everything there is to be said about mistake of law. Section 610 is not needed, since 304 covers all situations but one mentioned in §610. And that one is §610(d), which excuses an illegal act committed in reliance on an official interpretation of the law by a public servant or body charged by law with responsibility for the interpretation, administration or enforcement of the law defining the crime. Under those circumstances, it is not the defendant at all who acts under a mistake of law, but rather it is the public servant or body interpreting the law that is mistaken. Under those circumstances, we have the classical case of a mistaken, but nevertheless, positive law. According to proper theory even in the United States (espoused by Jerome Hall and others) it is then the law which is wrong but not the actor. Consequently §610 is not needed for that particular point either.

7. "Marginal transgression of limit of justificiation": As regards "marginal transgression of limit of justification", the language used is extremely difficult to comprehend. We would propose a solution like that contained in §53(3) of the current German Penal Code "excessive self-defense or defense of another is not punishable if the perpetrator has exceeded the limits of defense by reason of consternation, fear or fright." These words are clear and stick to the mind and memory of the persons addressed, and allow reasonable interpretation of a myriad of conceivable fact situations that may come before judges.

8. Concluding remarks on mens area provisions: The specific drafting of the mistake provisions, except for §304, is not particularly skillful and could certainly be improved. To some extent it leaves holes. For example, under §609 a person who acts in a mistaken belief that he engages in justifiable conduct may nevertheless be found guilty for the negligent or reckless commission of the crime he has committed if his mistake was due to negligence or recklessness. But §609 is silent with respect to the situation where the negligent or reckless commission of the crime is not provided for. What is to be the rule under those circumstances? Should there be a mitigation of punishment? Should the mistake be immaterial? Either of those two solutions have been adopted in different states.

The drafting of the various provisions dealing with mens rea aspects shows differential talents on the part of the various draftsmen, lack of coordination, and inadequate agreement on fundamental premises. All relevant provisions should be resubmitted to the drafting committee with the provisio to redraft all provisions, consistent with the basic premise—superbly stated—of §304, and the basic form requirements of §304, and the basic form requirements of §302 (excepting sub(5) which is inconsistent).

Q.4. The proposed Federal Criminal Code includes a section (§ 305) which defines the causation requirement of casual connection which must be proved between the defendant's conduct and the result. How is causation handled by foreign codes?

A. While there are a few foreign codes which have a specific codified causation formula, e.g., Article 40 of the Italian Penal Code, it is rare to put a causation formula into the code. Causation is largely left to the judiciary for determination. There are probably as many causation formulas in existence in the world as there are scholars who have thought about the problem. It may be doubted whether a code will succeed in imposing a formula. The Federal Draft Criminal Code in §305 has adopted the "conditional" theory of causation. The formula of the Model Penal Code, §2.05, likewise rests on that theory and has been criticized as too stringent. I, myself, would advocate any one of a number of broader formulas, as I have explained on the basis of a large-scale comparison of foreign law in my essay "Causing Criminal Harm," of which I am including a copy for the Committee's use.

If the causation formula of §305 is to be retained, I would urgently propose that a subsection (3) be added thereto, namely the provision which is now contained in §302(3)(b) to the effect that "if conduct is an offense if it causes a particular result, the required kind of culpability is required with respect to the result." That provision pertains more to causation than it does to culpability, although, of course, the two hang intimately together. In general, however, it is fair to say that provisions on causation will be rarely used, have limited practical value in making sure that causation requirements have as their purpose, after all, the proof of a connection between the mind of the perpetrator and the result he has produced.

Q.5. The Draft proposes that mental disease or defect at the time of the criminal conduct be a defense and defines that defense in proposed §503. Is there any insanity defense to criminal charges under foreign codes? How do the foreign provisions compare with that of the Draft Code? Do any foreign codes provide that the insane defendant may be found guilty, but that upon conviction he must be accorded medical rather than penological treatment? How do they handle the procedural aspects of the insanity defense; is there provision whereby the Judge selects a psychiatrist to examine the defendant or do both the government and the defense lawyers bring in their own medical witnesses? Is there provision whereby the defendant found not guilty by reason of insanity is automatically committed to a mental institution for observation and treatment?

A. Mental disease or defect is a "defense" in all penal codes of the world. It must be explained immediately, however, that the idea of a defense—in the nature of imposing a burden of proof—does not exist in any of the continental countries. When the suspicion of mental illness exists, or the potential existence of mental illness on the part of any defendant has been raised by anybody, it becomes the obligation of the judge presiding (or the arraigning magistrate) to take the necessary steps for the investigation of that fact question, which may or may not include preliminary hospitalization for purposes of tests. There is no burden of proof on the part of anybody to establish mental illness.

When it comes to the test itself, §503 is the formula used by the German Imperial Penal Code of 1871, which, in turn, was copied from the Prussian Penal Code of 1851, where, in fact, this particular test originated. It was the first "functional" test in European countries. All other tests, primarily those based on the French Penal Code of 1809, simply referred to the existence of "madness" as excluding liability.

It may be doubted whether in 1972 the defense of 1851 still is entitled to the same prominence, although it should be added immediately that in most countries whose penal codes are not based on that of France, the test of §503 is still substantially in effect, for example, in the Swiss Penal Code, and most prominently in the German Penal Code §51.1. It should be noted immediately that as §503 and its Europan counterparts are phrased, it exculpates only for that kind of a mental illness which deprives the defendant of his capacity to form the requisite mens rea ("substantial capacity to appreciate the criminality of his conduct, or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law"). Where the mental illness is of a slightly different kind and renders a person incapable to engaging in voluntary conduct, then under §301 of the Draft Penal Code a different rule of evidence would seem to apply, and the defendant merely has to go forward with evidence indicating that his mental illness deprives him of the capacity to engage in voluntary conduct. Query, was that intended? Would it not be preferable to have the same evidentiary requirement regardless of whether the mental illness deprived the defendant of the voluntariness of his conduct or of his mens rea? If it were to be regarded as desirable to have the same evidentiary test applicable regardless of the impact of the mental illness, then I would urgently propose to heed the advice of now Chief Justice Warren Burger, given in Campbell v. United States (307 F. 2d 597, 1962):

> "The precise words to be used . . . are not too important so long as the charge conveys an explanation of the product test in terms that make clear that it is directed to exculpating: (a) those who do not understand what they are doing, (b) those who do not understand the unlawfulness of what they are doing, and (c) those who cannot control their conduct even when they know it to be unlawful."
> The test adopted in the Missouri Revised Statutes, Supp. 1963, §552.030.1 would seem to meet this precise requirement:

> "A person is not responsible for criminal conduct if at the time of such conduct as a result of mental disease or defect, he did not know or appreciate the nature, quality or wrongfulness of his conduct, or was incapable of conforming his conduct to the requirements of the law."

This test is, in fact, an extreme modernization of the McNaughton test with which it shares the logic of exculpating equally all those incapable of fulfilling the necessary actus reus requirements ("knowing or appreciating the nature and quality of the act") as well as those incapable of fulfilling the necessary mens rea requirements ("knowing or appreciating the wrongfulness of the conduct"). It has the additional advantage of spelling out what was only vaguely implicit in the old McNaughton test, namely, that persons who act under a psychopathological compulsion so that they are incapable of fulfilling the necessary intent requirement of the act ("conforming his conduct to the requirements of law") are likewise exculpated.

In our search of European and Latin American penal codes, we have found no formula which is as comprehensive, as logical and as succinct as the Missouri formula.

But, the matter does not end there, since we feel obliged to call attention to the fact that the more modern European penal codes frequently have made the same discoveries that have been made in a number of states recently, namely, that mental and emotional disease, disorder or defect does not divide mankind into two parts, the sane and the insane, but rather that there is a large group of persons situated somewhere in the middle, who act under what might be called diminished responsibility. Thus, the Swiss and German penal codes have the following provision (§51.2 of the German Penal Code):

> "If the ability to appreciate the unlawfulness of the deed or to act in accordance with such appreciation was substantially impaired at the time of commission, for one of these reasons, the punishment may be lowered . . ."

Procedurally what happens is that when a person is found to have committed the act with diminished capacity, he may be sentenced to a very much mitigated term of confinement, or he may be institutionalized for the purpose of treatment, or both may be done in succession, although frequently there simply is a confinement in an institution for treatment, after which the defendant is discharged if he is no longer a danger to himself or others. We would strongly urge that the Federal Penal Code follow the trend of modern legislation by recognizing the existence of persons who act with diminished responsibility, by insertion of a provision which will lower the blame, lower the punishment, and substitute more appropriate treatment for persons acting with such diminished responsibility.

Where, of course, a defendant is found completely exculpated by reason of mental illness, so-called measures of "safety and rehabilitation" may be imposed. These measures, however, do not automatically follow an acquittal by reason of "insanity". (Technically, there is such a thing as an "acquittal" in European countries). Institutionalization, following an "acquittal," can be had only if the judge, upon trial, finds that the public safety requires institutionalization in an institution for cure or care. Occasionally a code will also provide that institutionalization may not be ordered where the acquittal by reason of mental illness was of a petty misdemeanor charge (see §42(b) German Penal Code; for the most advanced provisions, see Article 99-110 of the Polish Penal Code of 1969).

The remaining questions under point 5 are of a procedural nature and are in foreign penal codes treated almost entirely in the codes of criminal procedure. In summary, it may be said that since, as previously explained, it is the obligation of the judge to determine whether a defense of insanity will lie, it is ordinarily the judge who will appoint one or several experts who will make the defendant's examination. Almost universally a defendant has a right to presence of his own psychiatrist. Some codes have complicated structures for the obtaining of an arbiter's psychiatric opinion, if there is disagreement among the court-appointed and private psychiatrists. A so-called battle of the experts in court is almost entirely unheard of, and it may be surmised that the end of the battle of experts may have arrived even in the United States, if capital punishment is abolished, for it was really only the existence of the potential use of capital punishment which made the issue of "insanity" such a contested one at trial. Moreover, the recognition that all persons placed in a correctional institution require "treatment" no longer makes it all that important whether the defendant is sent to a correctional institution for treatment or to a treatment institution. This, of course, presupposes that treatment itself will become a reality.

Q.6. Although the defendant who "lacks substantial capacity to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law" because of mental illness has a defense under §503, the defendant who is similarly situated because of alcohol, or drug intoxication has no defense under §502 (except in limited situations). How do foreign codes handle the problem of the defendant who is intoxicated? Is he given a defense to criminal liability? Is he handled differently upon sentencing? (i.e., sent to a hospital rather than a prison?) If foreign law is similar to American, how do theorists defend different treatment, for example, for the alcoholic and the mentally-ill person?

A. Intoxication, whether due to alcohol or drugs, is relevant in most but not all foreign penal codes. The Swedish Penal Code of 1962 proclaims in Chapter One, section 2.2 that "if the act has been committed during self-induced intoxication, or if the actor had otherwise himself brought about the temporary loss of the use of his senses, this shall not cause the act to be considered non-criminal." Obviously, the matter of intoxication may, nevertheless, be taken into account when it comes to sentencing. A more frequent solution, however, is that intoxication which in fact leads to a removal of the capacity to form the requisite intent does have an exculpatory effect. But, a defendant who forms his intention to commit the crime before getting intoxicated and who subsequently acts out the intent previously formed, will not be exculpated.

Whenever self-induced intoxication does lead to an exculpation for the crime that the defendant committed while in the state of intoxication, there may, nevertheless, be criminal liability imposed on some other theory. A typical example is §330 (a) of the German Penal Code which provides:

> (1) Anybody who by indulgence in intoxicating liquers or other intoxicants intentionally or negligently places himself in a state of irresponsibility (§51 (para. 1) shall be punished by imprisonment or a fine, if in the state he commits a punishable act.
> (2) This punishment, however, may not exceed in kind or degree the punishment imposable for the intentional commission of the punishable act.

In effect, a crime of getting one's self intoxicated has been created. The punishability of this crime, however, depends on the commission of what would be a crime had the defendant been sober at the time of action, with the limitation that the punishment may not exceed in kind or degree the punishment the defendant would have received if he had been sober, and subject to the further limitation that the punishment cannot exceed five years, since that is the maximum term of "imprisonment".

We find this solution unduly complex and sophisticated, albeit logical. Basically, we find the approach of §502 adequate, but we would have stated the formula rather positively, to the effect that, in accordance with all our American case law experience, self-induced intoxication is a defense if in fact it deprives a defendant of the capacity to form any of the mental requirements of the crime, and provided that the defendant did not place himself into the intoxicated condition for purposes of committing the crime subsequently. By the same token, it has always been the rule of American common law that involuntary intoxication—which is likely to be more and more frequent with the use of modern drugs—may serve as a complete defense if, once again, it deprives the defendant of the requisite mental elements.

We find the wording of §502 unduly complex, restricting and confining and a rather poor example of progressive draftsmanship. Section 502 is more like a portable law library than the succinct kind of principle statement which penal codes ought to contain in order to be understood by the public which is to be governed thereby.

In all countries of the world with modern penal codes, there is a provision that persons who have committed their crime in a state of intoxication and who are chronic alcoholics, may be detained in an institution for cure or care for a specified period (see §42(c), German Penal Code), but the foreign institutions have been just as unsuccessful as our own, since the normal "drying out" process is not adequate to go to the root problems of alcoholism.

A word may be due on the chronic alcoholic. A chronic alcoholic, incapable of conforming his conduct to the requirement of law, in most continental countries would be regarded as a status offender, who can only be committed to an institution for chronic alcoholics, but not to a correctional facility. In this case the Supreme Court decision in Powell v. Texas is contrary to European law.

Q.7. The Draft Code contains a rather elaborate and detailed group of sections on self-defense and use of force, etc. (§603—Self-Defense; §604—Defense of Others; §605—Use of Force by Persons with Parental, Custodial or Similar Responsibilities; §606—Use of Force in Defense of Premises and Property; §607—Limits on the Use of Force; Excessive Force; Deadly Force.) How do these detailed rules compare with the equivalent provisions in foreign codes? Do the foreign codes enunciate specific rules or set general standards?

A. We shall start with the two specific questions at the end of Question 7. It is crystal-clear that the detailed rules of the Draft Code compare very badly with the provisions contained in comparable foreign codes. Foreign codes enunciated general standards of law which are meant to be consonant with the prevailing standards of the community, or, indeed, as they are commonplace among most civilized societies today. The draftsmen of the Federal Draft Code, however, have used enormously detailed and elaborate provisions in an effort to provide for every conceivable contingency without, however, coming anywhere near to a coverage of the myriad of variations that may arise in self-defensive or justifiable human behavior. It may be feared that such a fruitless effort to say it all will lead to needless interpretation problems, without leaving anybody with a popular guideline. This code rambles on for page after page in its effort to cover all the accumulated case law that may be relevant to the issue of the various justifications and excuses. It ultimately succeeds only by adding to specific enumerations the usual clause "or otherwise", thereby ultimately admitting the impossibility of listing all possibly foreseeable cases. The consequence of such a casuistic approach, which endeavors to list virtually everything, by reason of its enormous length and elaborate content coverage, escapes the comprehension of all persons who ought to be guided thereby, particularly police officers, custodians and persons in distress generally. One might ask to whom is such a code addressed? Surely in an emergency situation nobody can remember thousands of words with sub-clauses and preambles. The best that can be hoped for is a succinct statement which corresponds to the prevailing standards of the community. The Code, in other words, ought to be addressed to, and ought to be expressive of the feelings of, the populace which is meant to be governed by it. A code should not be addressed to Supreme Court justices, since they have a library in which to find the details of criminal law. This is where the Draft Code goes wrong. On the basis of the European experience, the casuistic approach adopted by the Draft Code, is Supreme Court law, but not people's law. The most unhappy example of this casuistic approach is in Chapter Six, Defenses Involving Justification and Excuse.

Comparative Law offers us a contrasting example. The entire problem range of justifications, self-defense and defense of others is covered in two relatively brief sections of the Norwegian Code. One of these two sections, §48, covers self-defense as well as use of force in law enforcement. It fully covers all points which the Draft Federal Criminal Code seeks to cover. It reads as follows:

> Nobody may be punished for an act committed in self-defense.
> Self-defense exists when an otherwise punishable act is committed for the prevention of, or in defense against, an unlawful attack, as long as the act does not exceed what is necessary; moreover, in relation to the attack, the guilt of the assailant, and the legal values attacked, it must not be considered absolutely improper to inflict so great an evil as intended by the act of self defense.
> The above rule concerning the prevention of unlawful attack applies also to acts performed for the purpose of lawful arrest or for the prevention of a prisoner's escape from prison or custody.
> Anybody who has exceeded the limits of self-defense is nevertheless not to be punished if the excess is due solely to emotional upset or derangement produced by the attack.

This section adequately describes the feelings of the people of Norway with respect to the amount of force that can be used in that society for the purpose of self-defense or for law enforcement purposes. It adequately codifies the values with respect to excessive self-defense due to emotional upset or stress produced by the attack. It codifies a limit in terms of values threatened and values taken. The provision of §48 can be remembered by a grade school kid. Surely, the same is not true of §§601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607 and 608, all of which are at best appellate interpretation guides. In particular, the detailed provisions of §607 on the limits of the use of force are hopelessly complicated and will lead to fruitless appeals, which ultimately will have little if anything to do with the real issues that ought to be covered at trial; namely, whether the defendant committed the act with the requisite mens rea or not, whether the defendant committed a justifiable act or not. This statment amounts to the following: It is fundamental in both common law and American law that criminal liability depends on (1) the fulfilling of the definitional elements of the crime (which includes the conduct called for under the definition), (2) the requisite mens rea, (3) the absence of any justifying or excusing circumstance, which would exempt the particular conduct in question from the coverage of the penal code, even though, prima facie, the elements of the crime have been fulfilled. At stake here is the last point, the absence of any justifying or excusing circumstance. It is the experience of continental criminal law codification efforts, that it is humanly impossible to envisage and to describe in detail all of those excusing and justifying circumstances, and that the best that can be done is to list those most frequently recurring; namely, self-defense, defense of others, use of force in law enforcement, necessity, duress and perhaps very few others. Would it ever be possible to list the many types of consent and customs that could be used as justifications for what otherwise would be crime; for example, the custom of subjecting one's self voluntarily to being pushed and shoved in crowded means of public transportation? Nor is it customary to mention the exercise of parental rights or obligations, or the rights and duties of physicians and nurses. Provisions on justification and excuse must be (1) succinct enough to be remembered and understood, (2) popular so as to correspond to the feelings of the community, and (3) above all, be totally consistent with the fundamental purpose of criminal law, which is the imposition of sanctions on persons who intentionally violate the penal law.

We very much fear that by going into extreme and excessive detail, the provisions on justification and excuse do not measure up to these European standards and rank at a level which continental codification had reached in the middle of the 18th Century. That is not to day that the contents of these sections are necessarily wrong. We believe that the draftsmen probably tried honestly to provide for the same range of excuses and justifications that have been more successfully provided for under foreign penal codes.

Q.8. Near the end of the Code proposal, in §3002, the system of classification of offenses is set forth. There are six categories: Class A, Class B and Class C Felonies, Class A and Class B Misdemeanors and Infractions. This is a system of classification for purposes of sentencing. How and for what purposes do foreign codes classify offenses.

A. The classification system of §3002 has no direct counterpart in foreign criminal law. The system of classifying crimes as felonies and misdemeanors is peculiar to the common law, and was abandoned in England in 1968. The purpose of this classification system was procedural and additionally was meant to convey different opprobria which, in turn, were meant to be expressed by different penal sanctions, formerly capital and non-capital. Where capital punishment no longer exists, the differential opprobrium has also largely disappeared. In the German Federal Republic, it was realized a few years ago that it made little difference whether a prisoner was found guilty of a misdemeanor and sentenced to a jail term, or guilty of a felony and sentenced to a penitentiary term, because, for all practical purposes, the standards in the two classes of penal institutions were identical. Consequently, Germany has abolished the differentiation between the two different types of correctional facilities, and as taken the next logical step of reducing the tripartition of crimes to a bi-partition (new §12).

That is not to say, however, that some good may not come from a classification system. The effort of the draftsmen in §3002 is, of course, to provide a convenient means of invoking a different set of sanctions, depending on the type of crime committed. In a bureaucratic sort of way, the draftsmen succeed in this respect. The Code provisions become shorter if it is no longer necessary to list all of the sentencing alternatives at the end of each prohibitory section. On the other hand, it may be surmised that the prohibition may lose something of its intended efficacy if it is no longer clear what the sentencing range is, unless, of course, a legislator were to succeed in educating the general public about the exact meaning of the dire consequences that follow from the commission of a crime classified as a Class A, B or C Felony or Class A or B Misdemeanor.

The efficacy of this kind of "advertisement of the sanction" is reduced by the fact that it takes considerable searching in the Code itself to find the exact sentencing alternatives. From the prohibitory section in question, one will have to go to §3002 in order to find the meaning of the designation. The sentencing ranges and alternatives are then to be found distributed over two chapters. Unhappily, these chapters do not list the sentencing ranges and alternatives by the designation of the crime (i.e., whether a Class A, B or C Felony or Class A or B Misdemeanor), but rather in terms of types of sentences. Consequently, in order to ascertain the sentencing alternatives for any given class of crime, one will have to search the text of two chapters. In our view, this method is far too cumbersome, and violates what would be a precept of continental criminal law, that the person addressed by the prohibition be clearly informed of the consequences of the violation. We realize that the Federal Draft here follows the Model Penal Code. That, however, simply means that the Model Penal Code suffered from the same weakness. We would urge the draftsmen to provide a simpler system for explaining to potential law violators and those who have to deal with them, a clear-cut reference to sanctions and sentencing alternatives and ranges.

We have mentioned that there is no counterpart in continental legislation for the system adopted by the draftsmen. Almost universally, foreign penal codes list the basic sanctions at the end of each prohibitory section. There are some exceptions. Thus, for example, in a given code the sentence may simply be referred to as "imprisonment or probation." This, then, would require a cross-reference to the General Part, in which it is explained that imprisonment is always of a limited period of time and may never exceed a given number of years. Basically, however, continental criminal code sections advertise the sentencing range and alternatives.

European codes, for the most part, still classify crimes in a tripartition system, first introduced by the French Penal Code, into felonies, misdemeanors and violations, or felonies, gross misdemeanors and petty misdemeanors. To some extent this tri-partition corresponds to a triple level of jurisdictions. Felony courts are an upper court of primary jurisdiction, gross misdemeanors are within the jurisdiction of a medium court of primary jurisdiction and petty misdemeanors are within the jurisdiction of a county court or a minor court of jurisdiction.

Q.9. A. How do foreign code provisions on sentencing of convicted defendants compare with the sections in Part C of the proposed Federal Code?

B. Do foreign code sections on suspension of sentences provide for suspension of imposition of sentence and/or suspension of execution of sentence?

C. Do the foreign codes provide for a sentence of probation or is probation a form of suspension of sentence?

D. Is a person so released under supervision by probation officers, police officers or no one?

E. Do the foreign codes provide for indeterminate or determinate sentences of imprisonment?

F. Are there special extended term prison-sentence provisions for dangerous special offenders similar to §3207?

G. How do the authorized prison sentences for a representative group of crimes compare with the authorized prison sentences for the same offenses under foreign codes?

H. Are there mandatory minimum prison sentences under the foreign codes?

I. If foreign nations employ systems of release on parole, how do they compare with the provisions in Chapter 34 of the Draft?

J. Are prisoners released on parole by an administrative agency such as the United States parole board or by the Court?

K. Does foreign law have any equivalent to proposed §3007 under which an organization convicted of an offense may be required to give notice or appropriate publicity to the conviction?

L. Is giving publicity to a conviction (a different colored license plate for persons convicted of drunken driving, for example) used as a sanction or sentence under foreign codes?

M. Do the foregn codes have any equivalent to proposed §3003 (Persistent Misdemeanant)?

N. Do foreign codes require Judges to give reasons in writing for sentences imposed?

O. Are sentences subject to review on appeal by a higher court? If so, may the appellate court raise as well as lower the sentence?

P. May the government appeal a sentence or only the defendant?

Q. What standards do the Codes require for sentencing review?

R. If appellate review of sentences is not authorized under foreign penal or criminal procedure codes, how is uniformity of sentencing amongst the judges secured?

S. How does §3204 (Concurrent and Consecutive Terms of Imprisonment) compare with foreign code provisions on multiple offenses? Some European codes provide for a joint sentence rather than concurrent or consecutive sentences. How are terms computed under joint sentencing provisions? Under a "joint sentence," What happens if one but not all of the convictions is reversed on appeal?

T. Regarding the imposition of fines, do any foreign codes have provisions similar to §3301(2)?

U. In the United States many imposed fines are never collected and, therefore, of limited value either as a punishment or deterrent to others; how do foreign codes provide for collection of fines?

V. What is the "day fine" system and how are provisions regarding it formulated?

W. Is the day fine a fixed amount depending upon the gravity of the offense of which the defendant is convicted or is the amount fixed based upon the ability of the defendant to pay?

A. Since Question 9 really is composed of 23 sub-questions, we have identified these in terms of the alphabet from A to W.

An introductory comment is in order. Generally, our sentencing ranges and experiences in the United States are more advanced than European and Latin American methods. This is due primarily to the greater willingness of Americans to experiment in the area of criminology and corrections. Our superiority in this field, indeed, dates back to the middle of the 19th Century and is universally acknowledged. At the same time, some European systems, for example, the Scandinavian and Dutch and German systems, have caught up with our standards, have frequently surpassed them, and, above all, have been more precisely and succinctly dealt with in codes. It should be remembred that the provisions on sentencing and corrections must fulfill two purposes: (1) address themselves properly to the person who is about to engage in an unlawful act, and (2) be a proper guide to those who have to deal with those who did not respond. We fear that the sections on sentencing and corrections are too verbose and involved to be fully effective, at least as to (1).

Q.9.A. How do foreign code provisions on sentencing of convicted defendants compare with the sections in Part C of the proposed Federal Code?

A. It is only fair to say that this part of the proposed Federal Code is much more involved than what is found in most foreign codes, and it is less systematic in the sense that it seeks to incorporate a large number of disparate ideas that are distributed in various ways in European codes:

(1) In foreign penal codes, the basic sentencing alternatives and ranges are usually covered: (a) generally in the General Part, (b) specifically as an addition to each one of the prohibitory sections.

(2) Administrative provisions with respect to the imposition and execution of sentences are found: (a) in codes of criminal procedure, (b) in special correctional codes, which are addressed solely to administrators. This has the advantage of providing enough detail for administrators in a code addressed primarily to them, and thus leaving basic sanction statements succinct and popular, namely, in the body of the penal codes themselves.

Q.9.B. Do foreign code sections on suspension of sentences provide for suspension of imposition of sentence and/or suspension of execution of sentence?

A. Just as in the United States, European and Latin American penal codes may provide both for the suspension of the imposition of the sentence, or suspension of the execution of the sentence. Thus, France and the German Federal Republic have both systems, although, perhaps, a nose-count might reveal that the suspension of the execution of the sentence is the preferred method in continental countries. This system makes the sentence a matter of record, and its execution can be subsequently called for under certain conditions. It is a kind of sword of Damocles. Rules relating to suspension are often very limited. In the case of most Latin American codes, only a sentence of up to six months of imprisonment can be suspended. Article 74 of the Latin American Model Penal Code says a suspended sentence of up to two years imprisonment may be imposed. It is the legislative intent that suspension be coupled with continued supervision by the court and the measure is essentially a correctional one thought to be non-punitive.

Q9.C. Do the foreign codes provide for a sentence of probation or is probation a form of suspension of sentence?

A. The institution of probation as it is known in the United States has only found reluctant entrance into European penal systems, unjustifiably so. However, regardless of what the suspended sentence is called, what counts is the type of condition under which the sentence is suspended and the extent to which the defendant is given aid making it on his own on the outside. Probation has been generally accepted in the Scandinavian countries (e.g., Swedish P.C. Ch. 28). Further comments follow below.

Q.9.D. Is a person so released under supervision by probation officers, police officers or no one?

A. In some European penal codes, probation is known only for juveniles or offenders sentenced for minor offenses. It should be borne in mind that many countries have a separate code relating to the execution of sentences and provisions are to be found therein for the supervision of parolees and persons on suspended or partly served sentences. The service set-up for this purpose usually is part of the correctional services and is roughly correspondent to the probation services in Anglo-American countries. It will, of course, be noted that there are even vast organizational and functional differences between the probation services in England and Wales and that to be found in most state jurisdictions of the United States. By and large it may be said that under foreign codes release is had into the charge of an officer of the court. In France, the police supervise the execution of the sentence of "probation."

Q.9.E. Do the foreign codes provide for indeterminate or determinate sentences of imprisonment?

A. Penal codes in Europe and Latin America have been extremely reluctant to introduce the indeterminate sentence, the determinate sentence being by far preferred. Scandinavia, which earlier adopted the system of indeterminate sentences, now makes a trend away from indeterminate sentences, in favor of newer types of control and rehabilitation. With regard to juveniles, many legal systems have gone over to the indeterminate sentence.

Q.9.F. Are there special extended term prison-sentence provisions for dangerous special offenders similar to §3207?

A. The idea of providing an extended term for certain offenders arrives from the fact that most penal sentences are determined with a view toward retribution for the crime committed and the harm caused. The legislator's "conscience" will not permit him to impose sentences which are in excess of this retributive ideal. However, when reasons of public protection require the detention of a person who has served the retributive part of his sentence and is still dangerous, the need for an extended term arises. The model used in §32(7) basically is not bad, although it is somewhat cumbersome. Nearly all foreign penal codes have provisions for "dangerous or habitual criminals," who are frequently defined as persons who have been twice before committed of serious felonies and who upon overall evaluation of their deeds are proved to be habitual criminals. These persons are ordinarily sentenced to extended terms. In general, we are not aware of any penal system which is basically superior to the approach adopted in §32(7). We only urge that the provisions in this Section be simplified. It may be of interest to the Committee to know that the Criminal Law Education and Research Center of New York University has just obtained initial funding for a major international and comparative interdisciplinary study on means of dealing with the violent and dangerous offender. But it will be some time before research data becomes available for use in legislation. Currently, we have no information available.

Q.9.G. How do the authorized sentences for a representative group of crimes compare with the authorized prison sentences for the same offenses under foreign codes?

A. For the Committee's information, we are including a table showing a number of sentencing ranges for selected countries, from Scandinavia, the German speaking countries, the Socialist countries, the Balkan countries, the Mediterranean countries, one Latin American country, and New York, Indiana and the Model Penal Code. The chart indexes the range of prison sentences for three selected offenses under the codes of the selected countries. The offenses selected are: murder in the first degree, forceful rape and undifferentiated larceny (i.e., the lowest form of felonious larceny). For the most serious form of homicide the Federal Criminal Code Draft envisages capital punishment or life imprisonment (§36.02). Basically, the authoritarian countries of the world and the Asian countries provide for capital punishment. Thus, the German Democratic Republic (East), Chechoslovakia, Hungary and the USSR have capital punishment, as do Japan, Korea and China. The Northern and Central European countries have abolished capital punishment for homicide, with the exception of France. In Sweden, while possible life imprisonment is provided for the most severe form of homicide, in practice no sentence exceeds 8 years, which has been found sufficient for the reintegration into civilian life.

For rape, the maximum sentence provided for under the Federal Draft is 30 years. Of the countries compared, only Spain has such a potential maximum, and only Greece exceeds this potential maximum (potential life imprisonment). Denmark provides for a possible therapeutic care detention of life imprisonment. All other countries of the world have a sentencing range for rape which is approximately 1/3 of that provided for under the Federal Draft, actual sentences being much lower than that.

For the evaluation of larceny offenses, we have selected types of larceny which most clearly correspond to the type of larceny covered by §1732—as a Class C felony under §1735. The Federal Draft's possible maximum is 7 years. Such a high sentence is reached only in the Asian countries, with European countries being universally lower.

The sentencing ranges are difficult to compare since the parole provisions in the various countries differ from those of American jurisdictions. Our more liberal parole laws take some of the edge off our harsher sentences. On the other hand, since sentences imposed in continental countries are considerably lower than those imposed under American law, we are forced to conclude that, on the whole, the sentences provided for under the Federal Draft Code are probably twice as harsh as those envisaged under European law.

Q.9.H. Are there mandatory minimum prison sentences under the foreign codes?

A. The short answer to this is "yes, almost invariably", except of course that "suspended sentences" have become institutionalized in some foreign countries.

Q.9.I. If foreign nations employ systems of release on parole, how do they compare with the provisions in Chapter 34 of the Draft?

A. A correct answer to this question would require much more research than we have been able to complete in the limited time at our disposal. Parole is linked inevitably to the indeterminate sentence, which, as noted, is not ordinarily a feature of foreign systems. There is a slight comparison with Chapter 34, except for Britain and the Scandinavian countries and to some extent West Germany, all of whom have a fairly well-developed system for after-care comparable to parole. More usually, in the rest of the countries, sentenced persons are released after they have served a determinate part of their respective sentences, usually two-thirds. This is ordinarily a right which is administered by the court and subject to judicial review. (For an example of a parole law in one of the more advanced continental systems, see §26, German Penal Code which reads as follows:

"Section 26—Release on Parole.

(1) The court may conditionally discharge a convict sentenced to a limited term of punishment by deprivation of liberty, with his consent, if he has served two-thirds of his punishment, and at least three months, and if it can be expected that henceforth he will lead a lawful and orderly life.

(2) The period of parole may not be less than the remaining sentence, even in case of a mitigation of the term.

Q.9.J. Are prisoners released on parole by an administrative agency such as the United States parole board or by the Court?

A. For the reasons already outlined, parolees are most ordinarily released by the courts rather than by an administrative agency. In many countries, an executive decision in this matter would be in conflict with the principle of the separation of powers and would pose a constitutional problem. There are, however, a number of systems in which release by the court is the rule and supervision is undertaken by an administrative officer, usually from a branch of the correctional service. The conditions for release in the Draft are generally similar to those of foreign codes. But the crucial problem is not the placing of the decision-making process into the hands of either the court or an administrative agency. Rather, it is the question of supervision. In Scandinavian countries, particularly in Sweden, it has long been recognized that neither the court nor a separate administrative agency should be the sole administrator of parole conditions. In Sweden there is today general agreement that care in liberty for convicts is merely part of the total system of the extension of welfare services and care to those in need. Consequently, an effort is made in the Scandinavian countries to tie the administration of probation and parole services closely in with the social security system of the country, so that persons serving a term in liberty may receive the same comprehensive care with respect to housing, employment and other social services, which are provided to the other clientele of the social welfare administration.

Q.9.K. Does foreign law have any equivalent to proposed §3007 under which an organization convicted of an offense may be required to give notice or appropriate publicity to the conviction?

A. In civil law countries, there is no equivalent to §3007 of the Draft Code, since nearly all the continental countries do not impose criminal liability on organizations or corporations, but have found it more efficient and effective to place all criminal liability on the actual human perpetrators of crime. Even the most highly industrialized countries employ the method of criminal sanctioning only in connection with violations of an economic or regulatory sort. In such rare instances, corporations may be fined; otherwise, they are not subject to criminal liability. For the Committee's convenience, I have appended a published comparative law study of this whole problem range.

Q.9.L. Is giving publicity to a conviction (a different colored license plate for persons convicted of drunken driving, for example) used as a sanction or sentence under foreign codes?

A. In all countries with a free press, there is a likelihood that the more important convictions and sentences are reported in the press. In authoritarian countries there is a specific, determined effort to publish only certain types of convictions and sentences. Sanctions of marking or branding persons convicted of crime was widely practiced in the Middle Ages. The last remnants of such nefarious systems were to be found in Nazi Germany where Jews were compelled to wear the star of David, to mark them as outcasts. The marking or branding of convicts, by whatever means, is a violation of the most fundamental human rights and would be totally inconsistent with a re-socialization policy, by all principles known to correctional specialists today.

Q.9.M. Do the foreign codes have any equivalent to proposed §3003 (Persistent Misdemeanant)?

A. Foreign penal law codes do have equivalents to §3003, requiring persistent misdemeanants, variedly defined, to undergo additional sanctions. However, there is general disillusionment with the deterrent effect of such extended terms. Indeed, there is disillusionment with all relatively short periods of imprisonment. By their very definitions, persistent misdemeanants are not exactly a threat to the established order. Consequently, the purpose of the more modern type of extended term for misdemeanants usually is the effort to rehabilitate such offenders, particularly when rehabilitation can be effected outside established penal institutions, occasionally in half-way houses, homes, care centers, or in freedom. If §3003 is serious about rehabilitating efforts, then this section would be comparable to similar provisions, e.g., under the German Penal Code (§20a.2). It must be remembered, however, that persistent misdemeanants frequently are status offenders, whose behavior patterns are not affected by the threat of punishment.

Q.9.N. Do foreign codes require Judges to give reason in writing for sentences imposed?

A. Most foreign Codes of Criminal Procedure contain the basic requirement that the judge, when imposing a sentence, must give detailed reasons in writing for the sentence imposed. This is regarded as fundamental, since the "right and proper" sentence is mandated by law. Consequently, failure to impose the right sentence would be a violation of law leading to appeal and reversal. For the Committee's use we are including a reprint of an article entitled "Appelate Review of Legal but Excessive Sentences: A Comparative Study."

We would like to add, in this connection, that the older foreign penal codes require a relatively mechanical consideration of factors pertaining to the "guilt" of the perpetrator. The more modern codes require considerably more judicial sophistication and presuppose an investigation of facts and factors. Thus, §13 of the new German Penal Code, requires the following: §13—Principles of Sentencing:

(1) The culpability of the perpetrator is the basis for the composition of the punishment. The potential effects of the punishment upon the life of the perpetrator within society must be considered.

(2) In sentencing, the court weights the circumstances for and against the perpetrator, especially the following:

The motivations and goals of the perpetrator,

The attitude which speaks from the deed and efforts made toward perpetration of the deed,

The background of the perpetrator, his personal and economic conditions,

His behavior after the deed, especially his efforts to make up for the harm caused.

(3) Circumstances which already are definitial elements of the offense may not be considered.

This new provision of the German Penal Code strikes us as particularly suitable in guiding the judiciary in the finding of the right kind of sentence. While obviously the criteria developed by modern correctional research are far from conclusive, under such provisions the judge, nevertheless, is forced to weigh the factors which the legislation has deemed relevant on the basis of human experience. A judge who refuses to consider these factors, or attributes improper weights to these factors, may have a sentence reversed.

There are no counter-parts of guidance for the judiciary in the proposed Draft Penal Code, except, to some extent, in §102. Here the general purposes of the Code are outlined. The sentencing judge seems required to construe all provisions of the code, including the sentence provisions, to achieve the following objectives:

(a) To insure the public safety through (i) the deterrent influence of the penalties hereinafter provided, (ii) through rehabilitation of those convicted of violations of this Code, and (iii) such confinement as may be necessary to prevent likely recurrence of serious criminal behavior;

(b) By definition and grading of offenses, to limit official discretion (in and) punishment and to give fair warning of what is prohibited and of the consequences of violations;

(c) To prescribe penalties which are proportionate to the seriousness of offenses and which permit recognition of differences in rehabilitation possibilities among individual offenders;

(d) To safeguard conduct that is without guilt from condemnation and criminal;

(e) To prevent arbitrary or oppressive treatment of persons accused or convicted of offenses; . . .

This legislative guide to the judiciary is more retrogressive than the comparable provisions of Scandinavian and West German law, but at least it constitutes some guidance to the judiciary. Unhappily the code does not make it clear that judges must act in accordance with these guidelines and are required to assign reasons for their sentence in writing. In our view, the legislation should make it quite clear that judges are required to consider these aims of legislative policy.

In addition we would urge that provisions like §13, Subs. 1 and 2, of the new German Penal Code be added. If judges were required to consider such detailed factors when imposing sentence, it is likely that the sentencing phase of federal criminal trials would improve considerably. Counsel for both sides would be required to be prepared on these absolutely relevant questions of personal characteristics and background of the petrator and would be required to agree on them before the judge in all cases. This just might result in a sentence which can be expected to provide the best possible rehabilitation of the offender and protection of the public. Moreover, appellate decisions on questions of sentencing are likely to raise the niveau and uniformity of sentencing policies.

As an incident to §1291 of the Draft Code, we regard it as absolutely necessary that District Courts be required in all cases to state the reasons for their sentence and, in particular, to consider a certain set of criteria, which must be included in the draft code, patterned after § 13 of the new German Penal Code.

Q.9.O and 9.P. Are sentences subject to review and appeal by a higher court? If so, may the appellate court raise as well as lower the sentence? May the government appeal a sentence or only the defendant?

A. To some extent the answers to the questions ave been provided in the preceding answer. It remains to be added that criminal sentences are universally subject to review in civil law countries. The question of the "right" sentence is a question of law, thus entitling either party to an appeal. Civil law countries subscribe to the so called system of reformatio in pejus, according to which, on the defendant's appeal of his sentence, the sentence may only be lowered. The prosecution, however, may appeal to have the sentence lowered or to have it raised, and the Appellate Tribunal has the right to do either.

Q.9.R. If appellate review of sentence is not authorized under foreign penal or criminal procedure codes, how is uniformity of sentencing amongst the judges secured?

A. Since sentence review is universally provided for in foreign criminal law systems, and is used to achieve uniformity of sentencing, in accordance with the standards of laws set out in the codes, the question is inapplicable.

Q.9.S. How does §3204 (Concurrent and Consecutive Terms of Imprisonment) compare with foreign code provisions on multiple offenses? Some European codes provide for a joint sentence rather than concurrent or consecutive sentences. How are terms computed under joint sentencing provisions? Under a "joint sentence", which happens if one but not all of the convictions is reversed on appeal?

A. This is not an easy question. Most countries have had some difficulty in providing for an appropriate system in the case of multiple or repeated offenses, or for the concurrence of different crimes in the same transaction. France and Germany both have a system under which a joint sentence is formed. Basically it works like this: If the same offender violates several penal laws, only the law which provides for the most severe punishment is applied. When, by several independent acts, several offenses are committed, or the same offense is repeated, and several potential terms are incurred, a joint or compound sentence is formed, which is basically an aggravation of the most severe punishment incurred. There usually is a limitation on such a compounded or joint sentence in that it may not exceed a given number of years, e.g. 10 or 15 years (§4, German Penal Code). There has been considerable discussion in European countries as to whether or not the deterrent effect may not be lost if the sentence for several offenses is potentially little more than the maximum term for the most severe crime committed. But neither in Germany nor in the United States are there any available research data to answer that particular question.

When on retrial or appeal the conviction of one of the crimes charged is reversed, the case is sent back to the trial court for resentencing, but the same judge will not be charged with the task of resentencing (German Code of Criminal Procedure, §354).

Q.9.T. Regarding the imposition of fines, do any foreign codes have provisions similar of §3301(2)?

A. The provision of dealing with authorized fines depending on the seriousness of the crime is not totally dissimilar to comparable provisions in some foreign penal codes.

Q.9.U. In the United States many imposed fines are never collected and, therefore, of limited value either as a punishment or deterrent to others; how do foreign codes provide for collection of fines?

A. Foreign legislators, likewise, have struggled with the question of the uncollectable fine. The Swedish government in 1969 appointed an expert with the responsibility of investigating the possibility of removing imprisonment as a sanction for failure to pay a fine. Research conducted in this connection, however, showed that, except for parking tickets, the payment record on Swedish fines is excellent, namely 93%, and the income from fines contributed a substantial portion of the national budget.

In Sweden the sheriff has the responsibility to receive fines imposed by the court. If the fine cannot be collected, the country administration has to decide whether it should be written off or reduced. If the person who is supposed to pay the fine is financially unable to do so, the sheriff may give him an extension of time, or allow him to pay in installments.

In Finland much energy is devoted to finding new sanction alternatives. In the German Federal Republic fines may be paid in installments if the convict's economic situation requires it. Likewise, persons sentenced to fines may be permitted to satisfy the uncollected fine by free labor for a government department. In most countries, if a defendant refuses to pay the fine, he may be imprisoned. But the more progressive codes provide that, if the fine cannot be collected through no fault of the convict, the court may dispense with the execution of the substituted punishment. (See §29.6 German Penal Code. This is a fairly typical provision).

Q.9.V. What is the "day fine" system and how are provisions regarding it formulated?

A. The day fine system is a commutation of a pecuniary penalty in unremunerated day labor in favor of a public body. The nature of the work is determined by the public body responsible for supervising the execution of the sentence. It has been used very successfully, for many years, in Spain as well as in the Scandinavian countries, and is an extremely effective device for two reasons: One, it makes the use of a fine in lieu of prisonment possible, even in the case of members of the lowest economic population strata. Two, it equalizes the burden of the fine in direct relation to the earning power of the perpetrator. It has been incorporated into the Model Penal Code for Latin America (Article 45.47).

Under the day fine system the gravity of the sanction is expressed in terms of numbers of days' earning capacity. Thus, for the same offense, both the rich and the poor may be fined an equal number of day fines. For the poor man this corresponds to a very low amount of money, namely his earning capacity for "x" days. To the rich man the fine is, likewise, the earning capacity of "x" days. Since his earning capacity is much higher, the actual fine paid is much higher.

Whether such a system can be introduced into the United States depends upon an interpretation of the Equal Protection Clause. In Scandinavian countries, however, it is regarded as a requirement of equal protection that the day fine system be used.

Q.9.W. Is the day fine a fixed amount depending upon the gravity of the offense of which the defendant is convicted or is the amount fixed based upon the ability of the defendant to pay?

A. The question has been basically answered in Section 9.V., above. But, to be specific, and taking once more the system used under the Latin American Model Penal Code, the fine is fixed by reference to the computed daily earnings of the convicted person, taking into account gross receipts, economic situation, and, in general, by reference to his obligations, etc. The amounts so set are converted into day fines by reference to the equivalent labor of the sum so set as a pecuniary fine. An upper limit is set under the amount of the Model Penal Codes for Latin America, of 500 day fines. The gravity of the offense determines the number of day fines to be imposed.

Q.10. Is mistake of law a defense under foreign codes? Mistake of fact? How do foreign provisions compare if §§303, 304, 609?

A. This question has been answered in connection with question 3 supra.

Q.11. One significant change in the proposed Code from present Federal criminal law is the separation of the jurisdictional base upon which federal prosecution rests from the definition of the offense as to which the defendant is prosecuted. Are there analogues to this differentiation between crime and jurisdiction in any of the foreign codes?

A. There are no analogous problems or solutions in any foreign penal code. It should be noted that the United States is the only federal country which does not have a national criminal code. Both Germany and Switzerland have national criminal codes, which are administered by state or cantonal courts. The Soviet Union, basically, has a Union federal penal code which, except for a few provisions is uniform throughout the USSR. In reviewing this section, however, the Draft's solution strikes us as an ingeneous resolution of a very difficult problem.

Q.12 How do the Draft Code's provisions on extraterritorial jurisdiction (§208) compare with the foreign provisions on extraterritoriality and jurisdiction over crimes committed outside national boundaries?

A. We are not in a position to answer this question at this time. The Criminal law Education and Research Center of New York University has agreed to serve as consultant to an American Bar Association Committee which has the question of the code's extraterritorial jurisdiction under review. In general, however, we can say that American law has always been extremely conservative in using extraterritorial jurisdiction and even under §208 there is a wide margin between the actual use of extraterritorial jurisdiction under national, and what is admissible under international law.

Q.13. How is the problem of criminal conspiracy handled under foreign codes?

A. Basically, foreign penal codes do not use the concept of conspiracy, restricting themselves to the use of the law of accessoryship. Under a few foreign penal codes conspiracy is made punishable only in connection with murder. There are, however, some exceptions to this general non-use of the conspiracy concept, e.g., under Article 8 of the Chilean Code and Article 7 of the Uruguayan Code. The Chilean Code uses the concept of conspiracy or instigation to commit a crime, but only where the law specially so provides. Conspiracy exists when two or more persons agree to commit a crime. Under German law there is a rarely used provision (§49(a)(2) to the effect "Anybody who agrees with others to engage in an act punishable as a felony, or who accepts the offer of another, or declares his willingness to engage in such act, shall be punished as an instigator." Basically, however, civil law countries have not found it necessary to use the conspiracy concept.

Q.14. How do foreign codes handle the problem of "felony-murder" (murder committed by one party to a felony)? (See §1601[e]).

A. The concept of "felony-murder" is not known in continental countries, and is, as widely known, in general disrepute in Anglo-American countries as well. The awkward construction of Section 1601 gives an indication of the "guilt complex" with which the draftsmen try to solve this problem. The felony-murder concept, basically, deviates from the idea that every perpetrator should be punished in accordance with the guilt which he himself has occurred (See §102(e) of the instant Draft). §50 of the German Penal Code simply provides:

(1) If several persons are participating in one deed, each shall be punished for his own guilt, regardless on the guilt of others.

(2) Where the law provides for the aggravation, mitigation or exclusion of punishment for personal characteristics, these are applicable only to the principal perpetrator or accomplice in whom they inhere.

The basic issue in the felony-murder situation is that of the imposition of liability for an unforeseen or unintended consequence. §302(3)(a) states the fundamental rule of American law regarding culpability: Culpability is required with regard to every element of the conduct and attendant circumstances. That would seem to include the death caused during the commission of a felony. Consequently, to the extent that the felony-murder rule deviates from this principle of culpability, it ought to be abolished.

The causation and intent difficulties of the felony murder complex are not peculiar to homicide situations. They, in fact, inhere in all situations which require causation of a given result. Consequently, in continental codes one is more likely to find general provisions which attempt to solve this kind of problem once and for all.

§56 of the German Penal Code: "If the law threatens a higher penalty for a specified consequence of a deed, the perpetrator shall be subjected to this aggravated punishment only if he has caused the consequence at least negligently." In other words, if a felon was negligent with respect to the causation of a death during the perpetration of a felony, then the homicide is attributable to him, otherwise not.

Consequently, we would propose that all reference to felony-murder be removed from section 1601. All problems of the causation of a basically unintended result can be solved by the general provision §302(3)b.

Q.15. In those nations which have a Federal system (e.g. West Germany, Switzerland) does the Federal government have concurrent or exclusive jurisdiction over riots, mass demonstrations and crimes or is jurisdiction limited in a way similar to proposed §1801(4)? How do the Code provisions in this area (§1801—Inciting Riot; §1802—Arming Rioters; §1803—Engaging in a Riot; §1804—Disobedience of Public Safety Orders under Riot Conditions) compare with foreign code sections dealing with similar problems?

A. Inasmuch as all foreign countries have only one penal code, all riot type offenses are covered in that penal code. Problems of Federalism do not arise.

Q.16. Do any of the foreign codes have a section similar to §1104 (Para-Military Activities)?

A. Yes, some foreign penal codes have sections on para-military activities comparable to §1104. However, most of these are dating back to the middle of the 19th Century, when absolute monarchies were being threatened by democratic uprisings. Typical is the still existing section 127 of the German Penal Code, in which the type of conduct described in §1104 of the Draft is subjected to a two year term of imprisonment.

Q.17. A number of sections and subchapters of the proposed code deal with an area which is often referred to as "crimes without victims"; i.e. crimes in which the victim either consents or is a willing customer of the defendant. See e.g., §§1841-1849 (prostitution), 1851 (obscenity), and homosexual activity between consenting adults. How do the foreign codes approach these problems?

A. While there generally is a movement under way to remove so-called crimes without victims from the general sweep of the criminal law, the process has been relatively slow. Prof. Antilla of Finland recently reported:

> The crime catalogues of the criminal laws are continually changing. In recent years, the so called "moral" offenses had been the object of special attention. Denmark and Sweden have lifted the ban on pornography and Finland will probably follow that example. The abortion law reform carried out in Denmark and Finland and which soon will be brought before the Swedish Parliament, aim at a system which is fairly close, but still some distance from so-called "free abortion". Public drunkenness is in most cases no longer an offense in Finland and Norway, and Sweden will soon pass a similar law.

There is generally much interest in decriminalization—even in such areas as property crimes. The feasibility of decriminalizating petty larceny is seriously being considered in a report by a Swedish state committee which was made public in the beginning of this year.

The decriminalization is, naturally, balanced by adding new offenses to the crime catalogues. Race discrimination is now a crime in some [Scandinavian Countries]. Soon all the Scandinavian countries will have legislation against the invasion of privacy, e.g .by the means of electronic devices is now in the way of becoming a crime. There is a trend toward providing stiffer punishments for tax offenses.

It may be added that many countries have removed consensual sodomy from their crime catalogues. A major government report of the Netherlands has proposed a new policy for decriminalization of most drug offenses. Many of the European countries no longer use their criminal sanctions for the control of prostitution and gambling. But legislative amendment has been somewhat sluggish.

Q.18. How do foreign code provisions on firearms and explosives compare with §§1811 to 1814 and the Commission's controversial recommendation in the introductory note to the subchapter?

A. The Criminal Law Education and Research Center is currently engaged in a study of firearms laws of foreign countries. Thus, we are not yet ready to report. Basically, however, it may be said that all foreign countries have stringent laws for the control of firearms, requiring the licensing of all firearms and prohibiting the possession of all unlicensed firearms. This is a universal rule in all countries which we have investigated so far. Basically, the rule works well, although frequent mass violations have been reported recently for Italy as well as the Soviet Union.

Q.19. Which foreign jurisdictions provide for capital punishment? For which offenses? Do any foreign codes provide for a separate proceeding to determine sentence in a capital case? (See §3602). Are separate hearings on sentencing authorized in any cases or does the absence of a jury system make separate hearings not bound by restrictive rules of evidence superfluous?

A. As we have stated above, France is the only basically democratic European country left with capital punishment. Other than that, only authoritarian countries maintain capital punishment, including Spain, Greece and the USSR.

Due to the fact that European government proceedings are not divided into a fact finding and into a sentencing phase, all questions of liability and punishment are decided in one proceeding. A separate sentencing hearing is unknown in Europe. Consequently, in capital as well as non-capital cases, there is no such thing as a sentencing stage (see Mueller and Bescharov "The Two Phase System of Criminal Procedure in the United States, 15 Wayne Law Review, 613, 1969).

Q.20. How do the codes' provisions on multiple prosecutions and trials (§ 703—Prosecution for Multiple Related Offenses; § 704—When Prosecution Barred by Former Prosecution for Different Offense; §706—Prosecutions Under Other Federal Codes; §707—Former Prosecution in Another Jurisdiction: When a Bar; §708—Subsequent Prosecution by a Local Government: When Barred; §709—When Former Prosecution is Invalid or Fraudulently Procured) compare with the relevant sections of foreign codes?

A. In foreign penal codes, questions pertaining to multiple prosecutions and trials are covered exclusively by codes of criminal procedure. It is safe to say, however, that in civil law countries there is a requirement that the prosecution make all efforts to prosecute in one proceeding all criminal charges arising out of the same act or transaction.

This is to avoid the harassment of the defendant which results from being subjected to a continuing series of prosecutions. In some countries the rules are so stringent that failure on the part of the prosecution to prosecute a then pending charge results in a virtual bar to prosecute such charge later. The details are too complicated for discussion in this context.

CAUSING CRIMINAL HARM

For want of a nail the shoe is lost, for want of a shoe the horse is lost, for want of a horse the rider is lost.
—POOR RICHARD'S ALMANAC, 1757 [1]

For want of a rider the message is lost, for want of a message the battle is lost—the war is lost—the fatherland is lost.

I. COMMON LAW

WOULD anyone contend that the horseman who had failed to inspect the hoofs of his mare was not a link in the causal chain which led to the loss of the fatherland? And what of the horseman's corporal who lacked in proper supervision? or the sergeant who was lax on his corporals? or the lieutenant who suffered all this laxness? They all may be said to have caused the loss of the fatherland. Suppose now that a military tribunal were charged with the unenviable task of having to affix criminal liability to rider, corporal, sergeant, lieutenant, etc., for having caused the loss of the fatherland:

It might be contended that an authoritarian state would have little difficulty in assessing blame in our case, and that it would swiftly deal out harsh punishments, whereas a democratic state would be rather reluctant to impute such serious liability to a simple horseman who merely failed to check the hoofs of his mare, or, for that matter, to his immediate superiors, low in the hierarchy of military command. And thus it might be concluded that in the art or science or craft of criminal law one set of causation principles might recommend itself to an autocracy, another to a democracy, and others yet to all the other forms of government.

But must we not concede that in Poor Richard's Case an authoritarian court would be perfectly justified in calling the sequence of events a causal chain? And if the democratic court will not impute liability for having set the causal chain into motion, does it not permit itself to be governed by considerations other than those of factual causation—perhaps a feeling of tenderness toward human liberty, or whatever else it might be?

The question arises, therefore, what criteria are available to us, or the courts of any country, to make a determination that for purposes of the criminal law a certain event is the effect of a certain cause. It should hardly be necessary to state that there must be a relative degree of certainty, regularity, uniformity, and predictability in such cause-and-effect attributions, for modern criminal law cannot operate but by telling the law-governed citizenry in advance that legal consequences, sanctions, will follow the causation of certain effects or events, harm, in the hope of thereby stimulating the citizenry into abstaining from such causations.

Let us ascertain, therefore, how the causation problem is solved in our courts and what standards, if any, are applied. A swift survey shows that while, on the whole, our common law judges have faithfully labored to reach acceptable solutions, sometimes even by simply ignoring policy-frustrating causation issues, the results have not always been uniform and predictable.

There seem to be three traditional ways for American courts to handle the causation problem in criminal law:

1. Courts may shun the problem altogether, and instances of this, unfortunately, are not isolated. One recent example may demonstrate the point: Wilson assaulted his wife by shooting her with a ·22 calibre rifle. He was promptly charged with assault, tried, convicted and sentenced to several years of imprisonment in the penitentiary. While Wilson was in prison, and within a year and a day from the assault, Mrs. Wilson died of an acute purulent meningitis. She had " declined to permit removal of the slug which was lodged at the base of her sinus." The defendant now was reindicted for murder and convicted in due course. On appeal, the appellate court was gravely concerned about the double-jeopardy aspects of the case—resolving them soundly against the defendant, in accordance with established common law practice—but did not say a word about the causation issue. Nor does it appear that the defendant had even raised the issue.[2] It is regrettable that the court ignored the causation issue. Perhaps it stumbled into the right conclusion, nevertheless it stumbled.

2. The second way of handling the causation issue consists of simply referring it to the sound discretion of the jury.[3] This portrays a somewhat defeatist attitude, frequently resorted to in treating theoretically difficult issues at common law.[4] It would be unfair to contend, however, that all our judges have been consciously or unconsciously remiss in their duties with respect to the treatment of the causation problem. Indeed, many have endeavored to develop a body of rules on causation and a certain theory has thus been developed. The application of such a theory is the third American method of solving issues of causation in criminal law.

3. A concise and accurate description of this theory or theories—products of case law—may be found in Wingersky's excellent new treatise.[5] I find there three basic propositions:

(1) "The ultimate harm suffered is linked, by causal relation, to the perpetrating act."

(2) "The resultant harm is imputed to an accused if it is the proximate consequence of his act or omission."

(3) "A sane actor is presumed to intend the natural, probable and reasonable consequences of his own deliberate, voluntary acts."[6]

Point one contains a statement beyond dispute, though unquestionably rather a vague one, and point three a proposition, right or wrong, which has long been used by our courts in the determination of any mental element of crime. It need not receive any further attention in this connection. The controversy centers principally on point two. And here, indeed, is the center of gravity of case law on causation.

A recent example may demonstrate the difficulties inherent in this so-called proximate cause concept (difficulties, incidentally, which are multiplied in those courts where the issue is left entirely to the relatively unguided discretion of the jury).

[2] State v. Wilson, 335 P. 2d 613 (Ariz. 1959).

[3] The most recent wholesale instance was the product test of Durham v. United States, 214 F. 2d 862 (D.C.Cir. 1954), making it the responsibility of the jury to determine whether mental disease, etc., was the cause of the crime. See Ryu, "Causation in Criminal Law," 106 U.Pa.L.Rev. 773, 805 (1958).

Defendant and decedent, both somewhat intoxicated, engaged in an automobile race on a three-lane public highway, at times exceeding speeds of 90 m.p.h. On a bridge where the highway narrowed to two lanes, and where the vision ahead was obstructed, decedent attempted to pass defendant. Pulling out into the left-hand lane, he fatally crashed head-on into a truck, coming from the opposite direction. The defendant was convicted of involuntary manslaughter, and the appellate court affirmed, stating:

"The question whether the unlawful conduct of a defendant is a proximate cause of the death is almost always one of fact for the jury. . . . The jury found that the defendant's unlawful act of racing was a proximate cause of [decedent's] death. The evidence supported the finding. The unlawful act of the defendant in racing with the deceased continued up to the moment of collision. . . . [The trial judge] ably and adequately charged the jury on proximate cause." [7]

The charge to the jury cannot be gleaned from the appellate opinion which is phrased entirely in terms of proximate cause, substantial factors, and lacking remoteness. The jury mustered its common sense accordingly and returned a verdict of guilty of manslaughter. Few would quarrel with the result if the issue at stake were the liability on the part of defendant's insurance company for the compensation of deceased's pregnant wife and seven fatherless children, i.e., tort,[8] but since the issue was the stigma of criminal guilt for homicide, the decision must leave a critical observer somewhat dissatisfied.

There is widespread agreement in the cases that a cause is the proximate cause of an effect if it is not remote [9] and if but for the defendant's cause, the (effect) harm would not have followed, and—according to some authorities—if no intervening cause, entirely independent of the defendant's activity, alone produced the only legally material effect (harm).

The second requirement, it appears immediately, is necessarily [7] Commonwealth v. Root, 156 A. 2d 895 (Pa.Super. 1959). The opposite result was reached in People v. Lemieux, 176 Misc. 305, 27 N.Y.S. 2d 235 (1941).

[8] Indeed, the opinion cited Prosser as the outstanding living authority on this subject, ibid. note 4.

[9] This amounts to saying that a proximate cause is proximate if it is proximate, as to which see text below.

included in the first and really needs no further repetition.[10] The "but for" requirement has been called the factual element of causation.[11] Factual causation is not identical with mechanical or physical causation. While it may be strictly mechanical (stab—wound—gangrene—death), it may also be physically or psychologically stimulative, as where a mechanical stimulation causes a psychological response or a psychological stimulation causes a mechanical or psychological response, and, indeed, chain reactions are included on ancient authority, as causa causati.[12]

This rule of causation, unfortunately, tells us nothing about its limitations. I submit that our juries would do equally well without any instruction whatsoever on any such thing as proximate cause, but by merely relying on their intuitions—which is probably what they are doing anyway. What is proximate, thus, is an entirely intuitive matter not subject to any scientific or logical limitation. The only certain element in the above causation rule is the "but for" aspect of the defendant's conduct. Uncertain is all the rest, especially the problem of "how far the principle of mens rea will be pressed" in causation,[13] and the weight to be given to the form or nature of the defendant's conduct in the composite picture of causes and conditions all of which have somehow contributed to the production of the effect.

The first step in determining a causal connection does not seem to be an overly difficult one: it is simply the determination of the sine qua non, i.e., the establishment that but for the defendant's conduct, the event in question, the harm, result in question, would not have occurred. Difficulties arise only with the further step or steps to be taken for limiting the imputation of liability to such a degree that the goals of criminal law can be maximally achieved. It is here where confusion reigns. Ryu in a recent article has subordinated all causation imputations to the goals of a "free society" in which "human dignity is the ultimate goal."[14] What are the implications of such a limitation on causation?

[10] E.g., although D acts to kill V, and wounds V severely (mortally), if an entirely independent (i.e., in no way dependent on or related to D's act) agent, human or other, intervenes with an impact on V alone sufficient to cause death, D is cheated out of his homicidal triumph, and is at best guilty of attempted murder. D's act is not a causa sine qua non of the death.

Let us return to Poor Richard's rider and determine why he should not be punished for some sort of statutory sabotage in a democratic society. Leaving aside the largely archaic and medieval aims of vengeance, talionic or other, it must surely be conceded that criminal law serves this one grand purpose: the prevention of crime, especially of repeated crime. Now, it is obvious that authoritarian society is just as much interested in winning its battles as is democratic society. Both will or should, therefore, aim at creating those stimuli which will best insure the winning of battles or, generally speaking, which will prevent unlawful-undesirable conduct, whatever it may be that is regarded as unlawful-undesirable in any society. Since in all forms of human society the recipient of the stimuli with which criminal law operates is the human psyche—stimulable by pains and pleasures or the expectation of either, and intent upon guiding its master's purposes—would it not follow that cause-and-effect attribution, as a means for the proper application of the stimulus, must be the same all over the world? (I concede, of course, that the stimulus must be one which is effective in a given society, and that effectiveness may depend on innumerable variants among different societies.)

A theory of causation in a criminal law which aims at prevention of whatever may be decreed as unlawful can be constituted only in one manner, no matter where it is to be applied.

As an aside, it is important to note the limitation to criminal law, for a tort causation theory may well have to be differently constituted by reason of a combination of two aims, prevention of undesirable conduct and compensation of those aggrieved, i.e., loss distribution. Where the compensation goal is recognized, a theory of causation founded on the prevention goal alone must be materially tempered. I shall take no further note of causation in torts or any other field of law save criminal law.

Since criminal law operates principally in a teleological fashion in seeking to dissuade persons tempted to do so from engaging in conduct which will bring about a certain legally recognized harm —including the creation of a state of danger—it must rest on the assumption that at least most members of society so tempted are stimulus-responsive (responsible). This assumption necessarily includes a hypothetical knowledge of cause-and-effect relationships, i.e., the ability to predict that certain results will flow from certain consequences. Two techniques are employed for insuring the popular effectiveness of criminal law with respect to this causation assumption:

1. The law exempts, or should exempt where it does not already do so, all those from liability (as "insane") who cannot muster the intelligence or rationality necessary for predicting ordinary cause-and-effect sequences with which the criminal law operates. This can be achieved most effectively in those jurisdictions which have modified the M'Naughten Rules of incapacity by excluding those unable to appreciate the nature and consequences of their acts.[15]

2. The law endeavors—and should endeavor more than in the past—to create only such crimes which will spare the individual the onerous burden of speculating about cause and effect. Thus, the law will prohibit the sale of certain types of literature because of the feared effect which such literature is believed to have on the minds of the public, especially certain members of the public, like young and immature or otherwise suggestible persons. By such a direct prohibition the law avoids difficult causation issues which might arise, for example, on the trial for accessoryship before the fact to murder of one who had sold a homicide-suggesting brochure to a suggestible minor who had murdered, it might be argued, as a result of having read the brochure.

But while this second limitation may solve some problems of causation, it immediately raises others. A legislator who habitually moves the point of attack of the threat of sanction away from the ultimate harm he seeks to prevent, also invites a causal argument to connect the prohibited specific harm with the more remote ultimate harm, in terms of necessary consequence. Thus, the driving of an automobile without proper headlights, in violation of statute, is obviously an offense created in order to prevent possible injury in traffic, especially human death. If now a driver causes human death at night, and if, upon inspection, his headlights are found to be violative of the statute, a prosecutor in a homicide trial may well be tempted to make a causal argument without much ado. Worse yet, a presumption, rebuttable or irrebuttable, is sometimes employed for the imputation of the ultimate harm to the creator of the earlier minor harm. The result is an arbitrary solution of the problem of causation in terms of preclusion of further fact inquiry, once the coincidence of the infraction of the minor norm and the occurrence of the ultimate harm have been established. The law abounds in examples: armed robbery and death of a human being, as constituting murder; or, possibly, the commission of any felony and human death, as constituting murder. Such typified extensions of liability upwards are as arbitrary a limitation on causal fact inquiry as are the typified limitations downwards, as, e.g., the artificial one year and one day limitation on homicide imputation.[16]

Anglo-American law, it seems to me, has always endeavored to keep its consideration of causality in terms which are understandable to the man for whom criminal law exists. It has, many especially recent examples to the contrary notwithstanding, wisely tried to limit causal imputations to situations where the "causer" did foresee or predict the consequences of his conduct,[17] even though such teleological element has not always been made part of the causation formula. Such foreseeing or predicting would seem to be necessary for liability for intentional criminality. As a matter of fact, however, even for intentional crime many convictions do rest on causing the harm without actually foreseeing it, but under circumstances where the offender should, or an ordinary reasonable or prudent person in his place would, have foreseen or predicted the consequences. Under traditional common law principles there could at best be liability for negligent production of the harm in such cases—where negligence suffices for liability (e.g., negligent homicide, under statute, but rarely arson under statute)—but not otherwise.

In imputing foreseeability, it is relatively easy to attribute knowledge of the likelihood and nature of certain consequences in [16] Oklahoma has just had its first pronouncement to that effect: Elliot v. Mills, 335 P. 2d 1104 (Okla. 1959).

mere physical cause-and-effect relationships, e.g., the impact of a bullet on a human body. It is much more difficult where the cause acts as a stimulant to the reaction of another, be it reflex behavior or rational conduct, which behavior, in turn, leads to the effectuation of the harm. Perkins, in his recent treatise, quite properly talks of normal and abnormal reactions of the stimulated person, and he explains, on the basis of decisions, that the liability will vary accordingly.[18] I submit, however, that expected and anticipated reactions would make for intentional production of the harm, whereas a mere awareness that the reaction might occur (chance taking) would at best make for reckless production of the harm. It follows that if the reaction be wholly unpredictable and abnormal, it cannot lead to imputability.

This is, in fact, the utilization of the forms of mens rea as forms of the mental process within the actus reus part of the crime,[19] for adjustment of the foreseeability element of causation. Although not infrequently overlooked by the courts, this effective limitation of the " but for " rule of causation has now been incorporated into the Model Penal Code,[20] which requires that the result be within the purpose or contemplation of the actor, if the offense requires that the harm be produced purposely or knowingly,[21] and that the result be within the risk of which the actor is aware, if the offense requires that the crime be produced recklessly,[22] a splendid solution. Hall achieves the same result—and, unfortunately, goes beyond it—by fusing mens rea with causation or employing mens rea as a check on causation.[23] Williams should be able to achieve the same result by using mens rea as an independent subsequent check on an otherwise completely factual causation concept.[24] concept of American criminal law.[25] Causation links conduct and harm. But conduct has a physical aspect—the physical motion or rest observable in the external world—and a mental aspect, a mental process without which conduct would be little more than a spasm. Since conduct has these two aspects, and since conduct is linked with harm through causation, it follows that the link itself must have two aspects. Factual causation (usually physical, sometimes psycho-physical) links the physical event with harm, but only foresight, awareness, intention, purpose—of whatever intensity required by law—can link the mental process with the required harm.

Either solution is in general accord with the traditional crime

Our causation concept as limited so far should now be tested on a well-known example: "Shooting back" at robbers is a natural and predictable consequence of robbing victims, especially those in hazardous occupations who are likely to be armed, so that, no matter who gets shot in the mêlée in satisfaction of the factual (physical or psycho-physical) causation requirement, one might conclude that all robbers—or at least those who survive—have caused the death of whoever died in the gun battle. Such, indeed, was the result achieved in the recently (at least partially) overruled[26] line of Pennsylvania felony murder decisions. But in repudiating its prior stand, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court was unable to find a logical, theoretically sound ground on which to reverse. Nevertheless, it deserves credit for mustering the courage to reverse and overrule itself anyway. If we limit our causation inquiry to factual-teleological causation, but for which the harm would not have occurred, we might be driven to the awkward position of having to approve the now overruled cases.[27] While with respect to sine qua non it might be argued that factually the shot came entirely from a source other than the defendant, it is nevertheless true that but for the defendant's act the deceased would not have been shot to death by a defending victim. If we carefully add a limitation in terms of the forms of the mental process (like the forms of mens rea), we are much more likely to achieve an acceptable result: if D neither desired any death, nor foresaw it as certain, but merely risked its occurrence, he would have the recklessness sufficient for manslaughter, but not the intention required for murder. But perhaps D aimed to kill.[28]

The solution is still unsatisfactory, but nothing within our causation formula itself, as so far developed, hints at a solution.

Suppose that in Poor Richard's Case the important lost message directed the general to withdraw to a certain safe position because of a likely onslaught of superior fresh enemy troops. The loss of the message might not have been so bad, had it not been for the fact that the quartermaster failed to get his supply wagons with ammunition through a muddy passage, so that these could not reach the front in time, because, in turn, the scouts had been wrong in their judgment in choosing this route over another which was dry. And suppose further that because some officers had carelessly conversed in camp about the strength or weakness of their troops, the enemy had gained this vital information. Who is now the causer of the defeat? The rider and his hapless superiors? the quartermaster? the scouts? or the careless officers? But for the conduct of all of our potential defendants the fatherland would not have been lost. Again and again they had been told of all the possible serious consequences which might arise out of violations of military discipline and duty. In fact, all might have foreseen, or at least regarded as possible, the serious consequences of their wrongdoing. Should they all be subjected to liability for (recklessly causing) the harm? or at least for causing it negligently? Of course, to all of them we would unhesitatingly attribute liability for the specific violations of military discipline. But what of the statutory sabotage which we supposed our state might recognize? Are they all guilty of that? Should we punish them equally and fully as if each one alone had fully caused the harm? Should punishment be allotted in an equitable manner according to the contribution which each one had made to the common disaster? Again, our formula alone would lead us to the conclusion that all defendants would have equally caused the national disaster. It permits no other result, though one might feel more and more uneasy about these cases of chain reactions or multiple contributions. And the difficulties are bound to increase in proportion to the number of contributors to the effect.

[28] Of course, the felony-murder doctrine as understood in Pennsylvania does impute murder liability, and because it does so, cannot be logically limited. The soundness of the felony-murder doctrine—which was supposed to solve problems of causation—is therefore in question as inconsonant with the mandates of causal imputation.

Rarely are multiple contributions capable of exact measurement. One such case, however, was recently discussed by Williams.[29] At least two of three causal contributors added measurable causes to the effect—but unfortunately it was the third one who was prosecuted: Defendant, foreman of a railroad work gang, misread the train schedule and ordered a rail replacement although a train was due. But he complied with standard safety procedure by ordering a flagman to take a position 1,000 yards away from the work place to stop possibly oncoming trains. The flagman moved only 540 yards away. A train approached. The engineer should have been able to see the flagman 500 yards ahead, but had failed to maintain a proper lookout. He should have been able to stop the train at 1,000 yards. The flagman's 460 yards shortage of moving, and the engineer's 500 yards shortage in applying the brakes combined in causing a fatal accident.[30] The foreman was tried and convicted of manslaughter. His contribution is not capable of measurement, although his negligent act is clearly a factual cause as well: But for his act of ordering the replacement when it should not have been ordered, no accident could have occurred. Williams criticized the decision and regards the law as not finally settled. This decision, in accord with our causation formula,[31] leaves us with the same feeling of dissatisfaction as the Pennsylvania felony-murder cases, Poor Richard's Case, and many others.

We are, therefore, squarely faced with the task of determining the nature and extent of any further limitations upon causal imputation (i.e., within the causation formula) or upon liability (i.e., outside the causation formula). This task has always been regarded as the most difficult challenge in the creation of a causation formula. I am not aware of any piece of American scholarship which does not propose some such further limitation within the causation formula itself. Despite many attempts at solving the problem, all suggested solutions are devoid of certainty. The very inquiry into the problem means treading on swampland, in the opinion of those who like utter certainty of legal rules; it means return to the swamps in the opinion of those who like the rules of past American case law and who regarded the first two or three steps out of the swamps as futile to begin with. The prevailing view, nevertheless, takes this step, and regards it as necessary despite the already achieved restriction of the causation concept in terms of factual and teleological limitations.

The enlightened opinions of the day may vary somewhat in expression, but they all aim at the same type of a limitation. Hall postulates, in line with philosophical theory,[32] that an otherwise acceptable cause will lead to liability only if it was effective.[33] Wechsler, in the Model Penal Code, and following earlier probings together with Michael,[34] puts the emphasis on the result by excluding an effect which is "too accidental in its occurrence to have a just bearing on the actor's liability."[35] Ryu, seizing upon the essential justness or unjustness of any possible imputation, would resolve the issue of ultimate limitation of cause and effect by reference to the ideals current in a given society, i.e., the democratic ideal "in which human dignity is the ultimate goal."[36] Williams excludes otherwise eligible factual causes which are too remote in law, and the standard of remoteness seemingly is the currently prevailing opinion of society.[37]

The closeness of Hall's and Wechsler's views are readily apparent if we keep in mind that Hall relied for his effectiveness limitation on Edgerton who used the words ". . . legal cause is justly attachable cause,"[38] and Ryu's view falls right in line therewith. Wechsler's words, "just bearing," probably refer to nothing but the relation of causation (in homicide) to the prevailing criminal law policies, including the public demand for retribution,[39] and Williams' view is distinguishable therefrom only by its retention of the proximate cause phraseology familiar from the days antedating our current systematization and codification efforts.

It was proper for the first aid squad to place him on the form. "It is true that the deceased would never have been lying on the form if he had not been injured, but this type of causation between the defendant's act and the death is too remote in law—the second injury does not follow from any dangerous condition created by the first injury." Williams found the causal imputation in Wrigley "too strict for present opinion."

Hart and Honoré criticize this approach.[40] "Such an approach," they say, "is open to one major criticism: it does not provide specifically for those cases where causal problems arise, because, although the accused did not intend it, another human action besides accused's is involved in the production of the proscribed harm."[41] One could go further by adding cases of causes precedent, concurrent or subsequent, and regardless of whether or not the intervenor is a human agent. The problem is the same. Moreover, might it not be argued that one who wishes to reduce causation to a concept of juridical certainty and exactitude is foolish if he introduces limitations of certainty and thereafter proceeds to destroy this certainty by superimposing an elastic concept which will destroy his earlier endeavors?

It is submitted that in many causation cases this last limitation may never come into play, most of them being disposable in terms of the previously stated restrictions. At least, such would seem to be borne out by the pattern of past causation cases. When the "effectiveness"[42] limitation does come into play, it is as a restriction rather than extension of causal imputation. Even so, it must be granted that in the really tough problem cases we are now confronted with the task of measuring with a yardstick other than that heretofore applied, a yardstick without precise markings. The "just effectiveness" limitation does rely on a human ability of measuring something like justness, the living law, the democratic ideal or the sense of injustice—and this latter probably describes the situation best, especially since it is negatively phrased.[43]

The vagueness so introduced certainly is no greater than that which we find in many other cases in which our law makes its judgment rest on an imprecise standard: reasonable searches and seizures, appreciation of right and wrong, etc. These vague standards of the penal law have gained meaning only through the dynamic process of judicial interpretation. They are left vague purposefully to permit adjustment to gradually changing community attitudes. But is causation such a concept which should be elastic to accommodate change? Can what was causation yesterday be no longer causation today? And if we subject the ultimate causation limitation, i.e., just effectiveness, to judicial and jury discretion, are we not in effect returning to precisely that which we are trying to leave behind as unscientific and lacking in juridical certainty and thus incapable of maximally achieving the utilitarian goals of penal law? "Effectiveness" is a vague concept, and the criterion by which "effectiveness" is to be judged is even more vague: justness, contemporary standards, etc.

Hart and Honoré feared that "nothing is gained by fusing these considerations of policy or expressions of moral judgment with the causal elements in responsibility."[44] For this Hall took them to task,[45] and I joined in the criticism.[46] This requires an explanation. It would lead too far to discuss all the precepts of axiological jurisprudence as against those of pure positivism and its kin. But whatever the merits of a policy-oriented or axiological jurisprudence, we are here confronted with a rather practical problem. Wechsler wrote a code, and Hall's theory also looks toward codification.[47] We have then, on the one hand, practical considerations of codification, and the codifier's viewpoint, as opposed to those of the case law advocate with his traditions, on the other. If Hart and Honoré could manage to list all the specific instances of effectiveness through which causal imputation must be limited, they might achieve greater certainty than those employing a short code formula, but surely, the public whose conduct is meant to be governed by the law would benefit little by 1,001 rules stored in the law library. It can benefit only by a relatively concise and simple standard of the law. If the only compromise possible between the aims of the codifiers and the aims of the common lawyer were the addition of a "just effectiveness" limitation upon a factual-teleological sine qua non causation concept, I should not hesitate to subscribe to this compromise. But is this the only way out of the dilemma?

While no suitable further limitation upon causal imputation suggests itself immediately, a limitation upon liability is quite obvious: the application of the mens rea concept.

[47] Compare Hall, "Revision of Criminal Law—Objectives and Methods," 33 Neb.L.Rev. 3 (1954), now Studies, op. cit., Chap. 14.

So far not much has been said about the relation of causation to mens rea. Mens rea, not having been included in the above causation concept, would seem to be no part thereof, i.e., not a check on imputability, but on criminal liability. But there is dispute on this point.

Hall, with whom up to this point I am otherwise in substantial agreement,[48] has chosen to include mens rea within his concept of the cause-in-law. " [T]he fact finding of a cause-in-law means the finding of a cause which is a substantial factor and includes certain voluntary conduct signifying a required mens rea." [49] I can subscribe to the proposition that voluntary conduct is a significant limitation upon cause-in-law. I differ with Professor Hall on the conclusion that such involves mens rea. As I discussed elsewhere in greater detail, mens rea " is the ethico-legal negative value of the deed (appearing in various legally prescribed forms)." [50] Thus, it is nothing but the defendant's awareness, of the required intensity, that what he is doing is not approved by the community—whether he likes it or not. (Some would add " potential awareness," to accommodate criminal negligence as a species of mens rea.) As far as I can see, mens rea in that common law sense is too far removed from causation to be part thereof by construction.

Of course, we have already used the forms of mens rea (broadly speaking, intention and recklessness) within our concept of causation as forms of the mental process. But such amounts to no more than a directing of the beacons of mens rea on the actus reus, true to an age-old tradition of the common law. (Whether we should therefore attach blame and impose liability without further ado is another matter.) I can see no justification for fusing mens rea, i.e., the awareness of wrong-doing, with the principle of causation. To the contrary, the separation of the two seems to entail certain advantages, quite apart from the advantage of clarity. The separation would preserve a causation concept which is equally applicable to both the cultural criminal law with its traditional felonies and misdemeanors, and to regulatory criminal law, where absolute liability frequently—though unfortunately—prevails.

In the former group of offenses, upon the fulfilment of the actus reus—including causation—and absent the proof of defenses on the part of the defendant, the presumption of mens rea, and thus the presumption of guilt, arises, i.e., D acted (produced harm) despite awareness of wrong-doing (substance of mens rea). The defendant, in fact, is now proven guilty, for he cannot claim that he believed in the innocence of killing a human being or setting fire to a dwelling. But the guilt disappears upon a showing that he acted under bona fide error or ignorance of fact, under duress, necessity, in self-defense, etc., which wipe out the awareness of wrong-doing.

If, however, the offense is one of so-called absolute liability, then his belief in the lawfulness of his acting and causing, although justifiable and bona fide, is as immaterial as his error of fact, etc., i.e., criminal liability needs no mens rea in such cases. Only causation must be proven. If, now, causation were merely the first part of a multi-part mens rea concept, we would arrive at a possible absolute liability which dispenses even with the causation concept.[51] While a few cases have gone that far, it can hardly be said that these illgotten offsprings of judicial thought, or lack thereof, represent the law of the land. The Model Penal Code, unfortunately, would sanction this practice in part, i.e., by limiting causation in absolute liability offenses to a causa sine qua non, and it has properly been severely criticized for doing so.[52]

It would seem to follow that causation must be kept, as it always has been, separate and apart from mens rea; though, for the establishment of criminal liability only the establishment of mens rea after the establishment of conduct, causation and harm, can make for a sound law. I am happy to note that Hart and Honoré also consider mens rea apart from the causation issue,[53] as seems to be the general position of the Model Penal Code.[54]

The principle of mens rea constitutes indeed a most necessary corrective for the imposition of criminal liability. Unfortunately, I [51] Vice versa, by arguing that mens rea is part of causation, specifically that in explicitly requiring the "causing" of the harm the legislature meant to require mens rea, one might succeed in narrowing the area of useless and harmful absolute liability. This would be a demonstration by a reductio ad absurdum, which may well be successful. Edwards may have been so motivated in Mens Rea in Statutory Offenses, Chap. 6 (1955). But see Hart and Honoré, op. cit., at 326–333, differing from Edwards.

[54] This requires an explanation. My guess is based on this: In treating of sine qua non causation, the statement may be found that the draft "proceeds upon the view that problems of this kind ought to be faced as problems of the culpability required for conviction and not as problems of 'causation.'" American Law Institute, op. cit., at am unable to see how it can possibly lessen the harshness of many cases in which there simply is no mens rea problem but seemingly only a causation problem, e.g., the Pennsylvania felony-murder cases, the rail gang case and Poor Richard's Case.

Although, up to this point, the problem of causation has not yet been satisfactorily solved, a summary of findings is called for. The current American scholarly position on causation appears to be this:

Within the criminal law, an event (harm) is imputable to a perpetrator's conduct, when it is joined thereto by causation. Causation exists when:

1. but for the conduct, the harm would not have occurred;
2. provided, that the harm was actually purposed or foreseen as certain [or, possibly, entirely of the same nature as that purposed or foreseen], for intentional offenses—or, within the awareness of risk [or, possibly, entirely of the same nature as that risked], for offenses of recklessness; and
3. provided further, that the conduct was effective, i.e., not too accidental in producing the harm, especially with relation to other factors, to have a just bearing on imputability,[55] justness being determined by reference to prevailing community standards, which might be expressed in terms of legal precedents.

There is substantial agreement among American scholars, who have studied the problem, on this concept of causation. But I personally reject the third limitation in the present form as unsuitable to solve the problem in a sound scientific manner. There is some disagreement among scholars on the place of mens rea in relation to causation. The view is here advanced that the establishment of a cause-in-law in accordance with the above formula does not entail any consideration of mens rea. But while causation makes for imputability of harm to conduct, only the further consideration of mens rea makes for ultimate liability.

132. This may be an acceptable short-cut way of stating that mens rea is a matter separate and apart from causation, and the further cause qualification through the teleological element does not in and of itself make causation a matter of "culpability." Completely unclear remains the effort to make subs. (1) sound as if it covered the ordinary case (only mechanical, i.e., sine qua non causation) and as if the introduction of the teleological element is merely an afterthought, in subs. (2), i.e., "when purposely or knowingly causing a particular result is a material element of an offense." It is submitted that at common law intention (purposefulness or knowledge) is always required, and the rule can be varied only by express exceptions. Thus, it might have been better to raise the mechanical and the teleological element to equal rank.

[55] The Model Penal Code uses the words "actor's liability": American Law Institute, op. cit., § 2.03. I would prefer saving the term liability to cover the aggregate of conduct, causation, harm and mens rea.

II. Civil Law

While paying due homage to the Model Penal Code draft, Hart and Honoré understandably expressed their preference for the " common sense " approach, which has marked past American (and British) judicial practice in the field of causation (and elsewhere), though they do, obviously, insist on reconciliation of inconsistencies which, after all, need not exist. The final part (III) of their superb study is devoted to a presentation of Continental law on causation, especially in criminal law. Theirs is the second such study, after Ryu's pioneering performance.[56] Hart and Honoré managed well in treating an elaborate and complicated piece of Continental legal theory, and even succeeded in showing, in essence, that stripped of its doctrinal jargon, some Continental doctrine supports the very common sense approach which our courts have practised and which Hart and Honoré prefer, while probably the rest of it does not seem to point to a more suitable solution.[57]

The following comparative treatment of the subject-matter cannot aim at duplicating Ryu's and Hart and Honoré's splendid description of foreign theory. I can accept both studies in toto for purposes of this inquiry.[58] Nevertheless, I feel compelled to restate as much of civil law theory as is necessary to demonstrate the evolution of the causation theory in civil law countries. Moreover, I deemed it necessary to go beyond Ryu's and Hart and Honoré's description of foreign law in an effort to demonstrate that Continental theory started with rather different premises and today, indeed, is quite dissatisfied with the so-called common sense approaches in their variegated garbs, that Continental practice feels uneasy about them, that theory has ultimately turned away from them and returned to nearly the same premises with which it began, and that these premises are kin to, if not in large part identical with, current American scholarly thinking on causation. Beyond that, it will appear that the new Continental approach suggests answers to our "ultimate limitation" puzzle which are totally consonant with the basic structure of our common law of crimes.

The historical beginning

Many aspects of Continental criminal theory are directly traceable to Anselm von Feuerbach, the great Bavarian codifier and theorist of the early nineteenth century. And so we find that with respect to causation it was von Feuerbach who raised causation from the level of obscurity to that of theoretical-conceptional refinement. In his famous treatise he treated of causation in connection with intention and negligence. Finding no problem with the cases in which a defendant wants to achieve a certain result and does so by setting in motion whatever he deems necessary therefor, Feuerbach solved the problem of the risk taker in similar fashion. Where a defendant engages in a risky activity, aware that any one of several consequences may follow, any such consequence which does follow is imputable to him as within his intention.[59] Implied in this recognition are the causation elements of the conditio sine qua non and of foreseeability, of a degree corresponding to the required form of guilt, or nearly so, i.e., intention in its various forms and, possibly, negligence.[60] This basic theory was further developed in Mittermaier's edition of von Feuerbach's treatise, where we find express elaboration of these fundamental recognitions.[61] Mittermaier made it clear that remote consequences are not imputable to the actor, as not within his foreseeability, direct consequences are imputable as caused intentionally, and those risked may be imputable as having been caused through criminal negligence.[62]

This first Continental doctrine of criminal causation does indeed come close to modern American thinking on causation, as discussed in Part I. For reasons which need not be elaborated upon here, this psychologized criminal causation theory of von Feuerbach–Mittermaier did not gain recognition in the German Reich. Nearly from the outset, the scholars and courts of the Reich attempted to keep causation strictly apart from anything smacking of mens rea. So great, indeed, was the belief in the magic of mens rea that, so it was thought, causation could be handled strictly on an objective basis, since mens rea would provide the necessary corrective—and the result would be perfect justice!

The objective theory of causation

Throughout the Reich, causation was regarded as a condition precedent to the determination of guilt, mens rea, and thus criminal liability.[63] The causation inquiry was viewed as a strictly objective matter. Absent the finding of objective causation—we would call it factual causation—a trial court could never even reach the issue of mens rea and the case would have to be dismissed.[64]

There was a variety of versions of the objective theory of causation[65]:

1. The theory of condition[66]

The theory of condition was formulated and advocated by the Austrian Glaser[67] and the German von Buri.[68] It corresponds in all significant respects to our Anglo-American sine qua non theory[69]: every condition which cannot be imagined absent without a corresponding failure of the result, is a necessary condition or cause for the production of the harm. The theory was adequately explained by Hart and Honoré and needs not much elaboration here.[70]

This theory has been the favorite of the German Supreme Court in criminal matters.[71] The Spanish Supreme Court has followed suit.[72] Steadfastly it has maintained that the causal nexus is not impaired or altered by any pre-existing conditions, like the pathological condition of the victim [73]; predispositions,[74] or the physical constitution of the victim [75]; nor is it affected by any concomitant or related subsequent events, such as lack of medical treatment,[76] supervening causes like tetanus,[77] pneumonia,[78] or gangrene.[79]

Of the relatively few foreign penal codes with express provisions on causation, the Italian Penal Code adopted the condition theory:

Article 40: No one may be punished in respect of an act deemed by the law to be an offence, if the injurious or dangerous event upon which the existence of the offence depends is not the consequence of his act or omission. Not to prevent an event, which it is legally obligatory to prevent, is equivalent to causing it.

Article 41: The concurrence of pre-existing or simultaneous or supervening causes, even though independent of the act or omission of the guilty person, does not exclude the relation of causality between the act or omission and the occurrence.

Supervening causes exclude the relation of causality only when they have been by themselves sufficient to determine the occurrence. In this case, if the act or omission previously committed constitutes of itself an offense, the punishment prescribed in respect of it shall be applied.

The preceding provisions shall also apply when the pre-existing or simultaneous or supervening cause consists of the unlawful act of another person.[80]

The Brazilian Penal Code likewise adopted the condition theory. Its Article 11 deals with subsequently intervening causes. No distinction is made between causes and conditions, and everything which actively contributes to the result is regarded as a cause, regardless of the weight of the causal contribution.[81]

The condition theory, though widely accepted in various jurisdictions, has been subjected to much criticism.[82] Its major defect lies in the extension of causal imputation ad infinitum, flowing from the very nature of phenomenal conditions which succeed one another in an unlimited sequence. It is the establishment of a limit which creates the major problem for the proponents of this theory. The refusal of this theory to accept, with rare exceptions, interruptions of the causal chain either through the voluntary intervention of a third party or through the occurrence of abnormal or incidental events, or of grossly negligent acts, has rendered its application unreasonably rigid. The rigorous application of this theory tends to produce unjust decisions of sometimes monstrous dimensions, especially in cases of result-qualification, as in Anglo-American law under the felony-murder doctrine. To demonstrate the point, suppose that A inflicted a blow upon B which caused him serious injuries. B is taken to the hospital. While there, a fire breaks out in which B suffocates. A is considered the author of the suffocation death, for if A had not injured B, the latter would not have been brought to the hospital in which he died. Binding reduced this theory ad absurdum by arguing the necessity of punishing for adultery not only the man who sleeps with the woman and the woman, but also the carpenter who made the bed.[83]

To overcome this logically boundless extension of effect imputations, and to avoid the use of arbitrary limitations so as to prevent at least the most flagrant injustice, a number of more refined objective theories have been developed with the aim of singling out from the total set of causes, the one cause which really matters, the real cause. All these subsequent theories admit, of course, that the "but for" test must be satisfied in any event, but their claim is that a particular cause is so outstanding as to qualify as cause alone. Of these theories, the following have become prominent:

2. The theory of the most effective cause

According to this theory, propounded by Birkmeyer,[84] Reinach[85] and others, the judge has to select from all causes which contributed toward the creation of the result that cause which ranked foremost.[86] If this cause is the act of the defendant, the judge must consider it the legally sufficient cause and impute the harm to him.[87] All other causes then become legally irrelevant. This theory found its critics as well and remained without substantial influence on adjudication. Its greatest weakness was, of course, its failure to provide a standard for the determination of the most effective cause.[88]

Among the followers of this theory is the Argentine Court of Appeals which labels the segregated cause the " direct cause." [89]

3. The theory of preponderance

According to Binding, the really relevant cause is the last or ultimate cause, because it is this which breaks the equilibrium between the positive and negative conditions of the result. Binding theorized that in the external world there are always two kinds of conditions which oppose each other. Given a natural course, they are in an equilibrium. " To cause a change is to change the equilibrium between the conditions which impede change and those which tend to produce it. . . ." [90] Thus, he who alters the balance either in favor of the negative or the positive is deemed to have caused the result. Binding, who, incidentally, rejected the doctrine of sine qua non and reduced the question of causation to a practical juridical problem distinct from that of philosophy, came close to making his theory center on the forms of perpetration, i.e., intent to produce the harm or reckless or negligent production thereof.

Indeed, the next logical progression in the further development of causation theories toward greater sophistication was bound to be the introduction of subjective factors.

[86] Thus allowing the judge full and unfettered discretion in determining the causal quality of a concrete event, Birkmeyer, op. cit., at 18.

[87] But if two or more acts contributed to an equal extent, each will be regarded as a cause. See Hart and Honoré, op. cit., 388.

The objective-subjective theories of causation

Besides the peculiar French theory of proximate cause, discussed by Ryu [91]—not identical with our Anglo-American theory of like designation—the best-known objective-subjective theory of causation is the theory of adequate causation.

1. The theory of adequate causation [92]

The theory of adequate causation came as a thorough reform of the proximate cause theory. It was conceived by a natural scientist, the Freiburg Professor Von Kries [93]—who relied to some extent on the preliminary studies of von Bar—and was propagated by Merkel, Thon, Helmer, Rümelin and Liepman.[94] Radbruch was its ardent supporter.[95] While consistently applied by the German Federal Supreme Court in tort cases,[96] it was only infrequently resorted to in criminal matters,[97] and recently rejected by the new German Supreme Court as "implying the inclusion of a guilt element in causation." [98]

This theory solves the causality problem by posing the question: what were the facts known to the actor, from which he must be presumed to have made—i.e., has made, or ought to have made—a probability calculation as to the likelihood of causing the harmful result? [99] While operating with a presumption, which always carries a danger with it, this theory has the advantage of a more subjectivistic evaluation of the causal relations, as opposed to the strictly objectivistic conditio sine qua non theory.

The theory attributes the quality of cause only to that condition which is generally appropriate to produce a given result, i.e., only to the adequate condition of the result, as propounded by von Bar.[1] It is not sufficient for the condition to produce the result in the concrete case, but it is further necessary that in all cases abstractly possible such result would probably follow in accordance with a judgment passed on the basis of the general physical laws. To qualify a condition as cause "two kinds of knowledge are required: knowledge of the particular facts ('ontological knowledge') and knowledge of the pertinent general laws of nature ('nomological knowledge'). The latter supplies the basis for the judgment as to whether a particular condition was 'adequate' to produce the particular effect." [2]

Several of the state courts in what is now the Federal Republic applied the theory with greater frankness in the first post-war years, e.g., Dec.Sup.Ct.Heidelberg, of 7–24–1947, with comment, Engisch, 3 S.J.Z. 207 (1948).

This theory admits of the existence of concurrent or pre-existent causes which in the normal course of analogous events are not derivable from the action of the perpetrator. When these concur it is said that the causal nexus is interrupted. Thus, the victim of of car accident who dies in a hospital fire is not a victim of an event regularly encompassed within car accidents; the event produced was not adequate to cause death by fire and its author therefore is not responsible therefor. The hospital fire is a concause which interrupted the relation between the car accident and the death of the victim. However, the endeavor to establish an unfailing "routine course of events in analogous situations" is a mental feat of no mean dimensions.

There are several varieties of this theory, each one using a different standard for judging the "routine" question.

(a) Von Kries maintains that we should imagine ourselves in the position of the author of the act and should consider all circumstances which he knew or should have known when commencing the act. The theory has been objected to by those cherishing clear-cut theories as introducing the subjective element of knowledge into the field of causation and bringing the latter within the orbit of guilt.[3]

(b) Rümelin assumes that adequacy must be wholly determined by a judicial retroactive prognosis on the basis of all knowledge available at the time of adjudication, considering all the circumstances which a normal person ought to have foreseen. Knowledge

[2] Ryu, op. cit., 791–792. Ryu subscribes to this theory to some extent, ibid. at 798, as, indeed, does the common law.

is projected back to the time of the act and the question is posed what prognosis should the actor reasonably have made had he then had such knowledge.[4]

(c) Traeger suggests as the basis of judgment the knowledge of the conditions which could be observed at the time of the act, or of the effect, by the keenest observer in the light of total experimental knowledge.[5]

All versions are definitely subjective in relating the causation issue to foresight or foreseeability. Neither, it is submitted, actually incorporates mens rea fragments into the causation concept.

(d) Radbruch's theory of adequate causation: Viewed from the legislative point of view, Radbruch's theory of adequate causation is interesting in suggesting a way to cut down on possible arbitrary findings that a defendant did or could foresee the consequences of his conduct. Radbruch synthesized the theory as a problem of the proximity of causal nexus between forbidden conduct (cause) and harm (effect). Thus, the closer the ordinary physical nexus between unlawful conduct and harm, the smaller is the problem of imputation, i.e., the psychological aspect of causation. The problem becomes more difficult the further the legislator has removed the possible or envisaged harm from the prohibited conduct. For example: the law declares a result Z undesirable (harm). Defendant has engaged in conduct A which has brought about result Z. Let us presume that it can be established by experience or experiment that in one-fourth of the cases of conduct A the result has been X. The adequate causation theory would view X adequately caused by A. Let us presume further that experience or experiment also shows that in one-fourth of all X results Z will develop out of X. Again, Z would have been adequately caused by X. But it follows that conduct A produces result Z, the harm, only in one-sixteenth of the cases, thus no longer adequately. The legislator who wishes to outlaw Z should therefore not prohibit conduct A. And if a defendant produces Z by conduct A, even if A is not specifically prohibited, he should not be deemed to have caused (i.e., adequately caused) Z.[6]

The theory of adequate causation thus has approached the realm of knowledge, by making causality dependent on the amount of actual or potential awareness or foreseeability of the consequences. Knowledge is also the smallest common denominator of mens rea, but by using the mere value-free forms of mens rea, the substance of mens rea and therefore an inquiry into the guilt of the defendant, after the harm has been imputed to him, remains a separate matter.

2. Löffler's theory of mathematical probability

Löffler, pioneer of the German mens rea concept, had developed a theory of causation which relied even further on the actual or potential knowledge of the defendant.[7] Löffler combined the concepts of knowledge and duty, creating a causality theory which depended on both these concepts. With him the forms of mens rea became degrees of intensity of knowledge and duty. But by incorporating duty into the causation concept, Löffler effected a merger of causation and mens rea. An example can best demonstrate this theory. The question is: Is a shipowner guilty of murder or manslaughter or neither (in other words, which form, if any, of mens rea did he have) when he sends an unseaworthy ship on a voyage, thereby endangering the lives of the passengers and the crew? Let a be the degree of valuation of the protected legal interest (lives). Let $3/4$, $1/2$ and $1/4$ be the probability of loss of the lives. Risk, then, is the intensity of knowledge about the probability of loss of lives. The amount of risk will correspond to the form of mens rea, that is, mens rea is nothing but a known or knowable degree of likelihood of relation between cause and effect, i.e., risk.

If $r = \frac{3a}{4}$, the risk is high, coming close to intention, undoubtedly amounting to recklessness.

If $r = \frac{a}{2}$, the risk is medium, undoubtedly constituting negligence.

If $r = \frac{a}{4}$, the risk is low, and perhaps beyond the recognition of the law, perhaps it ought to be considered carelessness.

The drawing of the borderline between the areas of liability and no liability, as well as between the various degrees of liability, is an arbitrary one. It depends on a (usually legislative) balancing between the protection of the risk-creating interest—out of societal utility—and the absolutely protected higher interest (i.e., lives, in the above example). The law has a certain interest in permitting any socially useful activity, even at the risk of the occurrence of some loss. The higher the law's (the state's) interest in the dangerous activity the more lenient it will be in excusing harm to absolutely protected rights (e.g., lives) incident to the activity.[8] The standard is, therefore, an arbitrary one, but every infringement of absolute interests which is below these standards is beyond the recognition of the criminal courts.[9] Not only may these standards vary in different societies but even within the same society the standard may change within a very short period of time. For example—to get back to our ship case—while perhaps normally a shipowner may not send his vessel over the high seas when the risk of loss is $\frac{a}{4}$, or more—otherwise he would be liable for homicide, if loss occurs—in times of national emergency he may be permitted to take a risk as high as $\frac{3a}{4}$, and not be liable if loss occurs.

This will indicate the boundary between liability and no liability under Löffler's theory. The forms of mens rea, here in the nature of degrees of knowledge or foreseeability, will then be distributed over the area of intensity of knowledge in which liability is not excluded. Thus, intention will correspond to a 100 per cent. knowledge or foreseeability; carelessness, the lowest form of mens rea (if subjective), will correspond to the agreed lowest intensity of knowledge or foreseeability.[10]

Löffler's use of the term " knowledge " is not particularly fortunate. At times it is apparent that he is more concerned with knowledge in the sense of foreseeability of the events on account of knowledge, which by use of the proper terminology I have tried to make clear in the above. Knowledge itself is merely the basis of foreseeability. Foreseeability depends on at least two kinds of knowledge, i.e., the knowledge of the plain facts, and the knowledge of the causal consequences that follow a certain course of conduct under these facts. Knowledge of the laws of physics, for instance, will be part of the second sphere of knowledge involved. Löffler himself wished to use a community standard for both kinds of knowledge, unless the actor, by having been licensed to perform special activities, was duty bound to have a higher standard of knowledge than the "ordinary reasonable man," which is an inherently sound approach.[11]

[8] E.g., mining, test piloting, etc.

[9] The classic maxim of the Roman criminal law, minima non curat praetor, indicates that anything too remote, too insignificant for employment of the state machinery, lies beyond the recognition of the criminal judge.

[10] Löffler, op. cit., 5 et seq. An interesting point for further inquiry would be the reciprocal relation between the absolute value of the protected interest and the degree of foreseeability which will suffice for liability. Thus, life, as the highest value on the scale of values, is protected by the lowest possible degree of foreseeability, carelessness. Property, which ranks somewhat lower on the scale of values, does not have an equal protection, viz., the careless or negligent taking away of the property of another ordinarily is not a violation of public law. Inconsistent with this pattern of reciprocal relations between foreseeability or awareness and form of liability, is the position of many regulatory offenses, clearly interests of the lowest order, which require the lowest degree of foreseeability or awareness for liability, rather than the highest, as theoretically they ought to. See Binding, Die Normen und ihre Übertretung, II, 1195 et seq. (2nd ed., 1914-16); contra, Röder, Schuld und Irrtum in Justiz- und Verwaltungsstrafrecht, 156 (1938).

Löffler's theory is to be classified as a theory of objective-subjective causation. It is not unlike Beling's theory which holds that "intention" has the ingredient of the actor's "imagination" or "realization" that the harmful result will occur.[12]

While it cannot be denied that a combination of the concepts of causation and guilt, as attempted by Löffler, entails a number of advantages, there have been more voices against than for the combination.

3. Theory of relevancy [13]

In seeking to limit the scope of the conditio sine qua non concept, and without mixing causation and mens rea, the theory of relevancy optimistically asserts that the only relevant limitation upon sine qua non causation is to be found in the penal norm itself. The statute, so it is said, gives us the clue as to what conditions are or should be deemed relevant as causes, and these, therefore, vary from statute to statute.

The most vigorous and original exponent of this theory is the Nestor of German criminal theory, the Munich professor Mezger.

[11] Example of the community average of knowledge: Every man knows that a stone held in hand will drop to the ground if let loose and that the stone will hit the ground, or an object thereon, with considerable impact if the distance travelled by the stone is large. He may not know that free fall is determined by the law of gravity $g=980$ cm./sec./sec., nor does the law insist on such knowledge. But if D drops a stone from a fifth-floor window upon a man on the street below, he ought to appreciate that bodily injury or death is likely to occur, depending on the weight of the stone. There is, therefore, both factual and teleological causality in this case. See Rümelin, Das Verschulden im Straf- und Zivilrecht, 10 et seq. (1907).

Mezger begins his causal inquiry with the conditio sine qua non quality and raises the relevancy question thereafter. Mens rea is kept strictly apart from causation. He avoids even the use of the bare forms of mens rea in the belief that the norm of the code will provide the necessary limitation upon the otherwise limitless sine qua non imputability.[14] Thus, the teleological aspects of imputability are rather de-emphasized. But instead of basing liability on only two (plus) major principles of criminal law, the relevancy theory bases it on three (plus): (1) the causal nexus of the voluntary conduct with the result; (2) the culpability (mens rea) of the perpetrator; (3) the normativity of the total occurrence, i.e., as far as causation is concerned, the juridical relevancy of the causal connection for each different offense, or, the answer to the question whether the causal nexus is relevant for the attribution of criminal liability to the perpetrator, in accordance with the structure of the penal norm.

To demonstrate this theory in operation, Jiménez de Asúa related the case of the devoted mother who suffered from a grave cardiac ailment. Her death was purposefully produced by her son who had caused a death notice about himself to be sent to her, fully expecting that her weak heart would not survive the shock of the message.[15] Jiménez de Asúa maintains that the mode of killing resorted to, terrorizing, is not of the type envisaged by the penal norm, i.e., physical death causation. Whatever moral culpability the degenerate son may have incurred, whatever social menace he may be, all this is irrelevant to his liability under the murder statute. Although, objectively—factually—speaking, causation and mens rea are present, the prosecution would fail for lack of normativity.[16]

One cannot help a certain feeling of frustration about this reasoning. After all, the code speaks of "killing," or "causing death," without specifying the mode of killing, and if death through causing fright, shock, fear or any other emotional state does in fact not lead to criminal liability in a particular jurisdiction, that is so only because this is what courts have said—usually because they regarded death from emotional causes as too "remote" a consequence.

Might this theory not throw us back to the frustratingly vague theory of proximate cause?

Obviously, normativity is an element of all criminal liability in Anglo-American law and virtually the entire civil law, under the postulate of the principle of legality. As such it is also applicable to causation.[17]

The finalistic theory of conduct and causation [18]

After von Feuerbach and Mittermaier had failed to create a readiness among the European judiciary to embrace a thoroughly psychological (factual-teleological) causation concept, and after similar failures by later scholars who drew smaller or larger slices of the mens rea into causation, it was a bold effort indeed for anybody to make still a further attempt. But after the Second World War the conditions in Germany were propitious for any attempt to abandon anything smacking of pure positivism which, rightly or wrongly,[19] was blamed for the excesses of Nazi Germany.[20] A theory which would succeed in abandoning the valueless conditio sine qua non theory of causation, and which would succeed further in creating a limitation upon factual causation in terms of, or consonant with, the abstract sense of injustice, however expressed, was to stand a good chance of universal acceptance. An attempt to do just that was made by Professor Welzel, then of Göttingen University. His theory became known as the theory of finality of conduct.[21]

In brief, Welzel and his followers, the "finalists," argued that it is senseless to look at human conduct as if it were a phenomenon in itself and—for purposes of judging conduct, even under a given penal norm—to look at causation with its results as if it were a matter wholly separate and apart from conduct. They posited,

[17] Ryu, op. cit., 800, uses it skilfully as an ingredient of his own causation theory. "The general theory of criminal law predicates responsibility upon the existence of a criminal 'act.' . . . What constitutes a criminal act depends on specific legal provisions. . . ."

[18] Not discussed by Hart and Honoré. Ryu, while not employing the term, nor relying on Welzel in his causation study, nevertheless has approved of the finalistic theory. In earlier writings he expressly professed essential agreement with Welzel. Ryu and Silving, "Error Juris: A Comparative Study," 24 U.of Chi.L.Rev. 421, 448-458 (1957).

therefore, that all human conduct is purposed and thus "finalistic," i.e., purpose-minded or result-directed, and that one cannot possibly keep causation in law apart from purpose or its equivalents.[22]

The finalists built on previous similar attempts to absorb the forms of mens rea into the causation concept, i.e., intention, recklessness and the like.

Finality may be regarded as a consciously-purposefully setting in motion of a cause-and-effect reaction for the purpose of achieving a certain result, in itself constituting a harm, or producing such a harm as a side effect and not minding it—in any event, anticipating a harm. The theory is, therefore, based on a thought anticipation of the result and its incidental consequences. Finality, thus, consists of (a) the perpetrator's purpose; (b) the means used to accomplish this purpose; and (c) the incidental consequences connected with the use of the means. These factors enable a perpetrator to arrive at the correct thought anticipation of the legally relevant results, provided he does not labor under error or ignorance of law or fact. Knowledge is, therefore, the guiding star of a thought anticipation or, as it is in practice, the valuation of others (judge or jury) of the perpetrator's thought anticipation.[23]

Two examples may explain the concept of finality:

1. As to factual matter. A nurse gives a patient a morphine injection as a sedative. She does not know that the phial containing the morphine bears a wrong label, stating a less potent concentration. The finality of her act covers only the relief of the patient from unrest and pain, by giving a proper morphine injection. The death of the patient is a causal result, but not covered by the nurse's finality, since it is not within the nurse's purpose, nor in itself a means to accomplish the intended result (relief), nor is it an incidental consequence to the use of her means, within the realm of what could be foreseen with the knowledge of the facts at her command.[24] The finalists would conclude here that a finalistic act was lacking (there was no intention to kill, nor a risk-taking sufficient for negligent homicide), so that the harm is not imputable to the actor and liability cannot arise. A criminal charge failing already for want of finalistic causation, the question of mens rea does not even arise.

[23] It is generally agreed that a general community average of knowledge or knowability ought to be the standard of expectation. Compare note 11, supra, unless a person is engaged in a special activity or calling which imposes a duty of particular circumspection, and knowledge and observance of fact or special regulation upon him, whether by custom or by law, or unless a person happens to be in possession of particular knowledge.

2. As to legal matter. A merchant consults the local police commissioner whether a certain merchandising stunt would constitute a coupon raffle as prohibited by law. On the negative reply of the commissioner the merchant carries out the stunt. In proceedings instituted by the state's attorney, the court rules that the stunt does in fact constitute a prohibited coupon raffle. The merchant acted with finality as far as the act is concerned which amounted to the stunt; he did not act with finality as far as the legal consequences are concerned.[25] Hence, although the definitional elements of the crime of conducting a coupon raffle are effected, liability cannot attach for lack of mens rea, for any result not achieved by finality lacks mens rea.[26] The case must be reversed.

Negligence fits into the theory of finality, as negligence itself is nothing but the potential consideration of finality by the perpetrator, which, if it had been made, could and should have moved him not to undertake the commission of the act.[27]

It has been charged that under this theory the mens rea is even more separated from its degrees, i.e., intention and negligence, than under any previous theory. The main ingredient of mens rea, the actual or potential knowledge of facts and norms which make the desired act an unlawful one, and the wish to act in such a manner for the purpose of achieving the unlawful result, or not minding it, definitely remains unaffected. But mens rea is not so much any more the relation between the actor and his act, of which previous theories had spoken; rather, it is here the knowledge or knowability of a true value judgment itself.[28]

Finalism has not won the upper hand yet. A dogma battle is raging over the issue with an intensity hardly ever witnessed before in Germany. The principal remaining bone of contention is the question where to draw the borderline between causation and mens rea. Welzel has now made his position quite clear: "The criminal intention [the mens rea concept]—although a 'carrier' of the blame of guilt—is first of all an element of conduct." [29] This amounts to a recognition that after establishment of the conditio sine qua non quality of a given cause (D's conduct), the purpose or foreseeability in conducting oneself to achieve a certain result, must be considered as a limitation. Intention and recklessness, i.e., conscious risk-taking that a certain result might happen, are incorporated into the causation concept. They have been borrowed from the mens rea concept. The remaining substance of mens rea, i.e., its negative ethico-legal value,[30] appears almost incapable of separate existence and, therefore, has been annexed to, but not incorporated into, the causation concept.

[25] Negligence not being an issue under these circumstances.
[26] Under the facts indicated, and overruling prior Federal Supreme Court decisions, the new Ct.App.Oldenburg so held by dec. of 6-28-1950, 3 N.J.W. 795 (1950), under Penal Code, § 286.

Mezger, who bitterly opposed finalism, has now reached the point where even he speaks of causation as finalistic, i.e., goal directed or goal envisaging. But although, contra to Welzel, insisting that causation must be found within the specific normativity of the statute—not unlike the wording of the Model Penal Code [31]—he resists the incorporation of either form or substance of mens rea into causation, in opposition to Welzel and the Model Penal Code who rightly, in my opinion, use the mens rea forms as limitations upon factual causation within the causation concept itself. But one does not have to conclude with Welzel that the forms of mens rea are therefore entirely withdrawn from the mens rea concept. Quite to the contrary, after establishing the ethico-legally entirely flavorless fact that D has caused, by intention or conscious risk-taking,[32] harm X, it is now necessary to establish whether there was any guilt, mens rea, for such causing, and whether such guilt or mens rea was of the intensity or form required by the statute.[33] Under a properly constructed and properly handled penal system, the latter (mens rea) inquiry may indeed amount to an inquiry whether although D achieved the harm intentionally, as required by statute, he actually had full knowledge (tantamount to intentionally producing the harm, viz., a legal concept!) of the wrongfulness of his conduct. Thus, in United States v. Curtin,[34] the United States Court of Military Appeals ruled correctly that in an offense requiring intentional rather than reckless production of the harm, actual knowledge of the order violated is necessary and that not knowing the order by reason of culpable ignorance would at best be recklessness and could not suffice for intention liability. And in United States v. Palermo,[35] the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit correctly overruled the District Court for instructing the jury that the offense of wilful late tax payment may be committed " by a careless disregard whether or not one has the right so to act."

While, as these two decisions—and many others—indicate that American practice is turning away from a rigid application of the maxim ignorantia legis neminem excusat and toward a logical use of the principles of mens rea and causation,[36] the Model Penal Code does not take this ultimate step. Instead, although using forms of the mental process (causation) equivalent to the forms of mens rea, it prohibits all inquiries into the awareness of wrongfulness in so far as it depends on a knowledge of law.[37] But this is not of particular significance for purposes of the instant inquiry. What is important is the fact that the Model Penal Code does use forms of the mental process equivalent to the forms of mens rea in its theory of causation. It does not, like Welzel, merge practically all of mens rea with causation. Mezger is right in attacking Welzel for virtually incorporating the inquiry into the substance of mens rea, the awareness of wrongfulness, into the causation concept,[38] leaving mens rea little more than an objective value judgment imposed by others upon the perpetrator. As has been pointed out earlier, mens rea is more than the judgment of others that the defendant is blameworthy: " it is a community value of which the perpetrator knows the existence and that it will materialize [in the form of punishment] when the deed becomes known,"[39] " and this concept appears in a number of different forms,"[40] namely, intention, recklessness, etc., as to the quality (value) of the effect which D's conduct produces.[41]

It follows that, although Welzel is absolutely right in employing the forms of mens rea as forms of the mental process, which is part of actus reus, he goes too far in concluding that these very forms are no longer needed within the concept of mens rea. As I understand the Model Penal Code, it does not follow Welzel's error in this respect but, essentially, preserves the forms of mens rea on the one hand, while employing these very same forms as limitations upon, or part of, the causation concept within the actus reus, though, as said, it falls short in other respects.

In any event, it is now clear that the most recent and most advanced Continental theory of causation is in substantial agreement with the modern American approach, outlined in Part I. Both have abandoned the so-called common-sense approach and have created a factual-teleological causation theory which is much more in accord with logic than the so-called common-sense approach. But the finalistic causation theory does not speak of any limitation in terms of a separate requirement of effectiveness as judged by contemporary standards, whereas the American theory does. No such separate limitation is needed, the finalists assert, if the theory is properly applied. It remains to be established in the last part whether the finalists are correct. (Further necessary details of the finalistic theory will be supplied in context, infra.)

III. Testing the Modern Theory

The finalists, as indicated, proceed on the basis of the sine qua non inquiry. But it appears that they posit a formulation of the term sine qua non which solves both the problem of the effectiveness of the conduct as a causal factor, and the criterion of evaluation, though both solutions are not necessarily related.

1. "Cause" implies effectiveness, i.e., a necessarily bringing about of the result, or contributing thereto. If, therefore, what appeared as cause was neutralized or set at naught by subsequent events which of themselves are of judicial significance,[42] we are no longer concerned with it as cause, and this is a logical-factual, not an axiological question. The famous or infamous Lewis case may serve us to demonstrate the point:[43]

[41] Mueller, "On Common Law Mens Rea," op. cit., uses a more refined system of mens rea forms, i.e., commensurate, additional, adequate and independent forms of mens rea, which do not call for explanation in this context. See now Mueller, "Where Murder Begins," 2 N.H.B.J. 214 (1960).

The defendant inflicted a serious wound upon the decedent who subsequently terminated his own life by cutting his throat. There was no difficulty with the teleological element. The court held the defendant guilty under either of two hypotheses: (a) the decedent committed suicide (i.e., as a fully responsible agent); (b) the decedent was so crazed by the effects of the wound that he terminated his life as a result of and in such craze. In case (a), however, the defendant's conduct was not an effective cause. In fact, the defendant's efforts in producing death were frustrated by the decedent's fully responsible, i.e., juridically significant act, and the decedent's motives for terminating his life are quite immaterial, as motives usually are in criminal law. While the defendant is guilty of attempted murder, the completed crime fails for lack of effective causation. In case (b), on the other hand, the defendant's cause became effective and operative, though not precisely in the manner in which he envisaged it, which also is quite immaterial.[44]

The Wilson case is similarly solvable.[45] That case led to the murder liability of the husband who had shot his wife with a shot gun. The intention of the defendant was not discussed. If it was defendant's intention to kill, the teleological component of the test formula is satisfied. But death occurred only because the victim refused removal of the slug. That the defendant is morally guilty of murder, no one will contest, but whether he legally became guilty depends on whether his conduct qualifies as a true (i.e., effective) causa sine qua non, or whether it was rendered ineffective by a juridically significant event, i.e., neutralized.

(a) If the victim decided to end her miserable life (merely a possible motive) in full expectation of death as a result of the non-removal of the slug, she now becomes guilty of suicide by any [42] I submit that since our criminal law is based on the principle of legality, we are never concerned with anything not of legal significance, i.e., facts and factors not part of the definitional elements of an offense.

definition of that term, including the ancient common law definition.[46] Neither suicide nor accessoryship to suicide are punishable any longer. If the victim has thus consciously terminated her own life—that she used a tool supplied by her husband, the slug, makes no difference—the husband cannot be guilty of murder, but only of attempted murder. With respect to the death itself, the husband is no more liable than the razor blade manufacturer who produced the blade with which the decedent in Lewis cut his throat. Nor does it make any difference whether the weapon or tool is supplied lawfully or unlawfully. (The slug as a suicide tool might be said to have been supplied unlawfully!)

(b) The outcome would be different if the wife died in ignorance that rescue was easily possible. In that case the husband's conduct has resulted in fruition. That the slug did not produce death by loss of blood or the like, but, rather, by an acute purulent meningitis does not alter his liability. No perpetrator can ever predict the causal train in its most minute concrete details. While I must concede that if, under (a), the husband is found guilty of murder, he cannot complain, for the liability is just as he expected, it is nevertheless true that, logically speaking, it was not he who succeeded in terminating his wife's life, but, rather, it was the wife herself. The husband is nevertheless guilty of attempted murder.

With this caveat, on the meaning of cause as effective, i.e., not neutralized, cause, in mind, it is also easy to solve the (Benge) case of the railroad foreman who was found guilty of manslaughter.[47] The foreman's negligently reading the timetable and removing the tracks when it was improper to do so, clearly is a conditio sine qua non, a condition which cannot be imagined absent without failure of the result. But the question is: did the condition which the foreman interposed become effective, i.e., was it a cause to begin with? The answer is that it did not become effective or operative, by reason of the fact that the defendant foreman himself neutralized it—set it at naught—immediately upon creating it, by interposing safety measures fully capable of averting any harm. It took an independent causal constellation to produce the harm.[48] (The liability of engineer and flagman will be discussed below.)

2. The finalists have solved the problem of the evaluation once and for all in a general way which obviates the necessity of making separate individual inquiries in each particular case. This can be demonstrated by Poor Richard's Case, as presented with a variety of contributing causes.[49] We had assumed that all the actors (rider and superiors, scouts, quartermaster, officers) considered the possibility of the harm and acted nevertheless as they did. They would, therefore, incur liability for recklessness (there would be even less difficulty if negligence sufficed), provided, however, that the conduct of each is a sine qua non. Whether it is or not is a question of fact which can be simply answered by reference to the meaning of sine qua non. Much of our own confusion at common law stems from the fact that we have never fully realized that there are indeed two possible ways of defining the sine qua non formula:

(a) Conduct is causal if, without it, and considering all remaining actually present circumstances, the result would not have occurred.[50] Under this formula none of our defendants could be deemed to have caused the harm since, imagining the conduct of each one absent, successively, there still would remain a sufficient amount of activity amply sufficient in the aggregate to have produced the result. This sine qua non formula might recommend itself to a democratic society in which human dignity is a goal in itself.

(b) Of several causes which can be imagined absent alternatively but not cumulatively without failure of the result, each one is a conditio sine qua non.[51] Under this formula clearly all of our defendants would be deemed to have caused the result. This formula might recommend itself to societies with less stress on human dignity as a goal in itself.

It can be seen that after having made the original choice as to either of these two possible sine qua non formulas—a choice which our law has not made—the result achieved with the factual-teleological causation formula stands a good chance of winning the day through its independence from vague correctives.

One might wish to subject this new causation concept—the modern theory of causation—to a further test, for which the Benge case may serve us.[52] We are here no longer concerned with the foreman, whom previously I found not liable for lack of proper causation. The question now arises whether the engineer, or the flagman, or both, have caused the harm. The teleological element (probably a relatively objective foreseeability sufficient for manslaughter) gives us no trouble. The problem centers solely around the sine qua non requirement.

As to the flagman, under sine qua non formula (a), we must imagine the flagman's 460 yards shortage in moving ahead, absent, i.e., absent the negligent conduct in question, the flagman would stand at 1,000 yards. All other factors remain constant, i.e., the negligent engineer spots the flagman only when the engine is alongside the flagman. This gives the engineer exactly 1,000 yards to stop the train, and this the train can do in fact. The harm would not have resulted, but for the flagman's shortage in moving. The flagman's conduct was causal of the harm.

Similarly, under sine qua non formula (a), we must imagine the engineer's 500 yards shortage in spotting the flagman absent, which would mean that the engineer would have spotted the flagman at 1,040 yards, which would have given him ample time to stop the train. Without the engineer's negligent conduct in question, the harm would not have occurred. The engineer's conduct was causal.

In this particular case the same result of liability for both actors would follow under the more stringent sine qua non formula (b).

There is one limitation upon the causation formula of the finalists, as indeed there is on any other causation theory: Causation can never be viewed as an isolated principle. It functions, and can function only, in the entire body of criminal law, comprised of all the principles. If it is this which the relevancy theory of causation [53] meant when it required conformity with the penal norm as part of the causation concept, it certainly scored a valid point. This must be briefly demonstrated:

The King v. De Marny led to the conviction of a newspaper editor for "aiding and abetting the publication in England of obscene literature, and the sending through the post in England a packet the sending of which is prohibited by the Post Office (Protection)

[53] Text at note 13, p. 198, supra, for comparison.

Act, 1884."[54] The defendant had published in his newspaper advertisements offering books, catalogues and photographs for sale by the advertiser. His conduct was the sine qua non, under either formula, for the subsequent publication, mailing and dissemination in England of the materials in question. Moreover, it was proved that the defendant had knowledge that such unlawful dissemination, etc., would be the consequence of his conduct. Thus, the teleological element was present as well, i.e., the defendant acted "finally," with the result in mind. But is causation the only element on which criminal liability rests? No: The finding of causation is but one prerequisite for conviction, for unless mens rea —here scienter of the obscene nature of the disseminated publication—be established in addition, the crime is not complete. And so the court in effect held.

A difficult case, previously discussed in this paper, likewise led to an incorrect result because of the failure of the court to consider the case within the totality of criminal law principles and doctrines:

Root's conduct in agreeing to and engaging in a race with the decedent was causal in the sine qua non sense. If he consciously considered the decedent's death as possible or likely, he might be credited with the necessary recklessness for involuntary manslaughter. Causal imputation would seem to follow.[56] On closer analysis, however, criminal liability (though not causal imputation) would have to be excluded for reasons which have nothing to do with causation:

Neither suicide nor self-mutilation nor self-endangering acts are unlawful as such. Both actors committed a self-endangering act in concert. But co-principalship in a lawful self-endangering act cannot raise to unlawfulness what is lawful if done singly (barring application of the conspiracy concept). Nobody, legally speaking, is his brother's keeper, unless the law imposes a legal duty of care and protection. There was no such duty in the instant case. Truly, both have violated the traffic laws, and the survivor will be made liable for his violation. But homicide liability can follow therefrom only if we arbitrarily decree that every self-endangering act or every traffic offense resulting in death should constitute involuntary manslaughter. Such I do not understand to be the law. It follows that the decision in the Root case was wrong for reasons which have nothing to do with causation.

Lastly, we should test the modern causation theory on the challenging Pennsylvania felony-murder cases:

If causation were the only requirement for criminal liability, murder liability would have to be affirmed in these cases if, indeed, the defendants meant to inflict death or foresaw it as certain; manslaughter liability would seem to follow if the defendants merely took a gambler's risk that death might follow,[57] provided however, in either case, that the defendants' conduct would qualify as causa sine qua non. We have here a course of conduct constituting a psychological stimulation directed at the victim, or the police, to use deadly force. The defendants' conduct cannot be imagined absent without failure of the homicide. In effect, the defendants stimulated the killing of a co-felon or an innocent bystander, which act of killing constitutes justifiable homicide on the part of the robbery victim or police officer who fired the shot. The law provides that to incite, etc., another to commit a crime, amounts to accessoryship before the fact to that crime, if the other actually perpetrates the crime and the instigator is absent. Here, however, neither was the instigator absent, nor did the other commit a crime, for justifiable homicide is no crime. Since presence of the inciter makes for co-principalship, it might be argued that the police officer or the robbery victim are co-principals with the robbers. Not only is this an absurd suggestion, but it also fails technically for the reason that what police officer or robbery victim has committed simply is not criminal. The law, however, also provides that killing through intentional employment of an innocent agent makes for liability as a principal in the person who employed the innocent agent. But the defendants did not intentionally employ an innocent agent to procure human death. It follows that, under proper considerations of all the principles and doctrines of our criminal law, while the defendants have caused death, they are not guilty of murder—except under an inflated felony-"death" (not even felony-"murder") concept. Obviously, they are guilty of attempted murder.

[57] But under the archaic wide-open felony-murder doctrine, all teleological considerations would be immaterial and murder liability would follow as a matter of course if robbery coincides with death. Pennsylvania has such a statute or, at least, the majority of the court interpreted it that way. See Musmanno J., dissenting, in Commonwealth v. Bolish, 391 Pa. 550, 563; 138 A. 2d 447, 454 (1958).

Summary

I hope to have shown that it is no longer necessary to operate in criminal law with causation either in an intuitive fashion, under the so-called common sense approach, or to subject each causal inquiry to an evaluation whether or not a particular causal imputation would comport with fair play, democratic ideals, or any other such standard. Causation is a juridical concept, the structure of which could here be developed on the basis of comparative study.

The principle of causation comes into play most conspicuously in offenses which require a specific harm in the nature of a physically observable detriment, as in homicide, arson and the like. But it is also applicable to offenses in which seemingly conduct alone constitutes a prohibited harm. Under strict application of the legality principle, however, it has repeatedly been held that even in these offenses liability does not attach unless the conduct is productive of that actual harm for the prevention of which the legislature had passed the statute.[58]

For any conduct to qualify as a juridical cause in the production of criminal harm, it is necessary that it fulfil two basic requirements, (1) its nature as a causa sine qua non, (2) the teleological element.

Ad (1). (a) It is necessary that the conduct be a conditio sine qua non, i.e., an element which cannot be imagined absent without failure of the result (harm). There are two ways of expressing the sine qua non formula:

(i) conduct is causal if, without it, and considering all remaining actually present circumstances, the concrete result would not have occurred;

(ii) of several causes which can be imagined absent alternatively but not cumulatively without failure of the result, each one is a conditio sine qua non of the result.

Formula (ii) is more inclusive than formula (i). I do not think that it is possible to make a preference in utilitarian (deterrent) terms as between the two formulas. While formula (ii) caters more to retributism, it also caters more to resocialization in subjecting to detention a larger number of potentially dangerous persons. Formula (i) recommends itself more to a democratic society willing to take an occasionally uncompensated (by punishment) loss for the sake of greater protection of human dignity and liberty. In any event, a policy decision will have to be made only on this level, and it is a general policy decision which, once made, will obviate the necessity of making individual policy decisions in each and every separate causal inquiry.

(b) The quality of being a cause implies effectiveness. Conduct and causal chains which are arrested, neutralized, set at naught, cannot qualify as causal. Since effectiveness inheres in the concept of a cause, it is not necessary, logically speaking, to constantly reaffirm the requirement of effectiveness as a separate causation element. The Latin noun conditio does not sufficiently express the effectiveness quality of the legally relevant cause. It is proposed, therefore, to describe the legally relevant cause as the causa sine qua non.[59]

It should be observed that the causa sine qua non is not identical with a mechanical or physical cause. It may indeed be a strictly physical-mechanical causal chain which qualifies as a causa sine qua non, but it may also be a psychological or psycho-physical nexus.

Ad (2). Conduct is a phenomenon which man has wrested from the blind causal occurrences of nature. It is purposed and goal-directed. This means that the human psyche maintains a teleological nexus to the outside world. The norm of law tells us of what intensity this teleological nexus with the legally relevant product of conduct, namely harm, must be. In crimes of intention the nexus must be that of purpose, intention or full expectation, wish, awareness, etc., that the effect will be produced. In crimes of recklessness a gambler's consciousness or awareness of great risk of the consequences will suffice. In crimes of negligence even less intensity is required, though I made no effort to solve the problem of negligent criminality in this paper.

Since mortal beings cannot predict the precise concrete causal trains of their actions, it is not necessary that the harm was brought about in precisely the manner envisaged. Subject to the general principles of criminal law, and in accord with the causation formula here advocated, deviations from the envisaged causal train are immaterial.

It must be remembered that causation, as one principle of the criminal law, like the principles of conduct and harm, can function only within the totality of the principles and doctrines of the criminal law. It is incapable of isolated and detached existence. Thus, merely by way of example, the doctrines of accessoryship, the principle of legality and the principle of mens rea constitute a check on causation, since they all come into play before causal imputability can lead to criminal liability.

The check which mens rea constitutes on criminal liability is of particular significance. While the forms of mens rea, broadly speaking intention and recklessness, are duplicated as forms of the mental process, thus as ingredients of the actus reus, their function as mens rea forms is unimpeded. They must remain as yardsticks for measuring the required intensity of the awareness of wrongfulness, and awareness of wrongfulness is the very essence or substance of mens rea and always has been.

In fine. The concept of causation as here developed is by no means a novel and original one. It is based on the scholarly achievements of those who have previously worked thereon—our courts and a long line of scholars on both sides of the Atlantic, to all of whom I am indebted, Professors Hall, Hart, Honoré, Ryu, Wechsler, Welzel, Williams and many others, all of whose proposals I cannot accept in toto, but who have significantly contributed to the causation concept as it here emerged.

The position here advocated is not positive law anywhere, although I respectfully submit, it is the only position consonant with the general principles of criminal law which evidence the positive law of our country. Thus, the causation concept here advocated commends itself not only by its greater certainty, but also by its consonance with the age-old standards of Anglo-American criminal law, the large measure of support it draws from enlightened criminological scholarly opinion both here and abroad, and the soundness in terms of psychological theory which, I submit, it enjoys.[60]

[60] There is no occasion in this legal-technical paper to deal with the fundamentals of psychological theory. In lieu of many, see Gault and Howard, An Outline of General Psychology, Chap. 12 (2nd ed., 1934), on the nature of voluntary conduct and the circumstances of its functioning.

Senator HRUSKA. Nevertheless, we want you to go ahead and make such comment at this time, within the time limitation, as you choose.

STATEMENT OF PROF. GERHARD MUELLER, INSTITUTE OF COMPARATIVE CRIMINAL LAW, NEW YORK UNIVERSITY

Mr. MUELLER. Thank you, Senator Hruska. May I say that once again it is an honor and a pleasure to appear before you and the committee, as we have done in years past, aiding the Congress in legislation pertaining to criminal matters.

Senator Hruska, we answered the committee's questionnaire composed of 20, and if you count tightly, 43 questions. It was not an easy task. We have tried to give you an indication of the position of this proposed piece of legislation within world development.

In other words, we have tried to perform the function in a civilian matter which military counterintelligence is performing in the military field. We have tried to tell you what other nations have that may be better than what we have to offer.

Senator HRUSKA. Now, Professor if you will yield, there will be placed in the record the text of the questionnaire which was sent to professors of comparative law under date of February 3, 1972. By having that text there, the reference can be made back and forth from your respective statements to the questionnaire.

Mr. MUELLER. Very good. Thank you. That would be most appropriate. We have repeated each question at the beginning of our answer.

Senator Hruska, basically this code is a vast improvement on American codification efforts over previous codes. I am referring particularly to the Model Penal Code. Still, by world standards, the code does not quite measure up to the standard achieved in some of the European countries. I will point to some specifics.

But, basically, Europeans always have regarded Americans as fabulous, pragmatic problem solvers, but as pretty lousy when it comes to making general code statements, which are meant to govern human beings for the future, or at least for a predictable future.

Since we have specific answers to all of the questions, I will restrict myself to five points, and I thought I would start out with one point which I know, Senator Hruska, is of interest to you because you and I, both, contributed to the Nebraska Law Review on that issue, and that is the issue of the very aims and purposes of criminal law, particularly in reference to sentences.

May I call your attention to section 102 of the draft, which states the legislator's ideas on the purposes to be served thereby. In there we have a specific reference to the prescription of penalties, which are meant to have different purposes, such as rehabilitation of individual offenders. Deterrent is mentioned therein as "the prescription of excessive punishment," and so on. I would like to raise the question of whether or not this preamble-type statement is meant to be only a pious statement, or whether it is supposed to have legislative effect, in terms of guiding the judiciary.

And here I think I have some examples in continental legislation where it has been the effort of the draftsmen or the legislators to state these code purposes in connection with the obligation of the judiciary to impose that right kind of sentence, and thereby to prevent the further commission of crime.

Unhappily, the two sentencing chapters in this code do not give the judiciary much guidance in terms of the purposes and in terms of the input data that are supposed to go into sentences.

I would like to call to the committee's attention a statement from section 13 of the Penal Code of the German Federal Republic. This section which was just passed, states the purposes of the code in terms of the obligation of the judiciary to impose sentences, and it says:

> The culpability of the perpetrator is the basis of the composition of the punishment. In particular, the potential effects of the punishment upon the life of the perpetrator within society must be considered.

The section goes on by giving the judicial branch, the judiciary, specific guidance when it comes to sentencing. I would suggest, on the basis of continental experience, that you could do better in your own code if the general purposes were phrased in terms of an obligation for the judiciary to select the right kind of sentence. This may require the insertion of a further provision, somehwere further back in the sentencing chapters, which perhaps could be patterned after section 13 of the new German Penal Code which I just read.

I might add that the right measure and type of sentencing is of immense significance. I am at the moment director of the criminal justice and corrections education program of the National College of State Trial Judges where I am constantly in a quandary as to how to advise the trial judiciary of the United States when it comes to matters of sentencing. Legislative guidance is badly needed, and I think we have enough research experience to give our judiciary the guidance to which they are entitled.

I am now coming to a most difficult part of the draft, Senator. I am referring to sections 302 and 304, which are the basic culpability provisions. My answer actually arises out of questions 3 and 10 of the committee's list of questions, which I found it necessary to combine.

The question posed to me was whether or not the terms of culpability contained in section 302 are adequate in terms of world standards and experience abroad. The answer is yes. All of the world knows these forms of culpability, intentionally, knowingly, recklessly, and to some extent negligently. But, we are disturbed by finding subsection 5 in section 302. Subsection 5 would seem to be inconsistent with the entire experience of continental criminal law, and I might add of our own criminal law.

It seems also to be inconsistent with the broad policy statement on section 304. I mean the following: It has been basic, as all of us lawyers know, that at common law the awareness of wrongdoing is part of culpability. In fact, the mere intent to produce the result cannot even be called culpability. It is at best a bare form of culpability. It is of the essence of criminal liability at common law that the defendant has an awareness of wrongdoing when he commits a crime. That is why we impose liability. In fact, when it comes later on to the exculpation for mental illness, we exculpate only when there was no awareness of wrongdoing.

When we talk about mistake of fact, we are again exculpating people who did not have an awareness of wrongdoing by reason of error. I would propose, therefore, that section 304 be maintained as an absolutely beautiful policy statement, as an absolutely perfect provision which codifies the common law, and which codifies Federal and State experience in the United States. Section 304 is succinct and precise, and also in accordance with the best legislative draftsmanship of the continent of Europe. But, subsection 5 of 302 is quite inconsistent with it, and in my opinion ought to be stricken.

I would like to refer next, Senator, to the sentencing range. One of the questions refers to the sentencing policies of other nations. I have provided the committee with a chart which, on page 1852 shows the corresponding and comparable sentencing provisions of other nations. This chart gives us some Scandanavian countries, some Germanic countries, some Socialist countries and some Mediterranean countries and Asian countries.

You will notice, Senator Hruska, that among the civilized Western Democratic nations it is only France which has retained capital punishment for homicides. All other democratic Western nations have abolished capital punishment for homicides.

That leaves us with only Asian countries imposing capital punishment and authoritarian regimes like Spain, Greece, the U.S.S.R., Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Romania, and Bulgaria. I wonder if the time has not come for this draft to make a very straight forward proposal that we do away with capital punishment because surely our criminalologists tell us that serious threats of imprisonment are as good, or perhaps as bad, a deterrent as captial punishment.

When it comes to prison sentences, I note that almost universally throughout the world the sentences for rape, or for undifferentiated larceny are only about one-third in length of what this code proposes.

In view of the fact that we lack sufficient data to tell us that an increase in the threat of the sanction causes a decrease in the amount of crime committed thereunder, I would propose that the shorter sentences are preferable, particularly since shorter sentences are more ideal for the purposes of rehabilitating those who are apprehended and convicted.

My third point pertains to the provisions on mental illness. I am referring to section 503 of the draft, which my memorandum covers on page 19.

Senator Hruska, the draft provides for a definition of the exculpation for mental disease, disorder or defect, frequently called insanity, which is almost verbatim the text of the provisions of the Prussian Penal Code of 1851. The Prussians, to the extent that they still exist, have improved over this language.

It is correct, of course, that this precise text has ultimately been taken over by the American Law Institute, but the good Dr. Freud has come and gone in the meantime, and we have learned a lot about the functioning of the psyche. I would propose this draft section is outdated even in the United States.

I have called the attention of the committee to the tests that have been developed in the United States recently. For example, the test applied in Missouri, which has all the logic of the original M'Naghten test, but which is adequate in terms of permitting psychiatrists free testimony, and in terms of covering the whole range of mental elements in crime. After all, what is the test of mental illness supposed to do but to exculpate those who were incapable of forming the requisite mental elements of the crime?

And in this connection I would also like to call attention to the fact that the now Chief Justice of the United States, himself, has been a pioneer in the formulation of new tests, and I would suggest that the tests recommended or adopted by Missouri, and recommended by the Chief Justice of the United States are much more advanced than the test of section 503.

But, there is something else wrong with it. The test of 503 presupposes that all mankind falls into two groups, the sane and the insane, the mentally ill and the mentally sane. We now know that this is not so. Many human beings operate on the borderline of mental illness.

Consequently, many Central European countries have recognized the concept of diminished responsibility. A person who is not quite mentally ill so as to fulfill the formula of the code, and who is not quite normal like the rest of us who can respond to normal stimuli, is given a break by continental legislation.

For example, under the Swiss Code and the German Code, and some others, the response of the legislature has been that persons laboring under a diminished responsibility will be given a mitigation of sentence and a preferential treatment in a special treatment facility.

I might mention that once again Missouri has adopted a test of diminished responsibility. Unhappily this is only for murder. Some other States by judicial legislation have likewise set up tests of diminished responsibility, for example, New Jersey.

My last point, Senator Hruska, if I have a moment left, pertains to the art of drafting, altogether. It grieves me somewhat that American draftsmen, with some exceptions, still have not mastered the art of stating their code provisions in succinct terms, in terminology which can be understood by the persons that are to be governed thereby.

Let me call your attention to sections 603 et seq, dealing with justifications and excuses. The text of each of these sections rambles on page after page after page with clauses, and subclauses, and buts and fors, and provisos. The provisions are meant to govern human beings who have to make split-second decisions in moments of danger.

A police officer who is confronted by a crowd, who has only a split second to decide whether to use his handarm or not; a threatened citizen who has a burglar on his premises who must decide in a split second what to do.

These human beings, Senator Hruska, cannot remember 2,000 words. They must be told in succinct, precise memorable terms what they can do and what they cannot do, and these clear words must be found in the mentality and the practices of the people themselves. The legislator must go out and find out and learn from the people what is customary in our country when it comes to the defense of one's self, of one's loved ones, of one's property, when it comes to the use of force by law enforcement officers.

There is not one code in Europe that uses more than about 40 or 50 words for the guidance of human beings in emergency situations. All of those codes provide, incidentally, that a human being who honestly errs about this right under those circumstances will be exculpated. Moreover provisions are contained in those codes to the effect that people who are frightened, or act in frightened consternation, will likewise be exculpated.

I have given the committee some sample provisions, for example those of the Norwegian Penal Code. In our text we recommend as possible alternatives for the drafts' language, some other language. I might point out, incidentally, that not all sections of this code are drafted in such a verbose manner. Section 304, in which the basic error provision is stated, is drafted succinctly and precisely, and very beautifully. The trouble with that provision is that other tie-in provisions, for example, section 609, which also supposedly deals with mistake of fact, is drafted by a different draftsman, who had different ideas about the notions of culpability. The draftsmen did not sufficiently coordinate their work with each other.

I would propose, therefore, that all provisions pertaining to culpability be reviewed for the purpose of finding the consensus, and for drafting provisions which stick, which are memorable, and indeed, which can govern the conduct of human beings.

Thank you very much, Senator, and if you have any questions, I will be very glad to answer them.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, we appreciate your very comprehensive statement, Professor. You have covered a great many issues in it and, of course, your verbal narrative dealing with it during this morning will also be helpful.

It is kind of hard to know where to begin, but you do want to get a start somewhere. I would like to get your opinion, at least on one question. I am sure you are aware that a number of foreign jurisdictions make "Law Reform Commissions" a permanent part of their system of justice. Do you think it might be advisable to set up, when we enact this code, a permanent law reform commission that would have as its duty to conduct a continuous objective, nonpartisan review of the operation of the code, making recommendations to the Congress and the Supreme Court for specific laws or changes in rules of evidence and in rules of procedure that might enhance either the efficiency or the fairness of our system of criminal justice?

Mr. MUELLER. Yes, Senator Hruska. Every major European nation has a standing commission or government office whose task it is to constantly advise the legislatures on developments in criminal justice.

These commissions usually are composed of three agencies; one, a watchdog agency; two, an internal research organization; and three, a comparative law research organization.

Sweden, for example, has an office in its ministry of justice which with competent persons versed in criminal law whose sole task it is to advise the Swedish Parliament on innovations and developments in other countries.

The same is true for the German federal republic, for example, and they perform research in their research center at the federal government's expense and are constantly charged with the task of reporting to the Parliament developments in criminal justice.

You may be pleased to know that many innovations that we have made in the criminal justice system in the United States were immediately spotted abroad. For example, the Miranda rules were spotted almost immediately, and with some modification introduced in German legislation. There is not one thing that we do in terms of innovation in criminal justice that is not picked up on the continent of Europe immediately for possible incorporation in legislation.

I would highly recommend the creation of such a commission, and particularly I would recommend that such a commission be equipped with a research center, or that provision be made contractually with a research center, perhaps through the National Institute of Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice, so as to get the data to the Congress for purposes of constantly keeping this code up to date, because there is no such thing as a code with a permanent life expectancy. Each code has a very limited life expectancy, and each code is a dynamic phenomenon that constantly needs updating.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, that is a thought to be considered quite seriously. In 1948 we had a revision of our Federal criminal code, and nothing has happened since, and that was a quarter of a century ago.

Mr. MULLER. That is right.

Senator HRUSKA. Thank you very much for your appearance here and your contribution. Thank you.

Mr. MUELLER. Thank you for hearing me, Senator.

Senator HRUSKA. If we feel your statement needs further amplification, would you please receive communications from our counsel and favor us with some additional thoughts?

Mr. MUELLER. Very good. Indeed. Thank you, Senator.

Senator HRUSKA. Our next witness is Professor Ved P. Nanda of the College of Law at the University of Denver. We are glad to know that learnedness in the law is not confined to the Eastern Seaboard of America. We welcome you to these hearings.

STATEMENT OF PROF. VED P. NANDA, DIRECTOR OF THE INTERNATIONAL LEGAL STUDIES PROGRAM, UNIVERSITY OF DENVER COLLEGE OF LAW

Mr. NANDA. I am privileged and honored to be here, and I appreciate your kind invitation to appear before the subcommittee.

Senator HRUSKA. Now, the full statement which you have submitted to the committee will be inserted in the record at this point.

STATEMENT MADE BY VED P. NANDA, PROFESSOR OF LAW AND DIRECTOR OF THE INTERNATIONAL LEGAL STUDIES PROGRAM, UNIVERSITY OF DENVER COLLEGE OF LAW

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate your kind invitation to appear before the Subcommittee and to comment on the comparative and international law aspects of the proposed Federal Criminal Code and I feel privileged to be here. I will confine my remarks to the provisions of the Code which deal with the exercise of extraterritorial jurisdiction, §§ 201a, 208, 210 and 212.

Let me preface my remarks by paying a tribute to the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws for their skillful and competent treatment of the subject. Also I would like to express to you and the members of your subcommittee and through you to the 92nd Congress, the debt of gratitude of the scholar and the layman alike for undertaking the enormous task of appraising the existing body of Federal Criminal Laws and for your efforts toward reforming and modernizing these laws, and toward enacting a "modern, clear, comprehensive and workable Federal Criminal Code," as was outlined by the then Attorney General in his statement before your subcommittee on February 10, 1971.

At this point, I would like to make a few comments on the assertion and exercise of extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction in the proposed Code and compare the Code provisions with similar provisions in a few selected Codes and under international law.

THE CODE PROVISIONS

The Code provisions, especially in § 208, are fairly comprehensive. A successful attempt has been made to meet the needs and demands of the modern problems of crimes committed outside national boundaries. Glaring gaps in present law have been filled, especially by the language of 208(f). Henceforth jurisdiction would extend to those persons, who, under Supreme Court rulings, would not have been amenable to court martial proceedings. Such cases include offenses committed abroad either by civilians while they were members of the armed forces or by those who accompany the armed forces abroad. [See cases cited in 1 Working Papers of the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws 75 (1970)].

Also, the United States diplomats would no longer be able to avoid prosecution simply by invoking diplomatic immunity for offenses committed abroad, for they could henceforth be prosecuted in the United States. However, § 208(f) extends its reach to cover members of a diplomat's household as well, which incidentally might include not only U.S. citizens but also aliens. It also covers alien federal employees and aliens accompanying the U.S. military forces. Such a broad extension of U.S. jurisdiction as to include all offenses committed by aliens abroad, falling in the aforementioned categories, might raise some serious questions, for it is hard to argue that such a broad assertion of authority is compatible with the objective of creating healthy precedents under international law.

Under § 208 the Code seeks to break some new ground. The desire to provide adequate protection to the government is apparent. Subsection (a) seeks to assert jurisdiction over citizens and aliens alike if the "victim or intended victim of a crime of violence" is a high government official. Subsection (b) goes beyond current law by including espionage and sabotage in the same category as treason, but jurisdiction is limited to U.S. nationals. A case could, however, be made that it would be permissible to assert jurisdiction over aliens as well. Subsection (c) is applicable to nationals and aliens alike in case of certain enumerated offenses, as its objective is to deter and punish offenses against governmental functions and property abroad. United States v. Bowman [260 U.S. 94 (1922), cited in 1 Working Papers, at 71–72] had certainly called for explicit expansion and enumeration. Subsections (d) and (e) clarify existing law and subsections (g) and (h) are self-explanatory.

Under § 201(a), one of the jurisdictional bases to assert Federal jurisdiction is that the offense be committed "within the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States as defined in section 210." § 210 defines this jurisdiction. The enumeration of offenses covers a broad spectrum and meets present needs. The only notable point is that subsection (g) could not have reflected the status of current law, for a new "Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft" [the text is conveniently contained in 10 International Legal Materials 133 (1971)] which was signed at the Hague on December 16, 1970, has been ratified by the U.S. Senate as of September 8, 1971. Article 1 of the Convention provides that any person who on board an aircraft in flight:

> (a) Unlawfully, by force or threat thereof, or by any other form of intimidation, seizes, or exercises control of, that aircraft, or attempts to perform any such act, or
> (b) Is an accomplice of a person who performs or attempts to perform any such act, commits an offense (hereinafter referred to as "the offense").

Under Article 2 of the convention, each contracting state "undertakes to make the offense punishable by severe penalties." Under Articles 3, 4, 6, 7, 8 and 10 of the convention, appropriate measures by a state are to be taken to deal with a situation in which an alleged offender is found in its territory, notwithstanding the fact that the offense was not committed there.

§ 212 outlines the situations in which Federal piracy jurisdiction will be asserted. The definition is derived from the Convention on the High Seas, ratified by the United States Senate in 1960 [(1962 13 U.S.T. 2313, T.I.A.S. 5200] and a basis is identified for the exercise of Federal jurisdiction. The jurisdiction extends to ships and aircraft "on or over the high seas." The extension of jurisdiction and the treatment of piracy on Federal jurisdictional base are desirable steps.

EXTRATERRITORIAL JURISDICTION IN INTERNATIONAL LAW

Almost forty years ago, Professor E. D. Dickinson reported for a Harvard research project that there were five generally accepted bases for a state's assertion of extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction. In his introductory comments to the study [Harvard Research in International Law, Jurisdiction with Respect to Crime, 29 American Journal of International Law Supp. 435 (1935)], Professor Dickinson succinctly summed up these bases:

> . . . first, the territorial principle, determining jurisdiction by reference to the place where the offense is committed; second, the nationality principle, determining jurisdiction by reference to the nationality or national character of the person committing the offence; third, the protective principle determining jurisdiction by reference to the national interest injured by the offence; fourth, the universality principle, determining jurisdiction by reference to the custody of the person committing the offence; and fifth, the passive personality principle, determining jurisdiction by reference to the nationality or national character of the person injured by the offence. Of these five principles, the first is everywhere regarded as of primary importance and of fundamental character. The second is universally accepted, though there are striking differences in the extent to which it is used in the different national systems. The third is claimed by most states, regarded with misgivings in a few, and generally ranked as the basis of an auxiliary competence. The fourth is widely, though by no means universally, accepted as the basis of an auxiliary competence, except for the offence of piracy, with respect to which it is the generally recognized principle of jurisdiction. The fifth, asserted in some form by a considerable number of states and contested by others, is admittedly auxiliary in character and is probably not essential for any state if the ends served are adequately provided for on other principles.

To this list one could perhaps add another basis, usually called the "Floating Territory" principle. Under this principle, a ship or aircraft operating under the flag of a state is amenable to the exercise of that state's assertion of legislative authority. [See Restatement (Second) Foreign Relations Law of the United States §§ 28–29, 31–32 (1965)]. Such assertion could perhaps also be considered permissible if a ship or aircraft was "under the substantial private ownership" of a state's nationals. To use the term "floating territory" to describe ships, aircrafts and spacecrafts, of course, amounts to relying on a fiction, but the usage has been supported on pragmatic grounds.

These principles, broad in scope, are still the ones nations invoke to assert extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction on nationals and aliens for various offenses committed abroad.

Obviously, there may be competing and conflicting claims made by two states regarding the same offense. However, since there are no organized international arenas to provide an adequate mechanism of third party decision-making to resolve these conflicts, nations have usually shown remarkable restraint in not asserting extraterritorial criminal jusisdiction unless the commission or attempted commission of the offense would affect them in a substantial way or there was close connection between the nation asserting jurisdiction and the offense committed abroad.

THE U.S. PRACTICE

The United States has, in the past, relied on all the principles mentioned here (see 1 Working Papers, at 73). The United States federal system poses a special problem since, theoretically, the federal government, especially Congress, can act only in specifically delegated areas while residuary powers remain with the states and the people [see generally B. George, Jr., Extraterritorial Application of Penal Legislation, 64 Michigan Law Rev. 609, 614–28 (1966)]. However, the fact remains that under broad powers granted to Congress by the Constitution (U.S. Const. Art. 1, § 8, clauses 1, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 10, 18), Congress has sufficient power to legislate extraterritorially, and the only real question is if it actually did intend the legislation to have extraterritorial effect. In cases where Congressional intent is not clear, courts have construed statutes in question liberally, relying, in part, on international law principles, and inferring jurisdiction "from the nature of the offense."

§ 208 COMPARED WITH SELECTED FOREIGN CODES

The Italian penal code

The Italian Penal Code provides for extraterritorial criminal Jurisdiction in the following situations:

1. Crimes against the State (including acts against the sovereignty or independence of the State; espionage and sabotage). This corresponds basically to § 208(b) of U.S. Federal law. However, jurisdiction under Italian law is not limited to crimes committed by a citizen, but extends to those committed by foreigners as well.

2. Forgery or counterfeit of the State seals, currency, instruments of credit and stamps. This provision corresponds to the first sentence of § 208(c).

3. Crimes committed by public officers in violation of their duties or misuse of their powers. This corresponds to § 208(f), but is more limited as it does not include members of the public officials' household, nor persons accompanying the military forces.

4. Where such jurisdiction is provided by treaty. Same as § 208(g).

In other cases, jurisdiction is not absolute, but is conditioned upon a request by the Department of Justice. A distinction is made between political crimes and common crimes. Political crimes are defined as crimes violating a political interest of the State (e.g., its territory, form of government, etc.) or a political right of a citizen. They also include common crimes politically motivated, such as crimes of violence against the President of Italy, and acts of terrorism and anarchism. The Italian code provisions on political crimes committed abroad by a citizen or a foreign national correspond to § 208(a), but there are considerable differences between the two.

With regard to common crimes (i.e., other than political crimes) committed abroad, Italian law distinguishes between those committed by a citizen and those committed by a foreign national, as noted below. It may, however, also be noted that in both cases jurisdiction exists only if the accused is present within the national territory.

1. Common crimes committed by a citizen abroad. Absolute jurisdiction exists if the crime is punishable with imprisonment of three years or more under Italian law. On the other hand, for lesser crimes a request of the Justice Department or the victim's complaint is required. No jurisdiction exists for crimes punishable only by fines. If the victim is a foreign state or a foreign national, the accused can be tried in Italy only when his extradition has been refused.

2. Common crimes committed by a foreign national abroad. If the victim of the crimes is the Italian government or an Italian national, jurisdiction exists if the crime is punishable with at least one year imprisonment. If the victim is a foreign state or a foreign national, the crime must be punishable with at least three years imprisonment.

The main difference between Italian and U.S. laws concerning common crimes is that Italian law determines jurisdiction on the basis of the seriousness of the crime. On the other hand, U.S. laws determine jurisdiction upon the classification of the crime (Federal) and the fact that crime will have some effect within the U.S. (conspiracy to commit a federal offense within the U.S., entry of persons or property within the U.S., § 208(d) and (e)).

Under Italian law, a crime having consequences within the national territory might be considered as committed within the national territory and therefore outside the scope of extraterritorial jurisdiction. This would occur under the principle that a crime is deemed committed within the national territory if the results of the crime occur within the national territory.

A brief reference to selected provisions in two other codes follows:

The Turkish Penal Code

Article 3 of the Code provides that anyone committing a crime in Turkey is subject to Turkish law and that nationals, "even if sentenced in a foreign country for the commission of a crime, shall be retried in Turkey."

Article 4 provides that in crimes against the security of the Turkish Government and its instrumentality, a national and alien alike could be tried and punished.

Article 5 extends jurisdiction to a national committing crimes abroad if it would entail a sentence of at least three years. Article 7 provides that if a foreigner commits a felony in a foreign country against a Turk or the Turkish Republic and he has been tried in the foreign country, regardless of the outcome of the case, the case "shall be reviewed" by the Turkish courts.

The French Criminal Code

Under Article 689 of the French Code of Criminal Procedure, a French citizen committing abroad an act "qualified as a felony punished by French law" may be prosecuted and tried by French courts. If the act is a misdemeanor according to French law, the French jurisdiction extends only if it is punishable by the legislation of the country where it was committed or if it concerns the security of the state or counterfeiting the seal of the state or of current national monies.

Under Article 691, if a misdemeanor is committed against an individual, official complaint or denunciation by foreign authorities is a prerequisite to the exercise of extraterritorial jurisdiction.

Articles 75 to 108 of the French Penal Code deal with felonies and misdemeanors against the external and internal security of the state. These articles are broad in scope and in specified offenses, both nationals and aliens are subject to the French extraterritorial jurisdiction.

Conclusion

The proposed Code relies on all the principles of international law permitting extraterritorial jurisdiction. A special merit of §208 is that it would no longer be necessary for courts to infer jurisdiction "from the nature of the offense" construing the legislation in light of implicit Congressional purposes, for § 208 explicitly states the jurisdiction base.

The proposed Code favorably compares with foreign codes insofar as its provisions show considerable restraint in the exercise of Federal extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction even over United States nationals. Certainly, under existing international law guidelines even a much broader exercise would have been permissible.

However, on one minor point, I am not sure that the extension of jurisdiction is all that necessary. I specifically refer to §208(f), which extends the jurisdiction to all offenses committed by alien public employees, alien members of a diplomat's household and aliens accompanying the armed forces. Obviously, in view of the decentralized structure of the international community, the United States would not be precluded from making such an assertion. But, the point is: should it do so?

The desirable answer would be that the United States should assert jurisdiction over aliens only in specific instances, such as in case of offenses committed by an alien federal employee in connection with his official duties, and an alien member of the armed forces who is amenable to be tried by court-martial. But beyond these limited categories, the United States defer to the assertion of jurisdiction by the foreign state.

Thank you very much.

Mr. NANDA. Thank you. I will confine my comments to only one area of the proposed code, that deals with extraterritorial jurisdiction. I refer to sections 208, 210, 212 and 201(a).

Given the decentralized structure of the international society, that is, since there are no centralized bodies—there is no centralized judiciary or executive or legislature—each state participates in making law, law that governs the conduct of nation states. Thus, a state has the right to legislate concerning events and conduct so long as it does not transgress upon the authority of other nation states.

Traditionally the United States has not utilized all of the international bases and principles which grant nation states or authorize nation states or authorize nation states to assert criminal jurisdiction over offenses committed abroad.

Senator, traditionally there have been five such international principles, which are widely used. The universality principle is the oldest, and it has been historically used in piracy. No matter where piracy was committed, it was considered such a heinous offense that a common interest was discerned in bringing the offender to task and, therefore, any nation state could apply its own laws, and could bring the offender to task for piracy.

Nationality has traditionally been another principle utilized by all nation states to prescribe and apply their own laws to nationals, no matter where they are, and therefore, if a national committed an offense outside of the country, no matter what offense, international law does permit and authorize a nation state to extend jurisdiction extraterritorially. This includes criminal jurisdiction over a national.

The United States, again, has not utilized this authorization fully. As a matter of fact, the United States has extended its jurisdiction extraterritorially over the U.S. nationals quite narrowly and a case could be made to broaden this jurisdictional base.

The third principle is the protected interest principle and treason is traditionally an area where a nation state feels its own interests being jeopardized or threatened to such an extent that no matter where the offense began, or who is involved in it, it could be brought under the extraterritorial jurisdiction of a nation state.

We do find in section 208, subsection (b) that if the offense of treason is committed by a national of the United States, the code applies but the code does not even today extend the U.S. jurisdiction to non-nationals in this area.

There has been another ground to extend jurisdiction, and that has been called the passive personality principle, the principle based on the nationality of the victim. Under this principle, if a U.S. national is a victim of a crime committed abroad, the United States might have a basis to extend its criminal jurisdiction extraterritorially.

And finally, the so-called "floating territory" principle, under which a state's extraterritorial jurisdiction might be exercised over a vessel, or aircraft or spacecraft which is under the flag of that nation state, or perhaps we could extend further the principle, which is fictional anyway, and say that if the nationals of the state have a predominant interest, a preponderance of interest in a vessel, or aircraft, or spacecraft, that the state can extend extraterritorially its criminal jurisdiction.

Well, traditionally the United States has applied all of these principles invariably, but in a very narrow way, and in an ad hoc fashion, on a case-by-case basis.

I would like to commend the Commission for outlining these new provisions which are succinct, which are precise, and unlike many of the other provisions in the code that Professor Mueller has mentioned as being verbose, I must say that all of these provisions are sufficiently succinct and precise, and they deal with the situation as it presently exists in terms of our decentralized structure of international society.

May I make just two brief comments on these provisions. First, I do not intend to go into the constitutional aspects of extraterritoriality in any detail. I think that based upon the inherent sovereignty doctrine, or based upon the fact that the Constitution does give Congress power to legislate extraterritorially, and I refer especially to the Constitution—article 1, section 8, clause 18, and various other clauses, for instance, in article 1, section 8, the clause on taxation and various other clauses by which the Constitution does grant Congress power to enact in the areas, for example of foreign commerce, or to enact uniform rules of naturalization, or for punishment of counterfeiting of money, securities of the United States, establishment of post office, patent, and copyright laws, piracy, felonies and punishment pertaining thereto, and there is reference also to the law of nations—the Congress has the necessary power to legislate extraterritorially.

It will suffice to say that the only point that we are concerned with is if it was congressional intent or purpose to extend the specific legislation in question to activities, events and conduct abroad.

My second comment is on section 208(f). That is the subsection that applies if the offense is committed by a Federal public servant who is outside of the territory of the United States, or by a member of a household of a U.S. diplomat abroad, or by a person accompanying the military forces of the United States. I think it is desirable to extend the Federal criminal jurisdiction in some cases and this subsection fills certain gaps, because the Supreme Court had decided in earlier cases that perhaps Federal jurisdiction might not extend to cover some of the situations mentioned in this particular subsection.

But the jurisdiction desired to be exercised is rather broad. For, it might affect aliens who do not perform any official function and who are subject to U.S. jurisdiction just because they are members of a U.S. diplomat's household abroad.

It might also affect an alien who merely accompanies the military forces of the United States and who has committed an offense completely unassociated with his official or public functions.

It might also affect the Federal employee who is an alien and who is performing any duty as a public function. And, Senator, I do not feel that it is perhaps necessary or desirable that the Federal criminal jurisdiction should extend that far.

Certainly, the United States has a broad right and a broad power under international law authorization. However, there are various other national codes that do not go that far and I do not feel that it is desirable for the U.S. Code to extend its jurisdiction to that extent either.

I have earlier mentioned that the code, under 208(b), does not envisage reaching out to a nonnational even if the offense committed abroad by a nonnational is treason, and I feel that under subsection (f) also, the code might say that Federal jurisdiction would be extended in certain specific instances, such as in the case of offenses committed by an alien Federal employee in connection with his official duties, or in a situation where an alien member of the Armed Forces is amenable to be tried by court martial.

But, beyond those categories, which are rather limited, I think the United States should defer to the assertion of jurisdiction by a foreign state.

However, a case can be made that under 208(b), Federal criminal jurisdiction should also extend to an alien. I would prefer extension of 208(b) and curtailment of 208(f).

I know that I should not take too long since you wish to adjourn at 12:45. Therefore, I will draw your kind attention to my prepared statement and a few comparative aspects I have touched upon in that statement. In conclusion, I feel that section 208 is fairly comprehensive, and I feel it meets the needs and demands of modern problems in criminal law. Since national boundaries are no longer any limiting factor on crimes, I do feel that the code sections on extraterritoriality fill some gaps in the U.S. law, because as you know, the judiciary had all along to construe the legislative intent, and had to fall back upon the nature of the offense, and now by providing a jurisdictional base in section 208, I think the code will resolve that problem. Section 210, as I have mentioned in my prepared statement, will have to be brought up to date.

That, Senator Hruska, would be just a summary statement of my comments on extraterritorial jurisdiction. If there are any questions, I will be happy to answer them.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, we want to thank you, Professor Nanda, and also you, Professor Mueller, for your insight concerning criminal law in foreign lands. Certainly those members of the committee who have a great void of understanding and of information on this subject are going to be greatly helped by the papers that you have presented, and also your personal appearance here.

And, I am sure that we can learn much from the experiences of other countries who in some instances have lived with criminal codes that have evolved over the centuries, and yet that have become modernized.

At this point in the record I should like to insert materials on foreign comparative criminal law prepared by various professors of comparative law and other experts on foreign criminal law, including an article on the proposed Federal Criminal Code by a distinguished French Judge. Following this material, for the Appendix of the record, I should like to insert a rather voluminous collection of materials on foreign comparative criminal law prepared by the staff of the Law Library of the Library of Congress, and other foreign law materials received by the Subcommittee.

We are adjourned, subject to the call of the Chair.

(Thereupon, at 12:50 p.m. the hearing was adjourned, subject to call of the Chair.)

STAFF NOTE: The following letter-questionnaire was sent by the chairman to all Professors of Comparative Law in North America, soliciting information on foreign criminal codes and comparisons of such codes with the proposed Federal Criminal Code drafted by the National Commission. A large number of responses were received, including manuscripts and articles on various of the point raised in the questionnaire. A cross-section of the most illuminating responses and documentation received by the Subcommittee is reprinted in this hearing.

DEAR PROFESSOR: As you know, the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures is conducting a continuing examination of the proposed Federal Criminal Code prepared by the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws as a "work basis" for revision and reform of Title 18 of the United States Code. Since the Federal Government has never had a penal code, only an aggregation of loosely joined statutes supplemented by court decisions and common law doctrines, the proposed codification and revision would represent an enormous development in American criminal jurisprudence.

Foreign nations, especially the continental European nations, have had many years of experience in drafting, construing and applying criminal codes; therefore the Subcommittee, as it evaluates and formuates a penal code for the government of the United States, wishes to draw upon the law, practice, theory and experience of other nations.

This letter details a number of questions and areas in which information of a comparative nature is desired. I solicit your help and expertise in comparative law in responding to one or more of these questions or others which may occur to you in comparing the Draft Code to foreign law. Please do not feel constrained to respond to the entire questionnaire, which is quite long, and do not feel limited or restricted by this list if you think of other subjects or alternatives that may be of interest and useful in the Federal Code. The answer need not be comprehensive or exhaustive in the manner of a Law Review article, since we are searching for ideas and possibilities rather than material for a treatise or encyclopedia.

We should like information on the following points:

1. The National Commission, following the lead of the American Law Institute in its Model Penal Code (1962), has proposed what is primarily a code of substantive criminal law. The proposed Code is divided into three Parts—Part A, General Provisions; Part B, Specific Offenses; Part C, Sentencing.

Is such a tripartite division followed in the foreign codes? How are foreign codes structured?

2. The proposed code contains 350 sections (Part A: 73; Part B: 238; Part C: 39), but the numbering system runs from section 101 to Section 3601.

Is it customary in foreign codes to leave so many blank numbers for future statutes? What is the usual numbering system?

3. The proposed Code defines the various "intent" requirements or the mental elements necessary for criminal conduct in §302(1). The Code would establish four different kinds of culpability: intentionaly, knowingly, recklessly and negligently.

How do the foreign criminal codes regard and use the element of the defendant's state of mind? Is it used to determine guilt or innocence? Degree of guilt? Sentence? How do the kinds of culpability proposed in the draft code compare with foreign provisions?

4. The proposed Federal Criminal Code includes a section (§305) which defines the causation requirement or causal connection which must be proved between the defendant's conduct and the result.

How is causation handled by foreign codes?

5. The Draft proposes that mental disease or defect at the time of the criminal conduct to be a defense and defines that defense in proposed §503.

Is there an insanity defense to criminal charges under foreign codes? How do the foreign provisions compare with that of the Draft Code? Do any foreign codes provide that the insane defendant may be found guilty, but that upon conviction he must be accorded medical rather than penological treatment? How do they handle the procedural aspects of the insanity defense: is there provision whereby the Judge selects a psychiatrist to examine the defendant or do both the government and the defense lawyers bring in their own medical witnesses? Is there provision whereby the defendant found not guilty by reason of insanity is automatically committed to a mental institution for observation and treatment?

6. Although the defendant who "lacks substantial capacity to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law" because of mental illness has a defense under §503, the defendant who is similarly situated because of alcohol, or drug intoxication has no defense under §502 (except in limited situations).

How do foreign codes handle the problem of the defendant who is intoxicated? Is he given a defense to criminal liability? Is he handled differently upon sentencing? (i.e. sent to a hospital rather than prison?) If foreign law is similar to American, how do theorists defend different treatment, for example, for the alcoholic and mentally-ill person?

7. The Draft Code contains a rather elaborate and detailed group of sections on self-defense and use of force, etc. (§603—Self-Defense; §604—Defense of Others; §605—Use of Force by Persons with Parental, Custodial or Similar Responsibilities; §606—Use of Force in Defense of Premises and Property; §607—Limits on the Use of Force; Excessive Force; Deadly Force.)

How do these detailed rules compare with the equivalent provisions in foreign codes? Do the foreign codes enunciate specific rules or set general standards?

8. Near the end of the Code proposal, in §3002, the system of classification of offenses is set forth. There are six categories: Class A, Class B and Class C Felonies, Class A and Class B Misdemeanors and Infractions. This is a system of classification for purposes of sentencing.

How and what purposes do foreign codes classify offenses?

9. How do foreign code provisions on sentencing of convicted defendants compare with the sections in Part C of the proposed Federal Code?

Do foreign code sections on suspension of sentences provide for suspension of imposition of sentence and/or suspension of execution of sentence?

Do the foreign codes provide for a sentence of probation or is probation a form of suspension of sentence?

Is a person so released under supervision by probation officers, police officers or no one?

Do the foreign codes provide for indeterminate or determinate sentences of imprisonment?

Are there special extended term prison-sentence provisions for dangerous special offenders similar to §3207?

How do the authorized prison sentences for a representative group of crimes compare with the authorized prison sentences for the same offenses under foreign codes?

Are there mandatory minimum prison sentences under the foreign codes?

If foreign nations employ systems of release on parole, how do they compare with the provisions in Chapter 34 of the Draft?

Are prisoners released on parole by an administrative agency such as the United States parole board or by the Court?

Does foreign law have any equivalent to proposed §3007 under which an organization convicted of an offense may be required to give notice or appropriate publicity to the conviction.

Is giving publicity to a conviction (a different colored license plate for persons convicted of drunken driving, for example) used as a sanction or sentence under foreign codes?

Do the foreign codes have any equivalent to proposed §3003 (Persistent Misdemeanant)?

Do foreign codes require judges to give reasons in writing for sentences imposed?

Are sentences subject to review on appeal by a higher court? If so, may the appellate court raise as well as lower the sentence?

May the government appeal a sentence or only the defendant?

What standards do the Codes require for sentencing review?

If appellate review of sentences is not authorized under foreign penal or criminal procedure codes, how is uniformity of sentencing amongst the judges secured?

How does §3204 (Concurrent and Consecutive Terms of Imprisonment) compare with foreign code provisions on multiple offenses? Some European codes provide for a joint sentence rather than concurrent or consecutive sentences. How are terms computed under joint sentencing provisions? Under a "joint sentence", what happens if one but not all of the convictions is reversed on appeal?

Regarding the imposition of fines, do any foreign codes have provisions similar to §3301(2)?

In the United States many imposed fines are never collected and, therfore, of limited value either as a punishment or deterrent to others; how do foreign codes provide for collection of fines?

What is the "day fine" system and how are provisions regarding it formulated?

Is the day fine a fixed amount depending upon the gravity of the offense of which the defendant is convicted or it the amount fixed based upon the ability of the defendant to pay?

10. Is mistake of law a defense under foreign codes? Mistake of fact? How do foreign provisions compare with §§303, 304, 609?

11. One significant change in the proposed Code from present Federal criminal law is the separation of the jurisdictional base upon which federal prosecution rests from the definition of the offense as to which the defendant is prosecuted. Are there analogues to this differentiation between crime and jurisdiction in any of the foreign codes?

12. How do the Draft Code's provisions on extraterritorial jurisdiction (§208) compare with the foreign provisions on extraterritoriality and jurisdiction over crimes committed outside national boundaries?

13. How is the problem of criminal conspiracy handled under foreign codes?

14. How do foreign codes handle the problem of "felony-murder" (murder committed by one party to a felony)? (See §1601 [c].)

15. In those nations which have a Federal system (e.g. West Germany, Switzerland) does the Federal government have concurrent or exclusive jurisdiction over riots, mass demonstrations and crimes or is jurisdiction limited in a way similar to proposed §1801 (4)3 How do the Code provisions in this area (§1801—Inciting Riot; §1802—Arming Rioters; §1803—Engaging in a Riot; §1804—Disobedience of Public Safety Orders under Riot Conditions) compare with foreign code sections dealing with similar problems?

16. Do any of the foreign codes have a section similar to §1104 (Para-Military Activities)?

17. A number of sections and subchapters of the proposed code deal with an area which is often referred to as "crimes without victims"; i.e. crimes in which the victim either consents or is a willing customer of the defendant. See, e.g., §§1821–1829 (drugs), abortion, §§1831–1832 (gambling), §§1841–1849 (prostitution), §1851 (obscenity), and homosexual activity activity between consenting adults. How do the foreign codes approach these problems?

18. How do foreign code provisions on firearms and explosives compare with §§1811 to 1814 and the Commission's controversial recommendation in the introductory note to the subchapter?

19. Which foreign jurisdictions provide for capital punishment? For which offenses? Do any foreign codes provide for a separate proceeding to determine sentence in a capital case? (See §3602). Are separate hearings on sentencing authorized in any cases or does the absence of a jury system make separate hearings not bound by restrictive rules of evidence superfluous?

20. How do the codes' provisions on multiple prosecutions and trials (§703—Prosecution for Multiple Related Offenses; §—When Prosecution Barred by Former Prosecution for Different Offense; §706—Prosecutions Under Other Federal Codes; §707—Former Prosecution in Another Jurisdiction: When a Bar; §708—Subsequent Prosecution by a Local Government: When Barred; §709—When Former Prosecution is Invalid or Fraudulently Procured) compare with the relevant sections of foreign codes?

It would be helpful if as much material as possible could be made available to the Subcommittee no later than March 17, so that at least some of it may be inserted into the hearings of the Subcommittee, now planned for the end of that month, and made available to the American academic and legal communities interested in criminal law.

If you have any questions in reference to this request, please contact Mr. G. Robert Blakey, the Chief Counsel to the Subcommittee at Area Code 202/225-3281. Should you not have access to a copy of the Commission's Final Report, I will be happy to send you one upon request.

With kindest regards, I am

Sincerely yours,

JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,

G. ROBERT BLAKEY, ESQ.
Chief Counsel, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BLAKEY: In response to your letter of February 3rd, 1972, I had hoped to be able to write you at some length. Unfortunately, it has been hard to find the time, as I am not now teaching criminal law, and must devote the bulk of my time to the matters for which I am now responsible. As you may know, I did teach criminal law for two years in Ethiopia, a country whose recent penal code is modeled on the most advanced European thinking. Much of what I know about that code and its interpretation is embodied in a monograph which I am enclosing for your possible interest, originally published in the Journal of Ethiopian Law. The English version begins at page 375. In addition, I would refer you, as I am sure others have done, to the outstanding work of Professor Johannes Andenaes of Norway, in particular a book entitled The General Part of the Criminal Law of Norway (1956). The Ethiopian Penal Code is available in an English translation and there is a fairly persuasive commentary on its general part, also available in English, written by Dr. Philippe Graven [An Introduction to Ethiopian Penal Law (1965)].

If I had one exhortatory response to make to your subcommittee in response to your inquiry, it is that every effort be made to deal comprehensively with the theoretical as well as the substantive problems of criminal law in the body of the code. This need not mean fulsome detail. I find the provisions governing self-defense, defense of others, and the like, for example, to be somewhat excessive in their detail. There is a difference between clearly expressed principles set in the framework of a cogent and understandable organization, to me the essence of code writing, and statements so elaborate as to appear to attempt to solve every factual problem which might arise. The sections on self-defense tend, unfortunately, to over-detail. For example, if in the midst of a fist fight between two young men in a crowd one unexpectedly draws a knife, will the other's response of equal force be justified? Section 603(b)(2) appears to say that he has no right of defense despite the extreme escalation of force; can this be right? Yet the very detail of other subsections suggests that it must be, because the case is unprovided for. While the code might seek to set out examples—for example, deadly force is unjustified in the protection only of property—such examples should be limited and early identified as such; in general, its statement should be limited to a brief and clear indication of the principles involved.

The more upsetting deficiencies, in my view, are those which go in the direction of understatement, by which I mean continuing to leave important matters of principle for decision by judges in individual cases. Thus, the Ethiopian Code provision on causality, like most European code definitions, is the exclusive basis for a finding of causality. Section 305 of the draft, on the other hand, provides only that "causation may be found" in stated circumstances, and the commentary to its suggests that the drafters meant to leave to judges the definition of other circumstances in which causation is present. To do this is essentially to withdraw from the code idea. However difficult it may be to define the relationship of cause and effect, it is the statute which ought to accomplish that definition. To leave this or other similar matters partially in judicial hands is in a significant way to give up the enterprise.

As I see it, the difference between the usual European approach and our frequent approach to statute writing is that we often tend to write statutes with an eye to resolving a particular problem; in the code tradition the statutes are written explicitly to impose a structure or framework on a whole area of legal concern. To be successful, particularly with judges who are used to and command power to construe and shape our codes, a code must be clear and cogent in its organization and statement. This is not a matter of foreseeing all contingencies; such casuistic drafting is impossible to do and only invites judicial troubles. There will always be interstitial issues of judgment. The principal job is to build a strong, complete and readily understandable skeleton within which those interstices will appear. It is on clarity and thoroughness of organization and statement that the code's success will depend, and so I think it is to that question as much as the actual solutions to substantive problems posed by the code that your efforts should be directed.

Again, I regret not being able to respond to your inquiry in detail, and hope that the enclosed may be of some assistance to you.

Yours truly,

PETER L. STRAUSS,
Associate Professor of Law.

ON INTERPRETING THE ETHIOPIAN PENAL CODE

(By Peter L. Strauss*)

I. INTRODUCTION [1]

The aim of this article is to set out and discuss some general principles of interpreting the Ethiopian Penal Code—that is to say, of using it. Even now, ten years after it came into effect, many people have difficulty in understanding and using the Penal Code in a straightforward way. It seems complex, and many of its fundamental conceptions are unfamiliar to Ethiopian lawyers. This article, discussing at length how the code is built, may help reduce its apparent complexity and thus facilitate its day-to-day application.

Since the article is about interpretation in general, it does not attempt to discuss in detail particular concepts, such as "negligence," or crimes, such as "homicide." The one exception is the "Principle of Legality," embodied in Article 55 of the Revised Constitution as well as in Article 2 of the Penal Code. This principle places restraints on the form and manner of interpretation of the Code, and thus has obvious relevance to our theme. For the other doctrines of the General Part, the first place for an Ethiopian lawyer to turn is the commentary of Dr. Philippe Graven, An Introduction to Ethiopian Penal Law (Articles 1–84 Penal Code), published in English by the Faculty of Law in 1965; an Amharic version of the commentary is now in the course of preparation at the Faculty. Dr. Graven is the son of the Code's principal draftsman and was for a long time employed at the Ministry of Justice.

What follows is not as heavily laced with footnotes as many of the articles which have previously appeared in these pages. It seems that frequent reference to the sources consulted might be more confusing than helpful, and that all discussion or explanation belonged in the text. Except for a few special cases, such as attribution of direct quotations, the sources used have been indicated as a group at the beginning of each subdivision of the article.

The problem of interpretation only arises when a lawyer or judge has a problem before him. Certain facts have come to his attention, and he wants to know what the legal consequences or implications of them might be. Given a code system such as Ethiopia now enjoys, his first reaction will be to look in the relevant code(s) for some indication of the answer to his problem. He may find that the language of the statute seems perfectly clear, and appears to give an exact answer to his problem. Then, he need go no further. But if the language is not clear or directly on point, he will have to go farther and attempt to reason out, using such aids as are available to him, what is the law applicable to his case.

This article is about all three stages of the process: looking for the relevant law in the Code (and how to tell what is relevant); deciding whether or not the meaning is "clear"; and some of the means which can be used to reason out a sensible answer if it is not. The organization of the article stresses the last two questions—what is "clear," and what can be done where a provision is not clear. Thus, it may seem to pass lightly over the vital question of finding the possibly relevant law. Once the reader understands how the Code is put together, however, and how that structure can be used in solving any particular problem, he will also have a much better sense of how and where to find the possibly relevant law. That is, in learning about interpretation, the reader will at the same time be improving his skill at finding and identifying the provisions which he has to interpret.

There are a number of special factors working in Ethiopia which limit and shape the direction of this inquiry. Perhaps the most important is the severe limitation on the resources available to the lawyer or judge who wants to find out about the law. Ideally, research tools would include the following: versions of the Penal Code in each of its three languages—Amharic, English and French, the language in which it was drafted; historical materials explanatory of the purpose of the enacters or the expected function of code provisions—such as preparatory drafts, explanations written by the drafter for the Codification Commission and records of the debates in the Codification Commission and the Parliament; cases decided by the Supreme and High Courts on questions which have arisen in the past; commentary on the Penal Code by persons familiar with Ethiopian justice and/or the sources which were relied upon in drafting it; and materials and commentary from foreign jurisdictions explaining either relevant concepts new to Ethiopian justice or the code provisions from which Ethiopian Penal Code provision were drawn.

Some of the most important of these materials are simply unavailable. Others are available only at the University Law Library in Addis Ababa, or require thorough knowledge of a foreign language to be understood. With the exception of the codes, and cases and articles appearing in the Journal of Ethiopian Law, there are virtually no Amharic-language materials. With the same exceptions, there are no legal materials which one could expect to find in most or all courts in the Empire. The significance of this limitation of resources is that one must expect that, at least for the present, lawyers and judges will have to rely almost entirely on the language and structure of the Penal Code itself, without being able to obtain substantial help from other sources. For this reason, this article will concentrate on how Code language and the structure can be used in interpretation. It will not discuss such important and difficult questions as: What weight is to be given to historical materials in the interpretation of statutes? Are previous decisions interpreting a Code provision binding upon a court which is later asked to interpret the same provision? What importance should be attached to scholarly commentaries on Code provisions or on the laws of other countries from which Code provisions were drawn?

A particularly regrettable limitation flows from the likelihood that the English and French versions of the Code are not widely available and would not be widely understood. In most cases, Amharic code provisions will have been produced by translation from an English or French draft, or perhaps both. Inevitably, there are discrepancies. Although the Amharic version controls, both by law and because this is the language which most judges and lawyers best understand, our law students assure us that the English and the French versions are often more precise and more readily understood. In many cases, this may be because Amharic as a language lacks a settled and precise body of legal terminology. As a result, translators may have to use vague terminology, or long descriptive phrases which lose the exact meaning of the original text. Thus, it is not surprising that a comparison of provisions in their three different linguistic versions will often assist greatly in understanding them.

Such a comparison might also suggest intended limitations of application which had not been incorporated clearly into the Amharic text, as for example, in the case of Penal Code Article 472. The English text of Article 472(1) states:

"(1) Whosoever conspires with one or more persons for the purpose of preparing or committing serious offences against public security or health, the person or property, or persuades another to join such conspiracy, is punishable, provided that the conspiracy materialises, with simple imprisonment for not less than three months and fine.

"For the purposes of this Article, 'serious offences' are offences which are punishable with rigorous imprisonment for five years or more."

The italicized portions are omitted in the Amharic. The French text is similar to the English text, and there is no available record to show that the Amharic version reflects a Parliamentary amendment of the original draft. How a judge might or must deal with such discrepancies is again, however, something best put aside until a later time.

We must also take into account another factor, which is that at the present time most of the judges and advocates who must administer the Penal Code have not had any formal legal education. The drafters of the Code have taken the difficulties this situation creates into account, for what they have written is very full in explanation and clear in its organization. Still, there must be some understanding of how to approach these explanations, of how the organization works, of how the drafters of the Code expected that their work would be understood by those responsible for applying it. And it is important not only to set out appropriate means of interpretation, but also to avoid reliance upon techniques of interpretation—however accepted they may be in countries where legal education is widespread—which are complex or sophisticated. Indeed, it may be doubly important to restrict ourselves to simple techniques of interpretation when dealing with the criminal law. In the criminal law, the common man, too, must understand what is permitted and what is forbidden; he may go to jail if he makes a mistake.

There is a final limitation, perhaps the most severe. It should be clearly understood that there are no such things as "rules" of interpretation, and that it is not the goal of this article to help judges and lawyers reason to what is "the proper" or "the correct" result in the cases they may have to deal with. Fringe areas of uncertainty, as we will shortly see, exist in virtually every statute. In these areas, the legislature has not clearly decided or perhaps even considered the appropriate meaning of the law; consequently, in these fringe areas, any answer would be permissible and therefore technically "correct." Certainly, in making the choice a lawyer may find one or another interpretation better for reasons of social policy or the like. But the point is that the choice is open for him to make and, whether he makes it intelligently or not, one cannot say a priori that his choice is impermissible or wrong. Thus, it would be more accurate to state the goal of this article as the following: to help judges and lawyers avoid improper or unjustified results, by suggesting guides for determinirg where legislative solutions really are uncertain, and what considerations might be helpful in making the necessary choice. It can do no more. Common sense and a feeling for "justice" are the ultimate tools on which a lawyer must rely, and, indeed, the criteria by which he and the results his decisions produce will themselves be judged.

II. FINDING THE POSSIBLY RELEVANT LAW [2]

For the moment, we concern ourselves with the limited question, how to find within the Penal Code the law which might possibly bear on a problem. It requires a preliminary investigation of the principles on which the Code is organized; we will return to a more detailed investigation of these principles when we consider the question of interpretation as such. What we are looking for now is a way of determining by their language or placing, what provisions of the Code might be relevant to a legal problem.

We could take as an example the following factual situation, to which we will frequently return later on. Certain people of Ethiopia, such as the Afar, are nomadic. Their dwellings are constructed of sticks and mats which can easily be removed from one site, packed on the back of a camel, and carried to a new place. Suppose that during daylight hours an Afar is in the course of removing the parts of his dwelling from his camel's back and putting them up, when a thief emerges from the scrub and tries to carry them away. The thief is unarmed, and does not threaten the Afar personally; he simply tries to take the unconstructed pieces from the camel's back and run off with them. Seeking to protect his property, the Afar grabs up his spear and uses it to pierce the thief. The thief dies. How would one find the penal law relevant to the question of what, if any, crime the Afar has committed?

Although the process of finding law depends a good deal on knowing, in the first place, what facts the law is likely to consider significant, knowledge of the structural principles of the Penal Code is also important. The Code is, in fact, very carefully and logically organized. This organization consists of a series of subdivisions of increasing specificity. The first subdivision of the Code, into three Parts, is probably already familiar: Part I, the General Part, contains principles which apply generally to a large number of penal offences; Part II, the Special Part, gives the specific definition of relatively serious offences—the ones we are most likely to think of as "crimes"; Part III, the Code of Petty Offences, describes criminal offences of little importance, very often violation of ministerial regulations or the like and attended with very slight penalty. Part III also states some general principles specifically applicable to these petty crimes. Each of these Parts is itself subdivided, its subdivisions are subdivided, and so forth until one gets to what is generally speaking the smallest subdivision, the individual article. Each subdivision of the Code—articles included—has a title, which reflects the place of that subdivision within the overall statutory scheme. There is thus a formal structure of relationships within the Code, which is explained or indicated to a substantial degree by the naming of its various subdivisions. This formal structure was intentionally created, and created for just this purpose—to help illustrate the meaning, purpose, and interrelationships of various Code provisions. Understanding this important fact will help to identify the provisions relevant to any legal situation; later we will see how it should also help to understand the possible purposes and meanings of those provisions when they are at issue.

The Penal Code's Table of Contents is the first place to look in seeking possibly relevant Code provisions, for it clearly sets out the organization of the Penal Code and the titles of its various subdivisions. Often, the best first step will be to look for the specific offence(s) which may be involved. Thus, we can immediately eliminate the 247 articles of the General Part from the first stages of our search, since specific offences are not described in Part I. In the problem case of the Afar, set out above, we can also eliminate Part III, the Code of Petty Offences; if killing the thief was an offence, it very likely is treated as a rather serious matter. The search is thus narrowed to Part II of the Code—only 442 of the Code's 820 articles.

Part II is itself divided into four "Books" each with a title indicating a broad kind of specific crime. In the case of the Afar, the only Book likely to apply is Book V, "Offences Against Individuals and the Family"; the thief was an individual, not "the State" (Book III), "Public Interest or the Communify" (Book IV), or "Property" (Book VI). Now only 126 potentially eligible articles remain. Book V is itself subdivided into four "Titles"; Title I, "Offences against life or person," seems the most promising. The thirty-one offences of Title I are further divided among three "Chapters"; Chapter I, "Offences against life," immediately suggests itself as most relevant. Chapter I is comprised of two sections: I, "Homicide and its forms" and II, "Offences against life unborn—Abortion"; Section II can thus be put aside, leaving seven possibly relevant articles. Of these two can quickly be eliminated simply by glancing at their titles: Article 525, "Instigating or aiding another to commit suicide" and Article 527, "Infanticide." The other five must be read.

On reading them, one can quickly eliminate Article 522, "Aggravated Homicide"; in the facts given, one could hardly think the Afar had premeditated the killing, or that there was anything else to show that he is "exceptionally cruel or dangerous." But from reading Article 521, "Principle," and Articles 523, 524 and 526—each dealing with a particular form of homicide—several questions arise: What is "cause"? "intention"? "negligence"? Is the crime defined in Article 523 a crime of intention? negligence? neither? What is a "state of necessity" "legitimate self-defence"? At the time of the killing, was the Afar's dwelling his "house"? To some extent, these are questions of interpretation, which we will deal with shortly. But the existence of so many questions suggest that there may still be other possibly relevant provisions to be found and considered, before the task of interpretation as such begins.

It is at this point that an understanding of Part I, the General Part, becomes important. As already stated, this part contains rules of general application throughout the Code, and so one might think that it would suggest the answers to some if not all of the questions raised above.

The General Part is itself carefully organized. It is divided into two Books, The first deals with questions influencing the question of guilt—"Offences and the Offender"—and the second, with the question of punishment. Each of these books is then subdivided, in a logical way, into Titles, Chapters, Sections, Paragraphs and Articles. To illustrate how this organization can be used for law-finding, the structure of two of the Titles of Book I is set out below: The parenthical questions are intended to show the material dealt with.

Title II: The Offence and its Commission:

- Chapter I—The Criminal Offence (In what circumstances, where and when is an offence committed?)
- Chapter II—Degrees in the Commission of the Offence (When is an offence begun to be committed, and can it then be withdrawn from?)
- Chapter III—Participation in an Offence (What persons are participants in—guilty of—offences?)
- Chapter IV—Participation in Offences Relative to Publications (What are the special rules of personal liability for illegal acts of publication?)

Title III: Conditions of Liability to Punishment in Respect of Offences:

- Chapter I—Criminal Responsibility (What persons are excused, and to what extent, from criminal liability on account of their physical or mental condition?)
  - Section I—Ordinary Responsibility (Adults)
  - Section II—Infants and Juvenile Delinquents
- Chapter II—Criminal Guilt (What state of mind renders one guilty of, justifies, or excuses in part apparently criminal conduct?)
  - Section I—Intention, Negligence and Accident (What state of mind is necessary for criminal guilt to exist?)
  - Section II—Lawful Acts, Justifiable Acts and Excuses (What conditions permit, justify or excuse otherwise unlawful conduct?)
  - Section III—Extenuating and Aggravating Circumstances (What conditions call for partial reduction or increase of the penalty for unlawful conduct?

Title II, then, deals with relatively objective questions of criminal liability—what acts, committed by whom, in what circumstances, are necessary to a finding of guilt; Title III deals with the more subjective question of blameworthiness: was the state of mind of the individual when he acted such that he deserves to be punished, and if so, to what extent?

In looking, then, to see if possibly there is more law in the Code on the issues noted in the Afar's case, one can make some prediction where it is likely to be found. The relationship of "cause" apparently required by Article 522 seems an objective condition of liability, hence likely to be described in Title II rather than Title III. Indeed, one finds in Chapter I of Title II Article 24, "Relationship of Cause and Effect." Questions of negligence, intention, necessity and self-defense—having to do with state of mind and, possibly, excuse—one could expect to find dealt with in Title III, Chapter II. Looking at the titles of the articles in that Chapter, it is easy to mark the following ones as likely to be relevant: Article 57, Principle; Criminal Fault and Accident; Article 58, Criminal Intention; Article 59, Criminal Negligence; Article 64, Acts

Required or Authorized by Law; Article 71, Necessity; Article 72, Excess of Necessity; Article 74, Self-Defence; Article 75, Excess in Self-Defence.

Finally, one can guess that a definition of the term "house," which might be important for applying Article 524 in the Afar's case, is unlikely to be found in the General Part. Although the word might appear in several places in the Code, and a uniform definition could be of substantial importance as will shortly appear, what is involved is hardly a general principle of penal law. A definition of "house" will not help us to determine, in general, the subjective or objective conditions for guilt in penal cases, nor will it be of general use in determining the degree or measure of punishment. Accordingly, it has no place in the General Part.

It remains to take this body of "possibly relevant law," four Special Part articles and a number of General Part articles, and interpret them—use them—in the case at hand. One would have to ask whether the meaning of each of the articles, or all of them together, is entirely clear; what the relationships between them are; what is the appropriate legal outcome. What follows is addressed to these interpretational tasks, first as regards individual Code articles, and then in the larger context of the Code as a whole.

III. THE VERBAL LIMITS OF A LEGISLATIVE RULE [3]

Once he has found a possibly relevant provision, the first question a judge is likely to ask is "What meaning could the words of this statute have?" In a particular case, this determination will commonly take the form of the question, "Could the words of this statute apply to this case?"

The answer to this question may often seem easy. The legislature may have spoken clearly, or the case may be one of those which would come within any reasonable meaning of the words of the statute. Still, the question is one which confronts a lawyer or judge every time he seeks to discover what legal rule to apply to the question before him. The law is a profession of words. Words are an essential means of human communication, and the only means commonly used in legislation. Whether he is conscious of it or not, the first step a lawyer takes to ascertain the meaning of some statutory rule is to read it and ask himself what the words mean.

One may ask, of course, whether and to what extent the words of a statute matter. Under some governments, the whim of an official matters more than any words written in laws. The world has known systems in which legal issues were settled by reference to custom, previous court decisions, or what the judge believed to be just. This is less arbitrary than the first case, but is still a situation where written rules are not paramount. Even if one were to agree that, in general, written rules govern, there would be the question how far one can reason with the statutes enacted. For example, if a statute forbids threatening someone with "a knife," can one apply it to a case where someone is threatened with a gun? Both are dangerous weapons which could cause a person severe fright; can one use this analogy to apply the statute to a case the wording of the statute overlooks?

The Ethiopian Constitution makes it very clear that neither whim nor judges are, in the first instance, the proper source of law. It chooses a legislative system in which the primary responsibility for stating rules rests in the Emperor and Parliament. The enactment of the code system, in which all laws are put in writing, is a natural outgrowth of that choice. One cay say that in Ethiopia the words of statutes are at least the starting point for any discussion of a legal issue.

This leaves the question whether the words of statutes, by their possible meaning, also limit the discussion of a legal issue—whether "a knife" can also include "a gun," if the purpose of the statute seems to require or permit this. In the case of the Ethiopian Penal Code, words do impose such limits on courts, for reasons that will be examined in detail later on.[4] The application of a penal statute is, in general, limited to the cases indicated by its words, given a meaning which they will bear. Since this is the case, it is obviously quite important to know what the meaning of any given word or collection of words might be.

This will often be a much harder question that might at first appear. For it is generally recognized that words are often if not always an imprecise means of communication. They may mean one thing to the person who speaks them, something else to one who hears them, and have still a third meaning in common usage. Yet the law may make sharp differences; freedom or years in jail may turn on the meaning they are given. The imprecision exists because most words describe general concepts, at varying levels of abstraction. There is a "core meaning" of clear instances to which most men would agree that particular abstraction applies; a "fringe" area, where there might be substantial disagreement whether it applies or not; and another clear area where most would agree it did not apply.

As an example, one could take the word "house," which could be significant for the application of Penal Code provisions, for example Article 524(a). This Article applies to a person who "kills another . . . in resisting the violation, by force or trickery, of the privacy of his house or outbuildings, there being no true state of necessity or legitimate self-defense . . ." "House" is a fairly precise word, and there will be a large measure of agreement as to what is a "house" and what is not. A permanent, one-room chica building, in which a family is living, is within the core meaning of "house." That is, almost everyone, if not everyone, would agree that such a structure could be called a "house." And almost everyone would agree that a fenced compound, without a roof, in which animals were kept for the night is not a "house." One begins to encounter uncertainty, however, in considering whether a flat in a large apartment building in the city is a "house." Plainly one is in the fringe area of disagreement when the issue is whether an Afar's dwelling, or a tent, or a building in the course of construction is a "house." Certainly, there would be room for disagreement on this issue, if more than one man was asked for his opinion. Parliament would doubtless have discovered such disagreement among its members if it had stopped to consider the issue—which it almost certainly did not—and lawyers will discover that they disagree on the issue if it ever becomes important in court, which it may not.

Although even a fairly precise word like "house" has a fringe of uncertainty, it is not hard to find other words, also significant for some Penal Code purposes, where the fringe of uncertainty is quite large. These more abstract words, such as "gang," "numerous," and "begin," evoke very indefinite responses in the person who hears them. It may be very significant to know whether a person was a member of a "gang" or not, or acted together with "numerous" other persons. But how many are "numerous" or a "gang"? One is not. Eighteen certainly are. But what about two? three? four? five? six? seven? It can confidently be expected that among the readers of this article will be people who choose each of the above figures as "the point" at which the abstractions "gang" or "numerous" begin to apply.

Finally, there are some words which are so abstract as to be almost all fringe, to present no areas of certain agreement. These are words which call on our emotions, such as "unjust," "immoral," "reasonable," "good," and "evil." The history of mankind has been a history of often violent and rarely rational disagreement about what such words mean. Thankfully, such words do not appear often in the Penal Code, and when they do, they find some explanation in the words around them. We shall have reason later to ask whether it is ever permissible to use them in penal legislation.[5]

[5] The discussion is at Section X-B within, p. 1963 ff.

The conclusion to be drawn for now is that whenever legislation uses words, as it must, it necessarily creates these fringe areas, in which different men will understand its words in different ways. In many, perhaps most, cases, there will be agreement that the statute does or does not apply. But for every statute there will be cases to which that statute could be applied or not, depending entirely upon how the words which compose it are understood. In such a case, no meaning which is logically consistent with what the legislature has said can be out of the question. The judge has a choice among the several meanings which the statute permissibly has. He has to decide which best fits the context, the jobs the statute was meant to do, the expectations of the parties or the like. Of course, if the judge does not understand that he is choosing, what choices are open to him, and what may be the consequences of each, it cannot be said that he is doing his job very well, for he will be doing it blindly.

Thus, one of the first tasks of interpretation is to be sensitive to the fringes of uncertainty which a statute always has—to be aware of the range of permissible choice within the possible meanings of the statutory words. Suppose that the Afar of the previous hypothetical was charged with homicide and argued that he should be charged under Article 524 rather than some more serious provision, because he was defending the privacy of his "house." One judge might say, "This is a house!"; another, "This is not a house." They would simply be shouting at each other if they did not realize that the word "house" itself gave no answr in this case—that either choice was open to them, and that they would have to find some basis other than the word "house" to decide what meaning the statute should be given, that is, whether or not it should be applied to the Afar's case.

These "fringe areas" of uncertainty in the meaning of words provide one source of uncertainty in statutes, but not the only one. We have been assuming that one word, like "house" or "numerous," represents only one abstraction, and have said that uncertainty comes at the edges of this abstraction, where not all men will agree whether it applies. But one word frequently represents more than one abstraction, or core meaning, and in such a case the interpreter is faced with the additional difficult task of determining which or how many of these several meanings should be given to the word. The abstract concepts of the law, such as "intent" or "act," are very often such words, just because there has been so much argument and disagreement about what they ought to mean. In the context of a criminal code, the word "intent" might mean a wish to accomplish a certain forbidden result, a willingness to do so, a wish to violate the law, a willingness to do so a wish to do "evil" or inflict "harm," a willingness to do so, and so forth. The interpreter must decide—that is to say, choose—how many and which of the accepted definitions are to be used. Where the word is an important one, the statute will very often help him in this by seeking to define it. Definitions of "intent," for example, are given in Article 58. Still, the judge will often be faced with a choise of possible meanings. Even if he is unaware that he has a choice, the fact that he decides the case in a certain way necessarily implies that he accepted any definition that is logically necessary for his result, and rejected any definition that is logically inconsistent with it. He cannot decide without attributing some meaning to the statute before him.

In concentrating on the inherent vagueness of language, we should not lose sight of the fact that we often do manage to communicate with each other rather well. We believe in and act on the premise that clarity of expression usually is possible. Most cases will probably involve the "core" of statutory meaning, where there will be little disagreement about what the legisiature has said regarding the case at hand. The fact that this article concentrates, as it must, on cases where the law is unclear should not make us lose sight of this truth.

Moreover, not all cases of imprecision in statutes are caused by unavoidable imprecision of language. There may be cases where the legislature simply has not adopted the clearest possible mode of expression. It may not have been able to agree precisely on some issue—for example, whether three, four, five, or six constituted a "gang"—and decided to pass its disagreement on to the courts in the form of an uncertain word. It may not have been aware that the wording it adopted was ambiguous or vague, and could have been made more precise by a definition or more careful wording. It may have engaged in careless thinking about the dimensions of the problem before it. It may have decided consciously to make its rule vague and uncertain, perhaps to frighten people into obeying it, or to leave room for the courts to adapt the rule as society changes. For any of these reasons, the legislature may have passed on to the courts more work than, in the abstract, it was required or wise to do.

There is substantial agreement in modern thought, however, that some legislative imprecision is unavoidable. In the first place, if words by their nature are imprecise, sentences constructed out of words will also, necessarily, have areas of imprecision. A legislature can to a certain extent eliminate these areas of imprecision by preferring precise words over imprecise ones, or by adopting definitions which point in the direction of its thinking. It can never completely eliminate imprecision, however, and at some point the job of explaining what it meant would begin to take too many words. Such explanations would take time perhaps better given to other tasks, and could themselves be a source of confusion. Secondly, a legislature necessarily works in the abstract. It does not have the advantage of the concrete cases which come before the judge, but deals with the general problems of society that are called to its attention. It would be unreasonable to expect the legislature to consider and decide in advance every hypothetical case that might arise under its enactment; it is hard work enough to frame language which will deal satisfactorily with the major problems with which it is concerned. Statutes which attempted to do more would be unmanageably large, and might introduce more difficulties than they solved.

One comes to the conclusion, then, that not only do difficult problems of interpretation arise more often than one might think, but that this job is an entirely natural one for courts to perform. At one point, political theorists were fond of saying that "The courts should be only the mouth that speaks the law," and that judicial creation of law was an abuse of power to be sternly avoided;[6] The legislature determined the law, and the courts merely applied it to the facts of cases which came before them. We see now that this cannot always be the case. The legislature's pronouncements, necessarily, will leave areas of choice, often substantial, in which the judge must decide what the law is to mean. The inability and undesirability of the legislature to perceive and settle every conceivable case in advance, the necessity that it frame its enactments to fit a few clearly seen "main cases," also imply that there will be many cases in which the judge must choose what is to be the law. In some cases—most, if the legislature has done its job well— it will be clear that the law does or does not apply, that a particular structure is or is not a "house." In others, however, the law will be unclear—the judge will be free, so far as statutory language is concerned, to choose either for application or against it. By his choice, by sending a man to jail for more or fewer years or by freeing him, he makes the law.

If this is true, then it would seem that the judge who seeks to find in statutory language a rigid, single answer to every case is closing his eyes to reality. There may be cases for which the statute provides answers but there are also cases for which it does not. When one of the latter cases is presented, it is useless to think that the answer will be found in the "true" definition of a disputed word, unless the legislature has provided one; rather, the job of the judge is to ask. How shall I define this word? That is, as stated above, he first seeks not the one and only true meaning of the statute, but to discover what is the range of possible meanings in the case before him. He then has to choose one, to decide the case. Before making the choice, he may ask, in the words of a Swedish jurist, "Where do I go for guidance?"[7]

IV. LEGISLATIVE PURPOSE AS AN AID TO UNDERSTANDING STATUTES AND MAKING CHOICES [8]

Almost instinctively, the interpreter's first response will be to ask "What is this statute all about? What was it meant to do?" That is, he will make several important assumptions: (1) that legislative activity is purposeful, that is, undertaken to accomplish some social ends or goals; (2) that the language and form of legislation are chosen to reflect these purposes; and (3) that application of a statute should be limited to the cases indicated by its purposes, so that, in connection with our earlier assumption, for a statute to apply, its words and purposes should both bear on the case at issue. These assumptions are important enough to merit examination.

The first, that legislative activity is purposeful, reflects a commonly shared attitude towards life in general. We believe that there is some reason in what we do—some goal towards which our activity is directed. Legislatures, in particular, are constituted to formulate directives—laws—on important issues of social policy. It is what we expect them to do; it would be ground for serious criticism of a legislature if it were found doing something else. Almost as soon as we see a statute, we ask "What is this for? What purpose does it have?"

The second assumption, that the words and form of legislation are chosen to reflect its purposes, is subject to the objection—as indeed is the first—that sometimes legislatures are devious, or even irrational. If the assumption were not generally true, however, the legislature, and not the assumption, would be generally held to blame. Again, this is part of what we expect a legislature ought to do. Indeed, when courts consistently act on this assumption, and treat the words and form of statutes as if they embody its purpose, they help to make the assumption valid. The legislature will quickly learn to make the words and form of its statutes conform to its purposes if it is aware of this court practice and wishes its purposes to be enforced.

The third assumption, that legislative purposes are binding on courts, like the assumption that legislative words are binding on courts, reflects a certain attitude on the proper relationship between courts and legislature in the Ethiopian governmental structure. Since it is in the nature of a limitation on judicial freedom, we postpone examination of it until later in this piece. For the moment, it will simply be accepted as a necessary element of interpretational choices.

Before seeing how one might discover legislative "purposes," it is important to define the term as it is to be used in this article. By "purpose" is meant the end or goal which the legislation in question has in sight—the overall regulatory impact which it appears the legislature meant the statute to have. Thus, Article 1 of the Penal Code states that the "purpose of the criminal law," using the word in this sense, "is to insure order, peace and the security of the State and its inhabitants for the public good." This use of the word purpose, and any discussion of legislative purpose, is to be distinguished from what one sometimes hears referred to as "legislative intent." Very often one hears what may be a permissible question, such as "What would the legislature have done about this problem if it had thought of it?" turn into a very dubious one, "What did the legislature intend to do about the problem before us?" In the last question, the speaker is implying that on some specific question whose answer is unclear from the statute itself, the legislative body actually intended to provide an answer, which, if only it could be found, would solve the case. This notion that there is some preordained answer which has only to be found is a very appealing one, for judges do not like to admit that sometimes they make law by their decisions. Nonetheless, it must be rejected. We have already seen that legislatures very frequently do not even think of, much less solve, specific problems which may present themselves to judges but find no clear answer in legislative words. Whether, indeed, one can ever speak of a large body of men, or a majority of them, as having an "intent" on a specific question not clearly settled by a statute's words is very dubious. It will be hard enough for the judge to determine the regulatory policies and goals of an enactment in the large, without his trying to pretend to himself that the enactment provides only one answer to a problem which his research has already shown could be answered in several different ways without departing from permissible meanings of the statute's words.

[8] That legislative purpose should be consulted in determining statutory meaning is now a commonplace observation, which would be made or assumed by any reputable commentator. The argument today is over how this should be done. The following works give an introduction to some of the techniques more commonly proposed:

Indeed, an inquiry into legislative purposes will often do no more than help the interpreter to identify the clear cases of application and non-application, and indicate some considerations which may be helpful for resolving the cases in between. This is so, first, because purposes will often be stated or revealed at a level of generality so great that they will not be very helpful in solving any particular problem. To say, for example, that the purpose of the Penal Code is to control objectionable social behavior, or even that the purpose of the provisions regarding homicide is to distinguish on a rational basis varying degrees of culpability regarding the killing of a human being, is not very helpful for solving the particular problem of the relationship between Articles 523 and 524. Only as purposes of considerable specificity can be inferred from a statute will these purposes help materially to resolve the possibilities which face the interpreter.

Second, just as words are imprecise and may permit a wide variety of meanings, so are purposes likely to be uncertain in their formulation and scope. Very often, if not always, a legislature will be seeking multiple and partially conflicting goals; or members may have been forced to compromise or obscure the policies they prefer as individuals in order to reach agreement; or the legislature simply may not have considered the relationships and consequences, of the various policies it enacted. In the Penal Code, for example, the purpose of insuring "the security of the State" may often conflict with that of assuring "the security of . . . its inhabitants." Among the events which the latter would wish to be secure from are unwarranted punishments, or the risk of being put on trial although innocent of wrong-doing. In the short run, at least, measures to insure the security of the State might substantially infringe on these interests. Thus, there is an almost necessary inexactness and ambiguity about legislative policy, which should make the interpreter hesitant to formulate purposes too precisely, or to extend any one purpose he may find in a statute to its maximum possible extent.

These cautions, however, should not be permitted to obscure the basic point—that within the limits of common sense and justice, those who are engaged in the business of interpretation instinctively and universally find it meaningful to ask "Now what is this law all about? What policy was it enacted to enforce? What problem was it addressed to? What change or result was it to bring about?" In a case where statutory language alone is insufficient to answer the question whether a particular statute is to be applied or not, an investigation of statutory purpose carefully considered, may at least serve to narrow the areas of doubt; if it does not produce a single, "correct" answer, it may at least assist the judge to avoid an objectionable result and provide some hints as to how he may exercise his freedom to choose among the permissible ones.

To take a concrete example, suppose again the case of the Afar who killed another man when he found the other taking parts of his dwelling from the back of his camel. The Afar has been charged under Article 523, but insists he can be convicted only under Article 524, because he was "resisting the violation, by force or trickery, of the privacy of his house. . . ." Let us suppose also that you agree that the words of the statute could be given the meaning the Afar urges, and are wondering whether they should be given that meaning.

A reading of the two statutes informs you that both Article 523 and Article 524 deal with homicide, and that Article 523 will apply in "circumstances other . . . than those specified in Article 524." The penalty provided by Article 524 is quite a bit lower than that stated in Article 523 (although you know from your search for possible relevant law that the latter penalty might be mitigated under the provisions relating to legitimate self-defense. A clear case in which Article 524 would apply might be if the Afar had erected his dwelling and was living in it when the deceased tried to intrude. A clear case in which Article 524 would not apply, and Article 523 would, might be if the deceased was trying to take the Afar's unloaded camel. What purpose might the legislature have had in making this distinction? What characteristics does a "house" have in Ethiopian society, as distinct from a camel, which would lead the legislature to require that violent acts in its defense must be excused to a considerable degree, while the degree of excuse for violent acts in the defense of other property is left much less certain?

Here are only a few of the possible answers to these questions: There may have been a rash of murders in connection with house-breakings which had come to the attention of the legislature; they were dealing with a problem of general occurrence. The legislature might have considered that a "house" was the kind of property having the greatest monetary value to Ethiopians, and that a killing in defense of it was therefore substantially excusable. Or, it may have considered that Ethiopians had a deep emotional need for privacy, and would consider any intrusion into the place where they were dwelling as provoking; a killing thus provoked should be substantially excused. Or, the legislature may have been aware, because of one or more of the above considerations, that many Ethiopians considered such killings completely justified, and they have wished to make it clear by a special enactment that this was not true; thus, by enacting Article 524, it may have been announcing special limits on the application of the doctrine of legitimate defense to the defense of property—it may have been emphasizing that such acts were to be punished, rather than that they were to be punished only lightly.

In order to make wise choices among these or other possible policies, any of which might be embodied in the provision, it is necessary to know something both about the general characteristics of Ethiopian society and about the framework and assumptions of a code. The author knows far less about the former than his Ethiopian readers will. It is to the latter considerations, which may prove helpful in determining both purpose and meaning, that the article now turns.

V. SOME CONSIDERATIONS OF STRUCTURE [9]

A. The Penal Code Was Enacted in Code Form

The statement that the Penal Code was enacted in code form might not seem to have much significance for interpretation of any particular provision. In fact it does, because of what is implied b the use of "code" form. As used in Ethiopia and Europe, this form is usually reserved for a body of laws which are drafted at one time, by one person or a closely cooperating body of draftsmen, with the intention of stating clearly and systematically all the rules applicable in a given area of law—for example, penal law. This description certainly fits the Ethiopian Penal Code, and may be contrasted with the situation reflected in the Consolidated Laws of Ethiopia. The statutes in the Consolidated Laws were drafted at many different times, by different bodies of draftsmen, to cover a very diverse body of subjects in an essentially random manner. That is, the legislator in these laws was dealing with small problems, as they arose, and was making no particular effort to achieve unity, consistency, or thorough coverage in a broad area of law. The contrast between the characteristics of a code and the characteristics of an amorphous body of statutes such as the Consolidated Laws reveals a number of helpful assumptions which may be made in interpreting a code.

1. It is fair to attribute consistency to the Penal Code, and thus to seek consistency in results under the Code.

The Penal Code was drafted in one effort by a body of draftsmen, principally one man, in an attempt to state clearly and concisely the complete system of penal law which was to be applied in Ethiopia. This effort suggests, further, that the draftsmen would have attempted to construct a rational framework for their code. One would expect that this framework would produce answers for the major problems of criminal law, and that these answers would accord with Ethiopian notions of justice and fair play. One would expect that the framework would not produce contradictory or conflicting answers for the same problem, and that cases which Ethiopians regarded as similar would not be treated in conflicting ways or lead to contradictory results. That is to say, given our knowledge of the circumstances which produced the Code, we feel justified in treating it as a rational system, one which will lead to results which are not contradictory and which can be explained in a manner conformable to Ethiopian notions of justice. If we could not do this, we would think the drafters had done a poor job indeed. It is what they were asked to do.

If consistency is one of the characteristics of the Penal Code—or, to put it another way, if the achievement of a consistent system of law is one of the purposes behind enactment of the Penal Code—then in interpreting the Penal Code one should both reason from an assumption of consistency in its provisions and seek consistency in applying it. This means, first, that one should never try to interpret a Penal Code provision in the abstract. It must always be examined in its relationship to the other provisions of the Code, in order to see what part it might play in the overall scheme. We have already seen this process, in part, in our discussion of the relationship of Articles 523 and 524 in connection with the case of the Afar. That is, we assumed that Article 523 and Article 524, both of which are concerned with a form of "homicide," are concerned with different types of homicide, and that there should be an understandable and ascertainable basis for deciding what homicide falls under which provision. A second implication which may be drawn from the Code's internal consistency is that if the meaning of one provision of the Code has been established or is clear, one can reason from the meaning of that provision to what ought to be the meaning of another. Thus, knowing the meaning of the word "house" in Article 524 and the relationship of Article 524 to Article 523 may help to establish the meaning of the word "house" in Article 542 and the relationship of Article 542 to Articles 538 and 539. Thus, one can properly look for patterns, for a structural framework, or for common features which may help to elucidate the Code's meaning. Article 524, an extenuated form of homicide, refers to resisting the violation of the privacy of a house, as does Article 542, an extenuated form of the injury. There is a strong suggestion in this fact that the provisions should be given the same meaning—that they should be interpreted consistently.

The same conclusions could not be reached under the Consolidated Laws. If a Proclamation of 1956 had a provision similar to a provision in another Proclamation, say of 1963, one would have to be very careful about reasoning from one to the other, even if the two Proclamations dealt with the same subject. Were they drafted by the same persons? Was consistency an object? Is there a common structural framework or social context? The answer to each of these questions is likely to be in the negative, and thus to refute any hypothesis of common meaning. If we find that the hypothesis of consistency is valid and helpful in the case of the Penal Code, it is because of the peculiar and important process which gave it birth.

This suggests that any case where unity of effort was lacking may be an important exception to the hypothesis of consistency in the Penal Code. For example, if one knew that there had been legislative amendments to the Code, either at the time of the draft or thereafter, one could not be certain of consistency in the areas affected by the amendments, unless a serious and thorough effort to produce it had been made. Unfortunately, the Penal Code bears evidence that in the past such efforts have been lacking. The draftsman originally provided in the General Part that the consent of an injured person was a defense to a criminal prosecution, except in certain specified cases. Other provisions of the Special Part, for example Article 542(1)(c), were written to reflect these exceptions. It was subsequently decided to change the General Part provision to make consent no defense; this decision is reflected in Article 66, which states that "the consent of an injured party . . . does not relieve the offender of criminal liability." It appears, however, that Special Part provisions such as Article 542(1)(c) were never rewritten to reflect this change. In such a case, where the legislature has apparently abandoned the effort to produce consistency, it would be foolhardy for an interpreter to assume he can find it. Of course, he may still find reason to attempt to minimize the legislative error by seeking to produce consistency, if he can, through his interpretations. But this will be an entirely creative role.

2. It is fair to assume that language usage is consistent throughout the Code.

The assumption that language usage will be consistent throughout a code is only a particular example of the overall assumption of consistency, but deserves special mention because of its importance. What the assumption means is that if a particular word—say, "house"—can be established to have a certain meaning when it is used at one point in a code, it is at least likely to have the same meaning at any other point in that code.

We saw before that most if not all words have a fringe of uncertainty about their meaning. Different men will understand them in different ways. It is at least likely, however, that any one man—or group of men working closely together on a rigidly drafted legal document—will attribute a fairly fixed meaning to any particular word; each time he uses that word, he will use it in the same way. Knowing that statutory draftsmen strive for consistency of expression and word usage, as they do, increases the confidence that can be put in this assumption. Again, the assumption could not be made about a word appearing in different items of the Consolidated Laws; in this case it will have been written at different times by different men for different purposes, so that there is no reason to attribute a uniformity of meaning.

It should be pointed out that this assumption has double consequences. One, already seen, is that if the meaning of a word is uncertain in a particular context in the Code, its meaning can be discovered from the meaning which the same word has elsewhere in the Code, if its meaning is better established by these other uses. The second consequence is that once a meaning is given to a word appearing at one point in the Code, that meaning is likely to be carried over in following cases to other points in the Code where the same word appears. Thus, the principle of consistency not only helps one draw assistance from past interpretations; it also warns that one's own interpretation is likely to be extended to other parts of the Code. Thus, interpretations should not be made in view of one provision only, but should take account of the principle of consistency by considering all appearances of the point in issue throughout the Code. What effect one must ask, will an interpretation have elsewhere in the Code?

It cannot be too often repeated that, as is the case for every other suggestion made in this article, the correctness of this assumption in any particular case is only probable. It is not certain. Draftsmen, like the rest of us, are human. They make mistakes. Even though they work hard for consistency, so that it is usually appropriate to assume that words are consistently used, they sometimes fail, and lapse into inconsistency. This danger is particularly great for certain words expressing legal conclusions, such as "property," "act" and "intent." These words have a great variety of accepted meanings, which depend heavily on the context in which they are used. One should always be very careful to see whether the draftsmen have succeeded at the very difficult job of using such words clearly and consistently. Moreover, in Ethiopia there is the special consideration that the Amharic codes on which the courts rely are translations from an English or French original. The draftsman's hard work to obtain consistency in using language can easily be lost if the translator or translators are not sensitive to this problem and do not themselves work hard for the same goal.

3. At least initially, one may seek solutions to all problems within the framework of the Code.

Since a Code is intended to be a complete statement of the law on a particular subject, one may assume, at least initially, that there are no large gaps or holes in it—that every problem in the area of law to which the code relates can find some solution within its framework. As an attempt to set down a comprehensive body of rules, a code is likely to take account of all the major problems on that subject, at least if it is as well drafted as the Ethiopian Penal Code was. It follows that in solving a legal problem on that subject, one can start on the assumption that a solution may be reasoned out or found within the framework of the code.

This assumption is particularly strong in the case of the Ethiopian Penal Code, in which the drafter has essayed a complete statement of doctrine in the General Part, along with the catalogue of crimes in the Special Part. Thus, while certain European Codes leave a variety of doctrinal issues to courts for elaboration—for example, the defenses of necessity and responsibility—the Ethiopian Code seeks to elaborate a rule on all issues which might arise regarding guilt or degree of punishment.

It would be a mistake to take this observation so far as to deny that judges have any creative role, to state that the Code excludes judicial creativeness. As already has been noted, the legislature is working with an imperfect medium of communication, language. The legislature does not foresee, and could not be required to foresee, every possible case to which its product might apply. It is the judge who will get such cases, and will have to decide them. All that can and should be said is that the attempt at comprehensiveness and coherency offers an incentive and rationale for seeking results within its terms.

4. It is fair to interpret the code to avoid redundancies between provisions

In a simple collection of statutes passed at many different times and for many different reasons, such as the Consolidated Laws, one might almost expect there to be a certain amount of redundancy between provisions. The legislature passing one statute might not be aware of another, passed many years before to deal with a slightly different problem. Even if they were aware of it, they might not see how someone from the outside would think the two could conflict. In the presence of such a conflict, one might have to consider whether one statute was meant to repeal the other in part or in whole; it could be very difficult to determine what the legislature intended their relationship to be, if it had any intent on that issue at all. The bulk of the work on the Consolidated Laws has been in determining just such difficult questions.

Unlike a collection of statutes, a code is written all at one time. The draftsman, who intends to be clear and concise, will have intended each provision he wrote to have some unique function. He would not knowingly include some superfluous provision or repeat something already provided for, since the only effect of this would be to confuse. Thus, just as the unitary character of a Code and the effort its authors have made to achieve consistency justify an assumption that words are used in the same way throughout, these same factors justify the assumption that apparent redundancies between provisions are unintended and may be eliminated by interpretation. Thus, when one finds two articles which seem to govern the same facts, one may look for an interpretation which will give to each a separate area of application.

For example, Article 594(2) authorizes rigorous imprisonment for the person who "deliberately performs (an indecent) act in (the) presence (of an infant or young person)." Article 608(2) provides only for simple imprisonment for the person who "knowingly performed (an obscene) act . . . in the presence of infants or young persons." It would seem that these provisions were redundant, or almost so, since in ordinary usage the words "deliberately" and "knowingly," which mark the only real verbal difference between the two provisions, have approximately the same meaning. By hypothesis, however, we must assume that these articles were meant to have separate functions—as, indeed, the differing penalties also suggest. We must look for those functions someplace other than the language itself.

One must, however, distinguish this case, where apparent redundancy should be avoided by interpretation, from cases of intentional partial overlap among closely related provisions. The language of Articles 594(2) and 608(2) is so similar that one fails to see any element which might be required for the offense under the one, but not the other; moreover, the two articles are somewhat separated from each other in the Code's organization, which implies that they are not clearly related in function. This apparent, inexplicable redundancy should be avoided by interpretation if it is at all possible to do so. On the other hand, Articles 630 and 635, describing ordinary and aggravated theft, are a good example of the kind of partial overlap which the draftsman has often intentionally introduced into the Code's structure. He has foreseen that theft may occasionally be committed under such circumstances as to merit unusually severe punishment. It is still theft—that is, all the elements of Article 630 must be satisfied—but it is aggravated by the presence of one or more of the additional elements described by Article 635. Thus, any person who could be convicted for aggravated theft under Article 635 could also be convicted for ordinary theft under Article 630, if the prosecutor for some reason chose to charge him with the ordinary offense. There is an overlap here, in the sense that two provisions, with differing penalties, could be applied to the same criminal acts. This, however, is not a case of complete redundancy, where two statutes seem to match identically in their coverage; there is an obvious relationship between the two provisions to explain the overlap which seems to exist. Indeed, even though the prosecutor could bring under Article 630 a prosecution which properly falls under Article 635, we might consider that he was abusing his powers if he often followed this practice. Where this partial overlap among closely related provisions appears, there will always be some unique element, such as the aggravating circumstances of Article 635, to show the intended distinction.

B. The Organization of the Code

1. The formal structure

As we have seen in Part II, in drafting the Code the draftsmen created a structural framework, or organization, within which to express their conclusions regarding criminal policy. This organization consists of a series of subdivisions of increasing specificity, each with a title reflecting the place of that subdivision within the Code's structure. In Part II, we saw how to use this structure to find possibly relevant law; here, we will see how it can be used to help understand—interpret—the law.

The organization can be used in this way because the place of any article in the structure of the Penal Code gives important indications of its purposes, through the titles of the subdivisions to which it belongs. As an example of how these indications can be used, let us consider further the apparent conflict between Article 594(2) and Article 618(2). A full description of the place of each of these articles in the Penal Code could be given as follows:

Article 594(2) Penal Code:
Part II, Special Part; Book V, Offenses Against Individuals and the Family; Title IV, Offenses against morals and the family; Chapter I, Offenses against morals; Section I, Injury to sexual liberty and chastity; Article 594, Sexual outrages on infants or young persons.

Article 608(2) Penal Code:
Part II, Special Part; Book V, Offenses against Individuals and the Family; Title IV, Offenses against morals and the family; Chapter I, Offenses against morals; Section IV, Offenses tending to corrupt morals; Article 608, Public indecency and outrages against morals.

From this description, one might conclude that the two articles share certain purposes: to identify and prohibit specific offenses against individuals and the family, in particular, offenses against morals. In their more particular purposes, however, the articles seem to be distinct: the function of Article 594 appears to be to deal with acts which are injurious to sexual liberty and chastity of individuals, in particular, the sexual liberty and chastity of infants or young persons; the function of Article 608 appears to be to deal with acts which may be injurious to the morals of the public at large—that is, which tend to corrupt them—in particular, public indecency and acts offending public morals. One provision is quite specific and deals with what the legislature characterizes as an actual injury to the sexual interests of particular individuals; the other is much less specific, and deals with the possibility of injury to the diffuse sexual interests of the public as a whole.

This analysis suggests at least a possible distinction between the language of Article 594(2), relating to one who "deliberately performs," and the language of Article 608(2), relating to one who "knowingly performs," an indecent act in the presence of a minor. From the language of the articles would deduce that it would be necessary in both cases for the offender to be intentionally performing some sexual act on himself or a third person, in the presence of an infant or young person, knowing that that person is there. Can one go further and say that, in some cases, this activity involves a direct injury to the sexual interests of the infant or young person, (Article 594), whereas in others it will only threaten to corrupt him (Article 608)? There might be some cases where the infant was forced or enticed to be present—where the sexual acts were performed "for his benefit," or with the intention of involving him or affecting him. In other cases, the presence of the infant or young person may have been accidental so far as the offender was concerned; he may have had no desire to have the infant or young person present, or to involve him in any way, but merely failed to desist from his activity when he became aware of the other's presence. The purposes of Article 594, as indicated by its place in the Code's table of organization, suggest that it should apply to the first kind of case; those of Article 608 suggest that it should apply to the second.

2. The Relationship of the General and Special Parts

a. In general.

Perhaps the single great omission of the Ethiopian Penal Code is its failure to state expressly the relationship between its General Part, Part I, and its Special Part, Part II. Article 3, al. 2 states "that the general principles embodied in this Code are applicable to (Police regulations and special laws of a penal nature) except as otherwise expressly provided therein"; and Article 690, the first article of Part III of the Code, the Code of Petty Offenses, states that "In all cases where the provisions of this Book (the General Part of the Code of Petty Offenses) are either silent or contain no contrary indications or do not provide exceptions, the principles and rules of the General Part of the Penal Code shall apply to petty offences . . . due regard being had to the nature of the case, as well as to the spirit and purposes of the law." One is left to infer the obvious, as indeed Ethiopian courts have almost uniformly done, that the "principles and rules of the General Part of the Penal Code" also apply to all offenses defined in the Special Part.

The full implications of this rule are not uniformly respected, however, so that it may be helpful to illustrate them by means of a common example. Article 523, seen before in another context, states that "whosoever commits homicide in circumstances other than (aggravated or extenuated circumstances, dealt with in Articles 522 and 524) is punishable with rigorous imprisonment from five to twenty years." Does this article state an intentional offense? Must the intent to commit the offense include an intent to produce death? What does "intent" mean in this case?

The answer to the first question is "Yes, the article does state an intentional offense, even though it does not use the word intent." The General Part, which we have said applied to this and any other article in the Special Part, states, Article 57(1), that an offense must be either intentional or negligent. Article 59(2) of the General Part adds that a negligent act is punishable as an offense "only if the law so expressly provides." This suggests that the word "negligence" must be used someplace in a statute if negligent offenses are to be punished under it, and indeed Article 526 uses this word in connection with homicide. Both because Article 523 does not use the word "negligence" and because that word appears in another article dealing with homicide, which we would presume Article 523 was not meant to duplicate, it must be concluded that Article 523 does not deal with negligent offenses. It therefore must state an intentional offense; that is to say, intent is a necessary element of the offense. The General Part requires this, even though the Special Part provision makes no direct reference to it.

According to the official Amharic version of Article 58(1) and the French draft, the answer to the second question is also "Yes, the notion of intention includes the attitude of intention towards the specific result, in this case death." The answer under the English version is less certain, because of a discrepancy; but as stated at the beginning of this article, we will assume that the Amharic controls. (Indeed, one would argue it should, where it faithfully reflects the French draft, as here.) Thus, the General Part requires not only that there be "intention"—whatever that may be—for a violation of Article 523, but this "intention" must include the happening of a specific result, death. It is possible to cite many cases in which there appears to have been no awareness of this effect of the General Part upon a frequently used provision of the Special Part.[10]

The final question was, "What does the word 'intention' mean in this case?" This is not a question that can be briefly answered, or that will be answered in this article; it is one of those questions on which P. Graven's commentary can be most helpful as a starting point for learning or analysis.[11] But several important points can be made. First, the drafter has made a start at a definition in Article 58. This definition will not convey the same meaning to everyone who reads it, and will have to be interpreted in the cases. The author is not yet aware of any case in which this task of interpretation has been undertaken. Second, because the definition of intention appears in the General Part, and given our assumption of consistency, whatever "intention" means for the

[10] The following examples can all be found at the Haile Sellassie I University Faculty of Law Library, and in Strauss, Supplementary Materials for Penal Law 1967–68 (unpublished, Faculty of Law, Haile Sellassie I University):

Crown v. Osman Omar, A.A.H.Ct., Cr. C 255–58 (accused pushed deceased after drinking with him; "it is evident that (accused) was only relaxing and was not trying to harm the deceased. . . . The Court finds the accused guilty of violating Article 523 . . . since he has caused the death of his friend through his carelessness.").

Crown v. Ibrahim Adams Abatiku, Fed. H.Ct. (Assab), Cr. C. 1–51 (accused struck assailant with a "not large" stick; court concluded that the blow caused death, that "the accused did not commit the act of striking with intention," but acted in excess of self-defense and therefore was guilty under Art. 523).

Crown v. X, Asmara H. Ct., Cr. C. 238–57 (accused struck deceased with stick under provocation; no indication of intent to kill; court convicted, apparently under Art. 523).

Public Prosecutor v. Fikru Birru, H.Ct.A.A., Cr. C. 761–56 (accused hit and then kicked deceased after allegedly being insulted; no indication of intent to kill; conviction under Art. 523).

Crown v. Bekele Kidane, Jimma H.Ct., Cr. C. 7–57 (accused and deceased, both youths were fighting with small sticks at deceased's instigation; no indication of intent to kill; because of deceased's provocation, charge reduced to Art. 524).

Haddis Gebre Igziabher v. Public Prosecutor, Sup. Imp. Ct., Cr. Ap. 28–58 (accused hit deceased with a stick on the back of his neck while trying to recover some grass which deceased allegedly had stolen; deceased apparently hit his head on a stone while falling; no evidence of intent; "in view of the fact that there has been proof as to appellant's killing the deceased (i.e., causing his death,)" conviction under Art. 523 affirmed).

purposes of Article 523, it will also mean for any other article of the Special Part to which it is relevant. The "intended result" may vary with the crime—death for Article 523, injury for Article 539, etc.—as may other particulars; but the general formula or criteria will have to be the same. This is the second edge of the consistency sword, that the judge must interpret with an eye to the results his interpretation would produce in other cases; he must take account of the demands of consistency as well as use the inferences it makes available to him. Finally, any judge who does undertake to interpret this important concept will find that the words of the definition offer him a fairly wide range of choices of possible meaning. If the techniques suggested by this article are relevant at all, they are as relevant to this task as any other.

b. "In case of conflict, the provision of the Special Part prevails over that of the General Part."

The above phrase, or something like it, is frequently referred to as a maxim of code interpretation. It is, indeed, perhaps the most frequently referred to maxim. This fact tends to reinforce the validity of the maxim, since it means that draftsmen, too, are likely to be aware of it. Knowing that the maxim is likely to be applied, they will put the exceptions to their general rules into more specific provisions, confident that when judges find these exceptions they will say, "The specific prevails over the general," and thus interpret the statute as the draftsmen expected. This fact, in turn, should make judges more confident of the rule.

The rule thus has convenience to recommend it. It also reflects a common sense notion of draftsmanship. Any general rule is likely to have a few special exceptions. But if, as in the Penal Code, a statute is divided into General and Special Parts, it may be quite unwise to list the exceptions in the General Part. Referring to specific cases there will detract from the organization of the whole, and may tend to obscure the purport of the general rule behind the exceptions; the reader will be unable to judge how universal these exceptions are.

The rule is also a sensible accommodation to the likelihood that the drafters will not be able to avoid inconsistencies completely in their work, however hard they try for consistency. In choosing the specific provision over the general one in such a case, one is making the common sense judgment that the drafters were likely to have been thinking more precisely about the narrower issue.

It is very important, however, to hesitate before concluding that there is some inconsistency between the General Part and a provision of the Special Part, and thus leaping to application of the maxim. The overriding assumption frequently mentioned above is that the provisions of the Code are internally consistent. Unless a Special Part provision expressly refers to its exceptional status, this assumption requires that every effort be made to achieve consistency before an "inconsistency" is found. For example, the silence of a Special Part provision should rarely if ever be taken to indicate inconsistency with the General Part. Thus, the fact that Article 523 is silent about "intention" is not in itself reason to conclude that the article is inconsistent with Articles 57–59 and should be applied without reference to intention, despite them. The article can be interpreted consistently with the General Part without distorting its language, and there is no reason to suppose a contrary legislative purpose. Consequently, consistency must be favoured; Article 523 must be construed as embodying an intentional offense.

It is sometimes possible to consider an apparently superfluous or inconsistent Special Part article as in fact explanatory of the General Part provisions it seems to contradict. That is, the Special Part article may serve to illustrate or limit the operation of the General Part provision in an instructive way. One possible example of this may be seen in Article 524, which was discussed at some length above in connection with the "house" of an Afar tribesman. We may now be in a better position to suggest answers to some of the questions put there.

The General Part of the Penal Code includes provisions on legitimate defense and excess of legitimate defense, Articles 74 and 75. These articles recognize that defense of property may be "legitimate defense," entailing no punishment, or "excess of legitimate defense," entailing apparently complete freedom on the part of the judge to reduce penalty. Whether it will be one or the other depends on a judgment whether the person "exceeded the limits of self-defense by using disproportionate means or going beyond the acts necessary for averting the danger." Acts within these "limits" are not published at all; acts outside them are punished to a degree which appears to be entirely at the discretion of the judge.

Dr. Graven, in his commentary on the Penal Code, has complained that Article 524 unnecessarily duplicates Articles 74 and 75, and by providing a specific range of penalties, is inconsistent with them. One readily sees that the crime defined by Article 524, killing "in resisting the violation, by force or trickery, of the privacy of his house . . .," could as easily be characterized as an act of legitimate defense, or perhaps in excess of it; the individual kills while defending property against the unlawful assault of another. Thus, it would appear that the Afar in our hypothetical could as easily be prosecuted under Article 523, and then raise the issue of legitimate defense. If he did this, a judge interpreting Articles 74 and 75 might decide that he had not "exceeded the limits," and so could not be punished at all; or that he had "exceeded the limits." and so could be punished by any penalty from a $1.00 fine to 20 years rigorous imprisonment. Since the General Part provisions seem adequately to cover the case, Dr. Graven concluded that Article 524 was unnecessary; it is inconsistent with the General Part to the extent that it provides a more restricted range of penal alternatives.[12]

A more helpful approach, in the author's view, is to look at Articles 74 and 75 and ask if it is very clear what they mean. Where are the "limits" of legitimate defense? How is a judge to exercise his discretion if he finds they have been exceeded? Have they been exceeded if an Afar kills a man who is trying to steal his house from the back of his camel? If he kills a man who is trying to enter his erected house? If he kills a man who is trying to steal his camel? It should be apparent that if these questions were to be answered by reference to Articles 74 and 75 alone, there might be a great deal of disagreement as to what the answers should be. With this in mind, look again at Article 524. Is it accurate to say that this describes a case or cases in which many Ethiopians—possibly including judges—would feel that killing in retaliation was completely justified? In the author's judgment, such a statement would be accurate. That being so, it appears to him that the function of Article 524, and other articles like it, is not to contradict Articles 74 and 75, but to explain them. The rather abstract language of the General Part provisions—"exceeded the limits." "disproportional means," beyond the acts necessary"—could easily be understood in different ways by different persons or in different parts of the country. As was mentioned at the beginning of this article there is no settled and widely available body of cases, commentary, or other source material which might help to produce uniform results in cases decided at different times and places. To make the language of the General Part more concrete, what the legislature has done is to fix a reference point. It has taken a very common case, and has decided it. It has decided that this case represents an excess of self-defense, and that it deserves the stated range of punishment. This both fixes and emphasizes a moral norm—that killing in the defense merely of property is not justified; it also serves to explain the general articles about legitimate defense in a way that should help a judge to make decisions under them.

As an example, consider the case of an Afar who kills a man who is trying to steal his camel, not his house. He is prosecuted under Article 523, and pleads legitimate defense. Has he "exceeded the limits"? A judge can look at Article 524 and reason from it that the legislature has concluded that someone who killed another in defense of his house exceeded the limits of legitimate defense. He might then conclude that, from an Ethiopian and probably the legislature's point of view, killing someone while defending your house is more excusable than any other killing in the defense of property. If killing in defense of a house is more excusable than killing in defense of a camel, and still is punishable as an exceeding of the "limits," then the Afar's act in killing someone who was stealing his camel must have exceeded the "limits." One limit is known; the taking of life in defense of property exceeds it. If the judge wants to know, "How severely shall I punish him?" Article 524 again serves as a guide. Here is a case where, by hypothesis, the killing is rather understandable: the legislature has provided a penalty of up to five years simple imprisonment. If there were no extenuating circumstance, on the other hand, the judge would condemn the Afar to five to twenty years rigorous imprisonment. It would be reasonable, would it not, to find a penalty in between—calculated by some kind of comparison, however difficult, among social attitudes towards killing over a house, killing over a camel, and killing without excuse?

It is interesting to note that in adopting this interpretive approach, of treating Article 524 as simply an example of a highly flexible general provision, any practical consequence of the questions raised about the meaning of the word "house" in Article 524 has disappeared. Even if the rolled-up dwelling on the camel's back is not a "house" for the purposes of Article 524, the same result can be obtained—i.e., a sentence to the same number of years of simple imprisonment can be imposed—by using Article 523 and the applicable general principle of excess of legitimate self-defense. Indeed, by seeing Article 524 as having as one purpose the indication of a terminal point for the exercise of sentencing discretion under Article 75, it becomes possible to put the question in a much more meaningful form that "Was this a house?" It becomes, "To what extent does the importance of this property to this man excuse his criminal act?" The law often seems to embody distinctions much sharper than those which occur in life, on which substantial questions of liberty depend. When it is possible, as it may be here, to turn a legal question from one of sharp distinctions—"house" or "not house"—into one of how much punishment should be imposed, one makes possible a more meaningful correspondence between the law and the facts of life to which it applies.

3. Interrelationships of provisions regarding particular crimes

There are other, unexpressed organizing principles which can be deduced from a study of the Code, and which may also be helpful in solving particular problems. Only some of them will be mentioned here, and the most important point to be noted about them is this: like almost all of the suggestions of this article, they proceed from assumptions about the rationality and consistency of code drafting—assumptions which were shared by and acted upon by the drafters of the Code. The ultimate and overriding principle of code interpretation is that one always be aware of the context in which a code provision appears, and ready to use that context to illumine the provision in any consistent and rational way.

One such principle is that particular types of common crimes, such as "homicide," "injury," or "theft," are often grouped together in such a way that it will be helpful in determining the meaning of any one article to study the whole group. Even in dealing with as limited a subject as homicide, the legislature is faced with a continuum of possibilities. One person kills out of revenge, another in a barroom fight, a third in response to an insult, a fourth while driving his automobile, and so forth. A reading of all the provisions may suggest the general principles by which the legislature tried to divide this continuum into particular crimes, and thus help in placing a doubtful case or determining the meaning of a doubtful provision. There may be a general article—Article 521, in the case of homicide—which will provide common definitions and help to indicate the legislative approach. One can expect that the individual provisions will be arranged in some logical order, such as from the more serious offense to the less serious; from the most common offense of the given type to the less common; from the general offense to particular varieties of it.

The organization of "homicide" offenses, for example, tends to reinforce the conclusion already reached, that although no mention of intent is made in its words, Article 523 deals only with intentional homicides. The penalties provided in the articles beginning with 522 and ending with 527 generally go from the more to the less severe; as we shall see in more detail shortly, this gives some reason to believe that the offenses are listed in an order which generally goes from the more to the less serious, in the legislature's view. The succession of titles of these articles gives the same impression: "Aggravated Homicide—Homicide in the First Degree"; "Homicide in the Second Degree"; "Extenuated Homicide"; "Instigating or Aiding another to commit Suicide"; "Homicide by Negligence"; "Infanticide." Article 521, which professes to state the "principle" regarding homicide, defines homicide as causing the death of a human being intentionally or by negligence and adds that "the nature and extent of the punishment awarded to him who commits intentional homicide shall be determined according to whether the homicide is simple, or aggravated or extenuated by the circumstances specified in the following Articles." This tells us, first, that our inference that homicide must be either intentional or negligent is correct; second, that our inference that the degree of punishment represents the seriousness of the crime is correct; and third, that the legislature has dealt with three kinds of intentional homicide: simple, aggravated, and extenuated. Article 522 deals with "Aggravated Homicide"; Article 524 deals with "Extenuated Homicide"; Article 523 comes between these articles and imposes a penalty which is less than that of Article 522 but more than that of Article 524. The inference is strong that this is the missing case of "intentional homicide" which "is simple."

4. Cross-references within the Code

Another occasionally helpful organizational feature is the use of parenthetical references to other articles in the Code's text. These references may be taken as an indication by the legislature that these other articles are relevant to the article in which the references are made, so that a reading of the articles it refers to may help one to understand it. Not infrequently, these references are to an entirely different part of the Penal Code, and thus may help reveal relationships which the organizational structure of the Code would otherwise obscure. In other cases, the references may be to a series of provisions for which the article making the reference serves in some respect as a general article.

An example of the latter type of provision is Article 598. This article, entitled "Aggravations to the Offense," comes at the end of the section relating to "Injury to Sexual Liberty and Chastity," comprising Articles 589–598. Article 598 states that "in all cases involving a charge of sexual outrage" the punishment is to be quite severe in the presence of enumerated circumstances, including "(a) where the offender uses violence, intimidation or coercion or in any other way renders the victim incapable of resisting (Articles 591–595) or subjects his victim to acts of cruelty or sadism." Rape, Article 589, and forced abnormal heterosexual sexual behavior, Article 590, are both "cases involving a charge of sexual outrage," since both fall in the section to which Article 598 applies. Both Articles 589 and Article 590 require as an element that the offender use violence, intimidation, or coercion to require a victim to submit to the sexual act described against his will. The questions which might then arise are whether violations of Articles 589 and 590 are subject to the special penalties of Article 598, because of the quoted language of Article 598(a); or whether, on the other hand, the parenthetical reference to Articles 591–595 is meant to exclude application of Article 598(a) to Article 589 and Article 590, insofar as it refers to violence.

The penalties provided in Articles 589 and 590 are different from those stated in Article 598. The parenthetical reference to Articles 591–595 in Article 598(a) would seem to support an interpretation that the penalties of Article 598 do not apply in cases of ordinary violation of Articles 589 and 590. The use of violence, intimidation, or coercion to render a victim incapable of resisting is a necessary element of both offenses; it would not seem consistent to treat it also as an aggravating element. A reading of Articles 591–595, to which Article 598(a) refers, shows that violence, etc., is not a necessary element of any of these offenses; it would therefore be appropriate to treat it as an aggravating element. On the other hand, the use of cruelty or sadism is no more an element of Article 589 and Article 590 than of Articles 591–595; it would thus be appropriate to consider such use as aggravating for any case of sexual outrage. The parenthetical reference to Articles 591–595 applies only to the question of violence; it does not limit the application of Article 598 where cruelty or sadism has been employed. It thus avoids the apparent conflict in penalty provisions in the case where only violence is employed, forwarding the goal of consistency, while allowing the court to apply the penalties of Article 598 to violations of Articles 589 or 590 in the other cases, such as use of cruelty or sadism, which do not seem to be restricted by the parenthetical reference.

5. Where more than one Special Part provision applies to a particular criminal act

The meaning of the Penal Code's provisions relating to concurrence of offenses, chiefly Articles 60–63, 82, and 189–192 of the General Part, is much too complex to be set out in this article. However, it is important to note that these articles, in particular Articles 63 and 189, indicate that in some cases a particular act or result will involve not one, but two or more crimes, and that in such cases, the punishment may be increased over that which could be imposed for any one of the crimes. In considering the purpose, scope or meaning of any one article of the Special Part this possibility that it can be joined with another article to warrant a greater penalty should be kept in mind.

A very common case in which considerations of this sort might be relevant is the following: A and B get into a fight. A hits B, who falls to the ground and hits his head on a rock. The result of this is that his skull is fractured and he dies. A is charged with homicide under Article 523. In such cases, it is very doubtful that A has actually foreseen that B's death would result from his blow, and desired or at least was willing to accept that result. That is, A appears not to have "intended" to kill B within the meaning of Article 58(1). But as has already been noted, Ethiopian courts fairly frequently have overlooked the requirement of intention under Article 523, and have convicted persons such as A and sentenced them to long terms in jail.[13] This no doubt reflects the strong feeling which Ethiopians have against any killing. Nonetheless, one must seriously doubt that the word "intent" can be given a meaning which is consistent both with the definition given in Article 58 and with conviction under Article 523 in such cases. Thus, any Ethiopian judge who agrees that "intent" is a necessary element under Article 523 (and Article 524, for that matter), either will be unable to use Article 523 in such cases, or else will risk giving the word "intent" a meaning which the words of Article 58 will not support.

The concurrence of offenses might come into play in such a case in the following way: Even though the judge may not be satisfied that the accused "intended" to kill the deceased, because he is convinced that accused did not foresee that the deceased might die as a result of their fight, he may be able to find that the accused "intended" to injure the deceased, so that he could be convicted under Article 538 or Article 539. He may also be able to find that the accused was "negligent" in failing to foresee that the fight might result in the deceased's death, so that he could also be convicted under Article 526. Article 63(1) (b) and Article 189(1) (b) may then permit him to convict the accused of both offenses, and sentence him accordingly. The possibility that this alternative will be available should itself encourage interpreters to refrain from stretching the notion of "intent" too far; there is this other way to deal with the case which troubles them.

VI. PENALTY PROVISIONS AND THEIR RELATIONSHIP TO STATUTORY MEANING [14]

We have already had occasion to mention the apparent relationship between the penalty provided by the Code for a particular offense and the seriousness with which that offense was viewed by the legislature. There are countless indications in the Code that this relationship is an intentional one, that the range of punishments provided accurately reflects the legislature's estimate of the seriousness of the crime to which it applies. Thus, in the presence of aggravating circumstances—circumstances which make the crime seem worse—the court is instructed to increase the penalty; in the presence of extenuating circumstances—circumstances which in part excuse or justify the crime or the criminal—the court is instructed to lower the penalty. Simple imprisonment is "applicable to offenses of a not very serious nature committed by persons who are not a serious danger to society" (Article 105); rigorous imprisonment is "applicable only to offenses of a very grave nature committed by offenders who are particularly dangerous to society" (Article 107); and for "minor offenses" the court may simply appeal to the honour of the accused or apply the very slight penalties of the Code of Petty Offenses (Articles 87, 121). It is not hard to deduce from this pattern that a crime subject to sentence ranging from five to twenty years rigorous imprisonment (Article 523) was considered by the legislature as more deserving of punishment than another crime which it made punishable by one to five years rigorous imprisonment (Article 530).

It can be observed that in almost every case the legislature has provided for a range of sentencing alternatives, rather than imposing a single mandatory punishment. The explanation for this is that the legislature is attempting in the Penal Code to compromise between two different points of view regarding criminal policy. On the one hand, it wishes the penalty to reflect the repugnancy of the offense and the measure of harm which has been done or threatened to public or private interests. On the other hand, as reflected in many other parts of the Code, especially Article 86, it wishes the penalty to suit the individual who committed the crime: his personal circumstances, the opportunity for his reform, the dangerousness of his disposition, etc. If only the former consideration were important, one might expect fixed penalties to be imposed for each offense. If only the latter were important, one might expect the judge to be given complete discretion in deciding how to treat a criminal, once convicted. By way of compromise, the legislature has set upper and lower limits on the measure of punishment in accordance with its view of the ugliness of the abstract crime, and delegated to the judge the task of setting a particular disposition within these limits, according to the concrete circumstances of the particular criminal.

If, then, one is faced with a case in which it is uncertain which of several possibly applicable statutes might apply, one line of inquiry which may be very helpful is to consider how seriously Ethiopian society views the type of act with which the defendant is charged. If the choice is between provisions imposing different penalties, one can fairly infer that the provision carrying the most serious penalty was meant to apply to the most heinous offense, and so forth. For example, let us look again at the problem raised earlier about the relationship between Articles 594(2) and 608(2). Article 594 authorizes rigorous imprisonment: Article 608 does not. This tends to indicate that in the former the legislature's purpose was to deal with a more serious offense than in the latter. In the earlier discussion two hypotheticals were developed: (a) a young child is brought to a public place for the purpose of having him witness sexual activity, in the expectation that his watching it may soon entice him to participation: (2) a young child comes across a person engaging in sexual activity in a public place; the person becomes aware of the child's presence, but does not stop. Both hypothetical (1) and hypothetical (2) can be brought within the linguistic meaning of both statues, Articles 594(2) and 608(2). But in view of the assumption that the legislature meant each provision of the Code to have a unique function, we would seek an interpretation that will give each of these provisions a different function.

It would seem that most Ethiopians would view the act in hypothetical (1) as being of "a very grave nature" and the person who committed it as being "particularly dangerous to society." Here is a person who has deliberately sought to involve a young person in sexual activity. On the other hand, Ethiopians might be more likely to view the act in hypothetical (2)—at least in so far as it concerned the young eye witness—as "not very serious" and the individual who committed it as "not a serious danger to society." The involvement of the young person is almost accidental; the sexual activity of the accused was not "for the benefit" of the young person, or meant to affect him in any way. That is, the rigorous imprisonment of Article 594(2) is appropriate in the case of hypothetical (1), but only simple imprisonment, as in Article 608(2), is appropriate in the case of hypothetical (2).

We have thus interpreted Article 594(2) as implicitly requiring as one of its elements that the accused have the purpose of working a specific sexual injury on a specific young person or persons. This was done in order to reconcile it with Article 608(2) and to give each article a sensible role in the overall structure of the Code. This is the same result we reached before by considering the relative placement of these two articles in the formal structure of the Code. The fact that two or more interpretive techniques lead to the same result can increase our confidence that the result is a good one.

Careful attention to penalty provisions may also help the judge arrive at a sound result in a particular case, even where he cannot be sure of the proper interpretation of conflicting statutes in the case before him. This may be particularly helpful in those cases where the facts are not easily brought within the sharp distinctions of legal definitions. For example, one can readily imagine cases less clear than the two hypotheticals we posed in discussing Articles 594(2) and 608(2). In such a case it could be very difficult, even with the distinction we have made, to decide which of the two articles should apply. But that is perhaps like saying, that such cases will involve either a less important violation of Article 592(2), or a more important violation of Article 608(2). Less important violations of Article 594(2) can be punished by "simple imprisonment for not less than three months"; violations of Article 608(2) are punishable by any term of simple imprisonment. The judge who is aware of this overlap avoids any practical necessity of choosing between the two articles by imposing a sentence which falls within the overlap—simple imprisonment from three months to three years—when in a particular case he finds it hard to decide which of the two provisions to apply. When he would reach the same result—the same penalty—under either provision he applied, the job of deciding which of two possibly applicable provisions actually provides the legal basis for his decision is obviously less important than it would be if his choice had practical consequences.

Thus far we have been considering the relevance of the duration or type of punishment to interpretation of the Penal Code. It is also relevant to take instruction from the degree of freedom given to judges in particular circumstances to decide on what measure of punishment to impose. As has already been noted, provisions of the Special Part commonly afford judges a range of punishments from which to choose. Comparison of the punishments provided for in various Special Part provisions gives some indication of the relative importance attached by the legislature to the crimes concerned. Now, one may also note that there are many provisions of the General Part which serve to increase the range of punishments available, or to guide the judge in making his choice over that range. Thus, Article 79, "General Extenuating Circumstances," and other articles of the General Part authorize judges to reduce punishment by one step, according to a scale set out in Article 184. Article 81, "General Aggravating Circumstances," deals with cases in which the judge is to apply a relatively high penalty within the scale provided for by the Special Part definition of the offence. Articles 67, 68, 70, 72, 73, 75, and 78, among others, specify circumstances in which the judge may "freely mitigate" the punishment, reducing it without limit.

A common sense judgment which might immediately be made is that the greater the freedom Parliament has given the judge to reduce a sentence, the less blameworthy it considers the situation described; conversely, the more Parliament has indicated that a sentence is to be increased, the more blameworthy it considers the case. This rather simple observation is likely to be significant in a case where the statutes present a range of alternatives as to how a given act might be characterized. For example, Article 67 completely exempts from punishment someone who committed an offence under "an absolute physical coercion" and authorizes such exemption "when the coercion was of a moral kind." Under Article 68, the court may freely reduce the punishment (Article 185) according to the circumstances "if the coercion was not irresistible." Under Article 79(1) (c), the court may reduce the punishment by one step (Article 184) if an offender "acted in a state of great material or moral distress or under the apprehension of a grave threat or a justified fear, or under the influence of a person to whom he owes obedience or upon whom he depends." What is "coercion"? What is the line between "absolute moral coercion" (Article 67) and "resistible moral coercion" (Article 68)? Resistible moral coercion" and the circumstances described in Article 79(1)(c)? The circumstances of Article 79(1)(c) and simple commission of the offense?

We are again in a situation where the words used will convey different meanings to different people reading them. But looking at them as a whole, one can readily see a legislative purpose to cover the whole scale of blameworthiness regarding coercion, and to direct the judge to impose sentence in accordance with the position of the particular offender on that scale. In such a case, it may be less important as a practical matter to decide upon an exact meaning of the particular words or phrases involved than to note their relationship to the determination of punishment. Confronted by the facts of a particular case and aware that the purpose of these provisions is to enable him to reduce sentence in proportion to the degree of excuse shown by these facts, the judge may be acting in a more straightforward manner if he sets the sentence first and makes the characterization of the facts after.

This, of course, is not to advocate complete freedom on the part of the judge to set sentences, independent of the statutory scheme. On the contrary, he must be aware of the legislature's purpose—that a consideration such as "coercion" is to serve as a complete or partial excuse, depending on the circumstances—and must be guided by this awareness. The point is, rather, that the words used by the legislature to characterize this purpose create what are, in themselves, rather artificial and imprecise distinctions. It is not a fruitful use of judicial time to attempt to determine into which of several aribtrary word formulas particular facts fit. The important job, and the job which one may be confident the legislature was primarily interested to have done, is to determine, given the legislative attitude toward "coercion," how much if any punishment the particular facts call for. The answer to this question will suggest the proper category, rather than vice versa.

As one might expect, Article 79 can be read to provide an intermediate step not only for Articles 67 and 68, dealing with "coercion," but for virtually all of the "Justifiable Acts and Excuses" discussed in Articles 66–78. Similar series can also be found in the Chapters on Attempt, Articles 26–31, and on Participation, Articles 32–40. The gradations in punishment indicated by these articles, again, are a measure of Parliament's view of culpability; in a case where the language of the articles does not make the proper category clear, a judge could rely on the relationship between culpability and punishment to determine the article to be applied if he finds the judgment as to culpability more easy to make.

Finally, it may be appropriate to remind the reader that the relationship between penalty provisions not only may help the interpreter to determine the meaning of substantive provisions of the Penal Code, but may also be of assistance in reaching a decision in a particular case on the penalty to be applied. Thus, where an article involving free mitigation under Article 185 is invoked in preference to one involving limited mitigation under Article 184, it will in most cases be appropriate to reflect the greater degree of mitigation—the lesser degree of culpability—by imposing a sentence less than might have been imposed using Article 184. Thus, unmitigated second degree homicide, Article 523, is punishable with a term of from five to twenty years rigorous imprisonment; using Article 184, a sentence as low as one year rigorous imprisonment is possible (Article 184(c)); this would suggest that in cases where Article 185 is to be applied, a sentence to some term of simple imprisonment will be appropriate. Of course, it is true that the legislature has rarely required that sentence be mitigated to any particular degree; it has merely permitted it. But if it is valid to view the various alternatives for mitigation as establishing a continuous scale of punishment, as the author believes it is, it should also be generally valid to regard a particular alternative as suggesting a sentence within the comparatively narrow range which is its particular contribution to the whole scale.

Another example of the usefulness of penalty provisions in interpretation, already discussed, is the case where an extenuated crime specifically defined in the Special Part can be used as a guide to sentencing similar crimes extenuated under some provision of the General Part. The example of this kind of reasoning given was that of Article 524, which fixes a range of punishment—up to five years simple imprisonment—for killing in defence of a particular property interest, the privacy of a house. It was suggested that this range could be used as a reference point in cases involving killing in defence of other property interests which, because not specifically mentioned in Article 524, would have to be dealt with in the general context of Articles 74 and 75.

IX. ARTICLE 2 OF THE PENAL CODE—A LIMITATION ON INTERPRETATION?[17]

Thus far, we have been discussing interpretation without explicity considering whether there are any legal limitations on the process. There are such limits. They are set by Article 55 of the Revised Constitution of 1955 and Article 2 of the Penal Code. Much of the remainder of this article will be devoted to a discussion of the principle they embody, which is known as the principal of legality. We can start this discussion by using some of the techniques developed earlier in this article, but we will find that they do not take us very far. In dealing with the fundamental doctrines of the General Part, Book I, it is almost always essential to have some understanding of the sources of the doctrine and the other interpretations it has received, in order to obtain a clear understanding of its functions. Since the principle of legality is of central importance to interpretation of criminal law, we will in this one case abandon some of the limitations mentioned at the beginning of this article. Through an examination of its history, development, and present status, we may be better able to understand just what job it is that the principle is to perform, and what modifications or cautions, if any, are therefore necessary regarding the techniques discussed above.

One limitation which does continue to apply is that brought about by the general unavailability of legislative materials. This denies us knowledge of the specific histories of Revised Constitution Article 55 and Penal Code Article 2. It also means that we have no opportunity to discuss certain questions about the use of legislative materials in the interpretation of penal statutes—for example, whether they may be used to correct an "obvious mistake" in the official version of a statute, consistently with the principle of legality. Discussion of those questions has involved European jurists in heated debate. Our discussion would be much more complex if they were here; the problem is one which would have to be resolved in Ethiopia should legislative materials even be published.

A. A First View of the Principle of Legality

Revised Constitution of Ethiopia (1955):

Chapter III: Rights and Duties of the People, Article 55

"No one shall be punished for any offence which has not been declared by law to be punishable before the commission of such offence, or shall suffer any punishment greater than that which was provided by the law in force at the time of the commission of the offence."

Penal Code of Ethiopia (1957):

Part I: General Part; Book I: Offences and the Offender; Title I: Criminal Law and its Scope; Chapter I: Scope of the Law.

"Article 1—Object and Purpose.

"The purpose of criminal law is to ensure order, peace and the security of the State and its inhabitants for the public good.

"It aims at the prevention of offences by giving due notice of the offences and penalties prescribed by law and should this be ineffective by providing for the punishment and reform of offenders and measures to prevent the commission of further offences."

"Article 2—Principle of Legality.

"(1) Criminal law specifies the various offences which are liable to punishment and the penalties and measures applicable to offenders.

"The court may not treat as a breach of the law and punish any act or omission which is not prohibited by law. It may not impose penalties or measures other than those prescribed by law.

"The Court may not create offences by analogy.

"(2) Nothing in this Article shall prevent interpretation of the law.

"In cases of doubt the court shall interpret the law according to its spirit, in accordance with the meaning intended by the legislature so as to achieve the purpose it has in view.

(3) Nobody shall be punished twice for the same act."

One could justifiably infer a number of helpful propositions from the language and context of the above provisions.

Taking Article 55 of the Revised Constitution of 1955 first: The provision appears in that part of the Constitution which deals with the rights and duties of the citizen. Its language does not relate to a duty, something which a citizen is legally required to do. Quite clearly, rather, it is meant to describe some right of the citizen, something in which he is to be protected. Since the requirement stated can only be satisfied by government action, one would infer that he is to be protected against government action of some kind. Presumably it was concluded that the action could be unfair to him or endanger him in some way. The particular government action prohibited is that of conficting a person and/or punishing him for a crime without statutory authority. Then, it must have been considered that convicting or imprisoning a person for crime without statutory authority was unfair, or that the power to do so was dangerous. It is unlikely that this judgment was one made from the perspective of purely criminal policy. "Citizens' rights" and constitutions both relate to politics and political concepts, that is, to the rules and structure of government generally. The principle announced is one of constitutional, not criminal, law. We may suppose its purpose to be political, even though its particular effects will be felt in the administration of criminal law.

The second and third sentences of Article 2(1) of the Penal Code seem to contain the same instruction as Article 55 of the Revised Constitution. Since the Penal Code was adopted after the constitutional provision came into force, it is appropriate to believe that these sentences refer to the same principle. At least, they should be interpreted to conform with the constitutional principle, since the constitutional rule is a superior one. But Article 2 goes further than the Constitution in that it appears to explain what the legislature considered to be conviction or punishment in the absence of statutory authority. It says that the court "may not impose penalties or measures other than those prescribed by law" and "may not create offences by analogy," but that the court is not forbidden to engage in "interpretation of the law," and that interpretation of the law is to be "according to its spirit, in accordance with the meaning intended by the legislature so as to achieve the purpose it has in view." While these phrases have no single necessary meaning, they appear to be attempts to define the limits of the "authority" conferred by any particular statute. Interpretation of the statute, in accordance with its spirit, intended meaning and purpose, is within these limits; judicial creation of offences "by analogy" is not.

One possible purpose for Article 55 of the Revised Constitution and Penal Code Article 2 which thus emerges is subordination of the judiciary to the legislature in formulating Ethiopian society's rules of conduct. The judiciary is not to create offences. It is to observe the spirit, intended meaning, and purpose with which the legislature has endowed a statute. This subordination must be considered as politically important, for the protection of citizens' rights. Since one can observe from the overall structure of the Constitution of 1955 that legislative authority is principally confined to Parliament acting together with the Emperor and that the courts are principally restricted to the adjudication of cases under the law, it is also possible to state that the courts are generally subordinated to legislative authority. This general subordination is also a matter of political structure, reflecting decisions about the type of jobs various institutions of government are best fit to do: the legislative institutions, to make general rules; the judicial institutions, to decide particular disputes in accordance with these rules. Since a special rule for subordination of the judiciary appears in the case of criminal law, it must have been considered that this division of authority was particularly important here.

What is it about criminal law which makes division of authority between legislatures and courts particularly important? Article 1 of the Penal Code appears to supply at least a partial answer to this question. It states, "(Criminal law) aims at the prevention of offences by giving due notice of the offences and penalties prescribed by law and should this be ineffective by providing for the punishment and reform of offenders and measures to prevent the commission of further offences." This states a particular theory of criminal law—that prevention of offences is the primary role, and punishment and reform in case of failure only secondary. In order to prevent offences, one must make it known in advance what constitutes an offence, and what the punishment for each offence will be. Courts, deciding particular cases after particular events have already occurred, could not expect to do an efficient job of prevention in advance. This job requires a concise and systematic body of written rules, uniformly available and applicable throughout the Empire—namely, a code. The special emphasis of criminal law on prevention, indicated by Article 1, is one reason for putting a special emphasis on the subordination of courts to legislatures in the area of criminal law.

A second rationale for requiring legislative definition of crimes and punishments is to safeguard the citizen against arbitrariness by the government as a whole and, in particular, by its judges. When the government is required to announce in advance what are the rules of conduct, it is not possible to condemn after the fact what seemed to be innocent behaviour at the time; judges are not free to follow their whims or personal dislikes, as they might be if they were permitted to define the offences of which they convicted accused persons. The protection afforded by a requirement of prior notice is especially important in the case of criminal law, because of the special impact which a criminal case has on the citizen. In a civil suit, one citizen is most likely to be engaged in legal conflict with another citizen. The government participates chiefly as a referee; it does not directly threaten his liberty. In a criminal suit, however, the individual is most often pitted against the government, and the issue is always whether the government may deprive him of his life, liberty, or property on account of some act he is alleged to have done. May one not infer the judgment that to deprive an individual of life, liberty, or property for an act without first warning him that this act will be so treated, is unfair in itself, and involves the risk of further unfairness through judicial arbitrariness at trial? An eminent English scholar of criminal law has written:

"That there must be no crime or punishment except in accordance with fixed, predetermined law—this has been regarded by most thinkers as a self-evident principle of justice ever since the French Revolution. The citizen must be able to ascertain beforehand how he stands with regard to the criminal law; otherwise to punish him for a breach of that law is purposeless cruelty. Punishment in all its forms is a loss of rights or advantages consequent on a breach of law. When it loses this quality it degenerates into an arbitrary act of violence that can produce nothing but bad social effects." [18]

It could easily be inferred that the author of the Ethiopian Constitution has reached the same judgment.

If "prior notice" is important both for effectuation of the criminal law and for protection of the citizen against unfairness by his government, then it is possible to suggest tentative meanings for the "interpretation" which is permitted and the "(creation) of offences by analogy" which is forbidden by Article 2. When a criminal statute provides a warning that a certain act is considered criminal and may be visited with a certain punishment, then that statute may be applied to punish that act in that way. When no statute provides a warning, either by direct statement or by wording which the reader would think might apply, then the court may not punish that act. "(Creation of) offences by analogy" would then be the finding of an offence where a person, reading the statutes, would think none existed. The right to interpret is the right to give a statute any meaning which the reader would think it reasonably might have, even if this is not the most obvious meaning, as long as the meaning given is in accordance with legislative purpose and spirit and in this sense is what the court believes to have been the intended meaning.

It is not hard to see that this "interpretation" is very much the same as the process discussed at length above. Article 2 thus appears to have the effect of reinforcing some of the self-imposed limits of the previous discussion: that interpretation should respect the limits set by the possible meanings of statutory words; that interpretation should respect the limits set by ascertainable statutory purposes; that purposes are to be ascertained from the words, context and formal structure of the Code, as illumined by an understanding of modern Ethiopian values. It is now time for a more detailed examination of Article 2, against the background of its historical development abroad.

B. A Brief History of the Principle of Legality

1. Origins [19]

The principle that there should be neither crime nor punishment except in accordance with written law first became prominent at the time of the French Revolution, towards the end of the eighteenth century. A statement of the principle was included in the French Declaration of the Rights of Man. Then, as in Ethiopia today, the principle was viewed as one of political rights, as a protection of the citizen against his government, more than as a rule of criminal policy only. Under the ancien régime, the pre-Revolution government of France, judges were closely tied to the king or feudal lords, and were thought to exercise an arbitrary power to define crimes and punishments in a way which benefited the political power of the ruler. That is, the king and the nobility were able to oppress their enemies and use the criminal law as an instrument of politics through the capacity of their judges to invent crimes and punishments as the need arose. The judges had a tool for repression and arbitrariness which, apparently, they were willing to use. The principle of legality was a specific reaction against this repressive device, intended to end its use by requiring the government to announce in advance the rules of conduct it would enforce by criminal law.

As in Ethiopia today, the principle also reflected a general view of the proper distribution of powers within government. The same political philosophers who gave voice to the specific demand that judges should be denied the power to create crimes at will also developed the general theory known today as "separation of powers." For protection of the citizen and efficiency in government, they insisted that the roles of judiciary, legislature, and executive be carefully distinguished, and that the bodies responsible for each of these functions be made independent of the others. Thus, while a specific statement of principle was made in the case of criminal law that courts could act only on the basis of statutory authority, in fact this principle was believed to apply and was generally acted on in other areas as well. Courts were to be courts (deciders) not legislatures (rule-makers) whether the matter before them was civil or criminal. Civil codes as well as criminal codes were adopted, and it was generally accepted that court decisions required the authority of the civil code as much as that of the criminal code. In their opinions, courts expressed unwillingness to depart from or even extend any statutory text. They insisted that they could act and were acting only as the "mouth that speaks the law."

At the same time there developed a view of criminal policy, apparently independent of political considerations, which tended to reinforce the legality notion. This view, reflected to some degree in Article 1 of the Ethiopian Penal Code, identified the prevention of offences as the first goal of criminal law. It assumed that men were rational, and could be induced to obey the law by a threat of sufficient penalty for disobeying it. If a potential criminal was clearly warned what acts would violate the law, and what penalty would be imposed for violation, it was believed that he could and would calculate whether he could expect to achieve a net gain of pleasure over the pain of punishment for his act. If penalties were properly set, it was thought that he would always calculate that he could not expect to gain; therefore, he would be dissuaded even from attempting the crime. Of course, it is essential for such a theory that crimes be defined and penalties set in advance of the potential criminal's decision to act. Only then can the criminal know that he will not profit. If one leaves definition of the crime and its penalty until after the event, one has only the general terror of arbitrariness—a terror felt by the good citizen as well as the potentially bad—and not the precise warning that will leave the former unperturbed and dissuade the latter.

There was also a general body of belief that the task of complete and effective codification could be accomplished. These doctrines had their inception before the massive impact of industrial change and the urban society it brought about in Europe. Change was still relatively slow, and social structures and standards were relatively simple. It still seemed possible to draft codes, civil and criminal, to order human existence in a comprehensive way. Because common values were shared, or at least thought to be shared, throughout a particular society, it was thought that a small body of carefully drafted rules could completely express the conditions of social existence. In the particular case of the criminal law, there was an assumption that the moral values underlying its prohibitions would be shared by all; in a stable and relatively simple society, few "crimes" needed definition; and careful use of language, it was believed, could succeed in making each case clear.

In the legal system as a whole, then, there was considerable emphasis on the division of authority between legislature and court. The legislature was only to make rules; the court was only to apply them. As a result, the early codes, both civil and criminal, were looked upon as the only source of law, which judges were bound to respect; there must be the authority of a written rule for any decision. This attitude was emphasized for criminal law by the principle of legality, which sought to protect the citizen from arbitrary or repressive action by the courts in matters affecting his liberty, and by a view of criminal policy which stressed the need to deter potential criminals by the threat of definite punishment. The result was a system which today appears overly rigid and naive. Crimes were defined in very careful and precise detail. Penalty provisions specified a fixed penalty for each crime which was invariably to be imposed, rather than a range from which the judge might choose according to the facts of the case. When the necessity for interpretation was recognized at all, which was rarely, interpretation was carried out in accordance with strict logical rules. Not the least important of these rules was one requiring that any doubt regarding interpretation was to be resolved in favour of the accused. The judge was, indeed, "only the mouth that speaks the law."

2. Growth of the doctrine [20]

The seeds of destruction of this rigidly legalistic view of codes in general, and the criminal code in particular, could be found in the French Civil Code itself. Portalis, one of the drafters of that code, had stressed his view that legislatures could not forsee or answer all questions.[21] Accordingly, he called upon judges to recognize that there would be unprovided cases and to deal with them in the spirit of the code. Judges must decide a case which comes before them, whether or not the legislature has provided for it. It was more honest and necessary, in his view, to recognize the cases that were not provided for and deal with them as such, rather than pretend that they came within the explicit provisions of the code. But judges of the time apparently could not see how this innovating or rule-making role could be reconciled with the doctrine of separation of powers which, they were taught, set the limits to their proper function. Accordingly, they turned their faces from this advice, and set for themselves the task of finding direct legal authority for each decision in the code.

Toward the end of the nineteenth century, a number of French scholars, notably Geny,[22] provoked a swift and successful revolution against this very legalistic approach. They pointed out what we discussed at some length much earlier in this article—that judges inevitably "make law." This was so, they said, both because language is inevitably imprecise, so that in choosing a meaning the judge affects the content of a rule, and because the legislature, being human, can neither foretell the problems which future developments may bring, nor take account of all the concrete cases which might arsie even under present circumstances. It was more realistic, they argued, to consider that the legislature had in effect delegated authority to handle these unforeseen issues to the courts, than to pretend that the legislature had definitively answered questions which in fact had never occurred to it. They still considered courts to be subordinate to the legislature in rule-making: a court could not refuse to adopt the legislative solution to a problem when that solution existed, and should not decide cases against ascertainable legislative purpose. But when the answer was not expressly provided for, they argued that it was the court's express function to "make law" for that case.

These scholars evolved their own body of interpretive doctrine to reflect their views. This technique, known as "free scientific research," reflects the continued theoretical subordination of courts to legislatures by its high degree of emphasis on considerations of legislative policy and purpose. Courts are to use existing legislation, and other materials where relevant and available, to infer the legislative purposes or goals in dealing with problems similar to the one presented to the court. They are then to decide the case by considering whether, in light of the existing practical consequences, the legislature would have been likely to have extended one or another purpose to that case, had it considered the issue. The technique was not one to be used only to decide cases where the meaning of statutory language was unclear. It could also be used to extend a legislative solution to a case which the statutory words did not cover, by "analogy," where there was a congruence of purposes and the result of the decision would be practical and just in view of present-day realities and the overall legislative scheme.

It can be observed that this system of "free scientific research" is in many respects similar to the methods of interpretation described in the previous sections of this article. But the scholars who proposed it assumed—indeed stated—that it would be inapplicable in the area of criminal law. Civil codes contain explicit instructions for judges that they may not refuse to decide a case on the ground that it is not provided for in the code.[23] This is tantamount to an express requirement that they make law when they cannot "find" it ready-made. Criminal codes contain another instruction: the principle of legality, that a judge can neither convict nor punish another without statutory authority. Here is an instruction that if the case is not provided for in the code, it must be decided in favour of the accused. There is a special subordination of court to legislature in criminal cases, motivated by the special political considerations already discussed. In a civil case, the court is likely to be deciding between private litigants; plaintiff and defendant each must either win or lose; no principle of justice or citizens' rights seems to command that the plaintiff must always lose in cases the legislature has not been foresighted enough to provide for. In a criminal case, the court will be deciding a claim of the government against the life, liberty, or property of the accused. The principle of legality embodies the view that it is unjust to deprive the accused of these rights in the case which has not been provided for.

It did not take long, however, for scholars of criminal law to note that this differentiation between civil and criminal code interpretation concealed an important question: What is the unprovided case? The language used in the writing of criminal law statutes is no more precise than the language used to write civil law statutes, although the latter may tend to use more abstractions. Legislatures passing criminal laws are neither less fallible nor better able to foresee the future than legislatures passing civil laws. Was it necessary or wise still to choose the construction of penal statutes most favourable to the accused? If this was not always required, then within what limits was the court free to find that a case had been decided by the legislature, and that therefore penal sanctions could be applied?

The historical climate provided many impulses toward recognition of a broader scope of discretion for judges in the interpretation of criminal law. One, of course, was that already mentioned: the relization that, for a variety of reasons, judges inevitably have a hand in the making of law. A second was to include the notion of legislative delegation to the judiciary of authority to the consequent recasting of the "separation of powers" doctrine in civil cases decide the unprovided case. A third influence was a slackening of the fervor with which the principle of legality was viewed as protection of the citizen from abuse by government. Finally, there were striking changes in criminal policy and the "style" of criminal statutes which made precise warning of specific punishments seem less important to the battle against crime.

The principle of legality came to appear somewhat less important as a safeguard to the citizen as it succeeded in regularizing the courts and, at the same time, the legislature began to seem the more likely source of oppression through its hegemony of the rulemaking function and the explosion of statutes consequent upon the Industrial Revolution. Courts came to be looked upon as the protectors of the citizen rather than his potential oppressors, and while this may have been due in large measure to rules such as the principle of legality it nonetheless resulted in a lessened emphasis on the need for the rule. This lessened emphasis also resulted from a realization that the political or constitutional aspects of the rule in protecting the citizen from arbitrariness are of limited importance so far as ordinary crimes, such as murder, rape and theft are concerned. Prosecutions for such acts, whether rigidly defined by written law or not, are unlikely to have political overtones, and will be expected whether or not the law provides expressly for them. In the area of political crimes, legality may have its effect; simple publication of repressive laws may lead citizens into better knowledge of them and, accordingly, may lead them to bring pressure against the regime which has adopted them. Even here, however, it has come to be recognized that it is the character of the men who govern, as much as any restrictions on what they may do, which safeguards the citizen's liberty. The doctrine is readily and effectively circumvented, in any but a technical sense, in a number of ways: proliferation of statutes to such an extent that no citizen can expect to know his rights or be aware of what his government is doing; enactment of statutes embodying sweeping and vague language which leaves courts free to do more or less as they please; and labelling various political measures, such as "preventive detention" laws, as not "penal" in character.[24] Finally, the relation between respect for the principle by a government and political justice in that government has been shown to be, at best, imperfect. Of the two fascist powers, Nazi Germany abandoned legality while Mussolini's Italy retained it; on the other hand, one has the example of a politically "just" state such as Denmark, which permits its judges to create offences "by analogy" in criminal cases where statutory policy appears to justify such a step.

[24] Article 77 of the Ethiopian Penal Code seems to be a good example of this last kind of provision. Although someone who mistakently believes he is violating the Penal Code (when there is no provision making his conduct illegal) is not a criminal and can not be punished, Article 77 states that he can be required to give a security for his future good behavior—at pain of imprisonment if he refuses or forfeiture if he later breaks his bond—and can be required to give up any "dangerous objects" in his possession. These are "measures," not "punishments," and so do not formally violate the requirements of Article 2. But it should be clear that the liberty and property of the person involved are being interfered with in a manner not usual with citizens, and rather like the processes of the criminal law.

The criminal theory of the early nineteenth century viewed the criminal as a rational man, measuring pains and pleasures and therefore to be influenced by a statute which described what was forbidden and imposed a penalty in excess of any reward to be obtained from the crime. Theorists today take a different view. The predominance of warning in criminal theory has been undercut, first of all, by a proliferation of criminal statutes so vast that no citizen could be expected to have notice of them. Thus, the first assumption, that the potential criminal could obtain the information he needed for calculation of his pains and pleasures, is no longer valid. The ordinary man can obtain such information today only with great difficulty, and even then at substantial peril of its being incomplete, or of misreading what he finds. Second, there are those who take issue with the proposition that a warning must be exact to have effect. Precise definition of crimes, they argue, may simply lead criminals to seek a way to evade the definition while accomplishing what is substantially the same objectionable result. General wording will also have a warning effect, as long as the putative criminal can reasonably understand from it that his conduct is likely to come within the words used. Indeed, the effect may be greater if it induces him to avoid what is forbidden by a wide margin, rather than to calculate what is forbidden and then tread the verge.

The major change which has occurred in criminal theory, however, is even more sweeping: it has been the rejection of the assumption that the ordinary criminal is a rational, calculating man, and that his crime creates a calculable "debt" which must be repaid. Increasingly, one finds the criminal viewed as a weak or abnormal person, subject to greater or lesser degree to influences from his environment which warp his ability to make rational judgments, or appreciate or conform to social norms. Rather than calculate what may happen to him in the future, he is more likely to respond to the pressure of his past and present, to genetic or environmental defects and to wants, their product, which "normal" society may not share. Correspondingly, there is a growing focus on the "dangerousness" of the particular criminal, rather than the repugnancy of his acts, as the appropriate basis for deciding how he is to be dealt with. That is, one no longer is concerned with the question how much punishment must be inflicted to redress the abstract concept, rape; rather, one asks, how shall we deal with this man who committed this rape. And in answering this last question, the inquiry again is recast. It is not "How much punishment does he deserve?" but, "How can he be re-educated to observe social values in the future?" or, if that be impossible, "How can he be prevented from violating them again?"

The effect of this last change is particularly observable in provisions regarding penalty. Instead of imposing a fixed penalty for a particular offence, as was initially contemplated, legislation soon began to define ranges of penalty which might be imposed, depending on the facts of the case. The provision of Article 524 allowing the judge to impose any sentence from five to twenty years rigorous imprisonment is a good example of such a provision; the rules regarding extenuation and aggravation of punishments may be similarly explained. The criteria by which judges were instructed to make decisions in imposing sentences came to be phrased in terms of the criminal and his "dangerousness" or prospects for reform. (The corresponding provision in the Ethiopian Penal Code is Article 86.) Special dispositions were provided for special classes of criminals as to whom the legislature concluded there were greater or lesser chances of rehabilitation as useful members of society. Then, on the one hand, the dispositions regarding juveniles, the possibility of suspension of sentence, and a preference for medical treatment over prison treatment in those whose acts were explained in part by mental defect or disease; on the other hand, internment, and severe aggravation of punishment for the recidivist. All in all, the judge is given a very wide discretion on the question of disposition. The principle of legality has been reduced to the proposition that any measure imposed by the judge must be one which has been authorized by the legislature. This no longer reflects any uniquely penal policy; it is, rather, only a weak statement of the political policy that, to protect the citizen, the authority of the judge to act in any penal matter must be drawn from a legislative enactment.

Insofar as substantive criminal law is concerned, however, the notion of deterrence—and thus, the need for notice—has not yet been abandoned by the majority of theorists. First, while the theory of dangerousness may help to explain why some commit crimes despite the law, it does not prove that others would lead lives free of crime regardless of the law. While we can observe that some are not deterred, we have no proof that none are. Second, there are reasons for insisting that the proponents of this new theory demonstrate that it can be applied with precision and certainty. The concept of "dangerousness" seems so broad and malleable that one must have substantial fears for the liberty of the citizen if he can be confined or compelled to undergo treatment on the basis that he is "dangerous." The administration of such a concept would inevitably depend to a tremendous degree on the character and aims of its administrators; it could easily be put to political or personal uses. The demonstration that these dangers can be avoided has not been made. Finally, one of the assumptions of the "dangerousness" theory seems to be that "punishment" as opposed to rehabilitative "treatment" is no longer to be considered a valid purpose of criminal law. It is extremely doubtful whether society could or should give up entirely the notion that a disposition in a criminal case helps to retribute or repay for the harm which has been done. The theory of deterrence, on the other hand, carries with it the notion that at least some of those who are not deterred are responsible for their acts and may be punished for them.

Most jurists continue to opt, then, for a system of "crimes" in which the citizen is given warning that certain acts will lead to imposition of a stated range of penalties. But the effect of the considerations discussed above has been to modify their view of how precise a warning must be given. First, there is somewhat less insistence on precision in the formulgation of statutes than there was in the past: the statutes must be definite enough to make the citizen aware that his conduct is of questionable legality, but they may also be general enough to permit judges to adjust them to changing circumstances in accordance with their purpose. Second, it is no longer necessary, if it ever was, to require interpretation of criminal statutes invariably to be favourable to the accused in cases of doubt. In place of this rule, the rule of Article 2 has been generally accepted. "Interpretation" of the law is permissible, but "(creation of) offences by analogy" is not.

3. The limitations on interpretation, as presently understood [25]

The distinction between "interpretation" and "(creation of) offences by analogy" has been formulated, generally speaking, in one of two ways. The earlier formulation characterized "interpretation" as the application of a statue to a situation to which, it is found, the legislature meant the statute to apply; and "analogy" as the application of a statute to a situation to which, it is found, the legislature did not foresee the statute would apply, but to which the policies of the statute do apply. The second formulation characterizes as "interpretation" any application of the statute which can be brought within the meaning of the words used in the statute (as illuminated by context, purposes, etc.); and as "analogy" any other application of the statute, for example one based on the conclusion that its purposes apply although its words to not.

It can be seen that these two formulations differ in the criteria they refer to. The first relies on a judicially derived catalogue of the cases a provision was "intended" to cover, that is on its purposes. It is interpretation, not analogy, to apply the statute to those cases whether or not the words of the statute have a meaning which could include them. On the other hand, it is analogy to apply the statute to a case within the meaning of its words, but which was not or could not have been foreseen by the legislature. For example, statutes passed before the invention of the automobile often used the word "vehicle," to refer to wagons and the like. Under the first formulation, an automobile would come under such statutes only by "analogy," since the legislature could not have foreseen that such a thing as an automobile might come into existence.

The second formulation, on the other hand, uses words rather than purposes as the criterion. If the words of a statute can apply to a fact situation, it is "interpretation," not "analogy," to apply the statute to those facts, even if the legislature did not or could not foresee those particular facts. In the case given an automobile could come under old statutes referring to "vehicle" by interpretation, if "automobile" was within the accepted meaning of "vehicle." Of course, this interpretation would not be required.

To the author, the second formulation seems preferable. The "interpretation"-"analogy" distinction is important because of its relationship to the principle of legality. The principle of legality, we have seen, rests on political and criminal policies stressing the importance of prior notice by government of the criminal law. To be meaningful, the distinction should reflect these policies. That is, it should have some relationship to the giving of notice, and the concomitant prevention of large-scale judicial innovation. By relying on the possible meaning of statutory words as its criterion, the second formulation would permit application of a statute where warning had been given, and forbid it where it had not. This does not mean a judge should apply a statute to every case its words might reach: the decision to apply or not within word boundaries rests on considerations of purpose, rationality and consistency, discussed at such length above. But by enforcing word boundaries as the outer limit of interpretation, one ensures that the functions of the principle of legality have been respected. The first formulation permits no such assurance. Perhaps for this reason, the second formulation is finding increasing favour.

The limitations imposed even by this formulation are less than might at first appear. First, it is necessary to distinguish between the creation of offences "by analogy" and other uses of analogy in the criminal law. Only the former is forbidden by the principle of legality. To the extent the principle of legality requires more caution in applying criminal law than is ordinarily observed in applying other types of law, such as the Civil Code, it does so, as we have seen, to protect the accused. If an application of the Code will work to the advantage of the accused—as, for example, if the accused wishes to argue by analogy that some situation not mentioned in Article 79 should nonetheless be considered a mitigating circumstance in his case—it can be made, if justified, without regard to the principle of legality. In this case, warning to the accused and protection of him from arbitrary or repressive government action are not at stake. An offence is not being created. The provision may be interpreted as freely as any other provision of law, without any special limitation imposed because it is concerned with criminal law.

Second, one must distinguish between the formal reasoning process called "analogy" and the prohibition of Article 2 against the "(creation of) offences by analogy." The formal process called "analogy" is a process of reasoning from like to like. As scholars have noted, it is probably the central pillar of legal reasoning, and reflects fundamental democratic values. A prominent situation in which the Penal Code actually requires reasoning by analogy can be found in those statutes which list circumstances and then close with a phrase such as "or any similar circumstances" or "or any other object." Article 488, already discussed, is one such provision, since it refers to "buildings or structures of any kind, crops of agricultural products, forests, timber or any other object." It was suggested that the italicized phrase should be interpreted to mean only objects like those specifically described, in order to avoid application of the article to such cases as the burning of a book. The process by which one would chooose what objects are like those described is the process of "analogy"—a process of deriving relevant general characteristics and then using them as a criterion for application. This formal reasoning process is not forbidden; here indeed the statute gives warning that it will be used. What is forbidden is the "(creation of) offences by analogy"; we now see that this does not mean using the process of analogy, as such, but using the process to find that an offence has been committed under a statute although the citizen would not reasonably have expected this decision from reading the statute's words.

As presently understood, the principle goes no farther than this. It does not require that a particular punishment be specified for each crime; only that available punishments and the conditions for their availability be established. It does not require a narrow or artificial method of interpretation; only that in defining offences the limitations of the language used by the legislature, as well as its purposes, be respected. If it is understood that the principle today as at its birth reflects principally political policy, not criminal policy these limitations on its scope should be readily perceived. So far as the "war against crime" is concerned, courts should be and are free to interpret legislative directives as fully as language and purpose together suggest. It is only where the scope of the authority delegated or of the interpretation sought has negative implications for the structure of government or the political life of the citizen that caution is called for.

C. Application of the Principle in Ethiopia [26]

The principle of legality was first introduced into Ethiopian law in the Revised Constitution of 1955. The Constitution of 1931 had already made clear, however, that the principal legislative authority lay with the Emperor and His Parliament. While the Penal Code of 1930 included a provision to the effect that cases not provided for under the Code should be decided by analogy, it also controlled the use of this technique by restricting it to the Supreme Imperial Court. If it is reasonable to suppose that this court had ready access to the views of the principal legislative force under that constitution, His Imperial Majesty, one might surmise that even here the division of authority between legislature and court was in the main respected; the Supreme Imperial Court would not have acted on such a question without first seeking the legislature's views. Regardless of this, the provision of the 1930 Code appears designed as a smooth transition from the era of the Fetha Negast, when many cases were decided through extrapolation of principles more than interpretation of fixed rules, to a future state of "legality." Indeed, the 1930 Code as a whole provides such a transition. While it is not nearly so detailed or precise as most European codes, it acquainted Ethiopian lawyers with the code form and provided them with an initial basis for code reasoning.

As further explained by the Penal Code of 1957, Article 2, the principle of legality adopted in Ethiopia appears to have been the principle as it is presently understood, rather than the principle as it might have been in the early nineteenth century. Thus, Article 2 is at pains to distinguish between interpretation, which is permitted, and creation of offences by analogy, which is not. "Interpretation" is to be in accordance with the "spirit" and "purpose" of the legislation, in accordance with the "meaning intended by the legislature." That is to say, one may legitimately give the words of a provision any meaning they will bear, if that meaning will tend to effectuate the apparent purpose of Parliament in enacting the particular provision in issue. While the Code does not define "(creation of) offences by analogy," perhaps a regrettable omission, one may understand by this word the current view of most European commentators: a process by which a statute is extended to a case not fairly within the meaning of its words, but thought to be within its purposes. It follows that the answer to the question posed at the head of this section is essentially negative: the principle of legality does not require any substantial modifications or cautions in the techniques discussed above, so long as the limits assumed in connection with those techniques are carefully observed; an interpreter has the power to use any of these techniques he finds helpful.

X. THE PRINCIPLE OF LEGALITY—A LIMITATION ON LEGISLATIVE ACTION? [27]

The principle of legality, particularly in the version of it which appears in Penal Code Article 2, appears to be directed particularly to judges. Its history shows that it was adopted at a time when judges were feared as potential wielders of an arbitrary power over citizens' lives. It was meant to enforce their subjugation to the legislature, in particular by requiring that there be a definite legislative "warning" to justify each criminal conviction and criminal sentence. But, historically, this relationship has turned into a form of partnership, in which it is recognized that courts have the function of applying the general principles announced by the legislature to specific causes, and in the process, shaping them somewhat to fit modern circumstances. In criminal cases, the only prohibition forbids them to apply a statute in a manner not predictable from its wording; we have seen that the legislature has worded some statutes so as not only to permit, but to require the courts to use their partnership role to apply statutes to causes it has not explicitly mentioned. Since legislation necessarily involves the delegation of some legislative, or rule-making, authority to judges, one question which arises is "Are there any constitutional limits on legislatives delegation of rule-making power to courts?" Are there limits to what legislatures can do as well as to what judges may do?

In asking these questions, the author does not mean to discuss the related question whether Ethiopian courts are ever empowered to declare legislation unconstitutional. That is a difficult and important question, which cannot concern us here. If Ethiopian courts have this power generally, they will be in a position to enforce any limits on legislative action which may appear from the following discussion. Even if they lack power to declare legislation unconstitutional for delegating too much authority to them, they could control such legislative acts by refusing to exercise the discretion given them, or construing the grant as narrowly as possible. In this way, they might be able to force the legislature to be more explicit or detailed without actually declaring null and void what the legislature has already done. Finally, one may rely on the good intentions of Parliament and the Emperior to observe for themselves any limits which the constitution imposes. If this discussion prompts legislative awareness of any limits, and consequent self-restraint, it will have served an ample purpose whether or not Ethiopian courts are in a position to make the limits meaningful through enforcement.

A. Retroactivity [28]

The most universally accepted limit on legislative action regarding crimes is often, as in Article 55 of the Revised Constitution, included in the wording of the principle of legality itself: a legislature cannot make its rule retroactive in time, to make criminal an act which was not criminal at the time it was performed. Obviously, such a rule is implicit in the notion that the citizen must be warned what conduct will be considered criminal, so that he can decide how he will behave. In the absence of such a rule, legislatures could play the arbirtary role it was thought judges once took, and define some act which had already been committed as a criminal offence. Someone whom the government wished to see put away, a political opponent, for example, could be quickly dispatched if this expedient were possible.

It should be noted that the judge, when he interprets a statute, is subject to no limitation of retroactivity. Even though it was not clear in advance of his decision whether a particular statute would apply to the conduct in a case submitted to him, if he decides the statute does apply, he will apply the statute in that case. He will apply it even though the conduct preceded his decision by some months, and even though the defendant may have acted in the mistaken belief that the conduct was not forbidden by the statute. Indeed, Article 78 of the Penal Code is quite clear about this. The Court is to reduce—but not eliminate—the punishment of "a person who in good faith believed he had a right to act and had definite and adequate reasons for holding this erroneous belief." (Emphasis supplied). A person without "definite and adequate reasons" for his mistake, one must assume, is entitled to no reduction at all.

B. Statutory Vagueness [29]

Another recognized limitation, which is enforced in the United States as a matter of constitutional doctrine, is that the legislature may not phrase its prohibitions too broadly—may not delegate too much rule-making power to the judge. This principle is obviously related to the doctrine of separation of powers, since by delegating a great deal of its rule-making authority to courts the legislature is threatening to obliterate one of the major lines of separation. It has refused to perform its function of deciding what conduct should be punished. On the other hand, constitutional analyses of the problem are most frequently made under the Due Process Clause of the American Constitution (which corresponds to Article 43 of the Ethiopian Constitution). This is no doubt because of the dangers which statutory vagueness present to the citizen: he is unsure what conduct is made illegal, and hence may desist from valuable conduct or be inadequately warned of what will be considered wrongful; to the extent vague statutory language leaves the judge free to improvise, the citizen is unprotected from the judicial whim and fiat which it was originally the function of the principle of legality to prevent.

The notion that legitimate activity may be deterred by a vague statute is particularly important to the American doctrine of vagueness. It can be understood by recalling the observation made above, that a judge is not obliged to follow the rule against retroactivity in applying his interpretations of the law. The practical effect of retroactive application of interpretation is that a citizen will fear to engage in any activity which might fall under the prohibition of the statute, as interpreted. That is, the possibility that a statute will be interpreted to apply to and forbid certain conduct will hinder that conduct, even if the interpretation is unlikely or is never made. This effect might be acceptable if only objectionable conduct were inhibited by a uncertain language or a particular statute or if the uncertainty was reduced to the minimum by careful drafting. The danger, however, is that language which is very vague may inhibit—and may even be used or designed to inhibit—activities which are legitimate or which enjoy special protection under the law, as in the case of religious worship and other freedoms protected by the constitution. This possibility, that the threat of future interpretations of overly uncertain language may inhibit people from engaging in legitimate or specially protected activities, is a particularly unacceptable consequence of vague statutory language. Where an American court finds this possibility, it will nullify the statute under the Due Process Clause as unconstitutionally vague, unless it can quickly eliminate the uncertainty by interpretation. As might be expected, such nullification is more likely where the activities being hindered by the uncertainty of the law are highly protected, as in the case of political activities.

It may be easier to understand the rule against statutory vagueness and the reasons for it by considering a specific example. Suppose that in place of the present Part II of the Penal Code, the Special Part, Parliament proposed to enact the following provision:

> Art. 248: Whoever intentionally or negligently acts to harm the state, national or international interests, the public interest, the community, individuals, the family, or property shall be punishable with one or more of the penalties described in the General Part, Book II, in accordance with the needs of the case.

Now suppose that someone charged under this provision protests that it is unconstitutionally vague, relying on the principle of legality. If the principle of legality were applicable only to judges, and simply forbade them to go outside the written law, the principle would be inapplicable in this case; the provision does constitute written authority defining a crime, even if the definition is a very vague one. But the principle is also applicable to legislatures; it requires them to attain a certain standard of precision and detail in their instructions to judges. A provision such as the above would fail to meet any such standard. The area of uncertainty in its application is limitless. The citizen would not know what it was that he was forbidden to do, he might fear to engage in valuable social activities; he would be essentially without protection against judicial whim and fiat, since the legislature has essentially delegated to the judge broad rather than limited, judicial power to declare conduct criminal. If courts have authority to declare statutes unconstitutional, they could surely declare this statute unconstitutionally vague.

Let us consider another example, which is perhaps not so extreme, but which may help to understand why more precision is generally expected of penal than civil legislation Title IX, Chapter I, of the Ethiopian Civil Code deals with the problem of "Extra-Contractual Liability." Generally speaking, this is the Civil Code analogy of the law of crimes. Article 2027(1) provides that "Irrespective of any undertaking on his part, a person shall be liable for the damage he causes to another by an offence." An "offence" is then defined in several general provisions. For example, Article 2030(1) states that "A person commits an offence where he acts or refrains from acting in a manner or in conditions which offend morality or public order"; Article 2033(1) states that "A person commits an offence where he turns to his own advantage powers conferred on him in the interest of another." Although Articles 2038–2065 then state specific examples of "offences," such as physical assault (Article 2038), an act need not fall within these particular provisions to constitute an offence. It is sufficient that it meet one of the general definitions of "offence," such as those stated in Articles 2030(1) and 2033(1).

As a mattter of civil code drafting, these provisions are well constructed. If an individual can show that he has been harmed by another person, it is already established that a tangible loss has been suffered, and that the defendant is its cause. The issue in a civil trial is, who is to bear this loss? Is the loss to be borne by the person who suffered it, the plaintiff? Or are there reasons to require the person who caused the loss, the defendant, to make it good—that is, to bear the loss himself? Since the question is one of allocating a financial loss which has already occurred, since the loss must be borne and the question is only who is to bear it, it may be fair to state the rules of liability in a very general way. The judge then has maximum freedom to allocate responsibility according to the apparent justice of the individual case.

In a criminal case, on the other hand, it is not at all certain or necessary that any actual harm has occurred. For example, persons are punished for attempts, without any consideration whether damage of any sort was done. Moreover, even where harm has occurred, the criminal prosecution is not intended to make that harm good; any suit for reparation is to be brought separately by the injured party, although it can be joined with the criminal prosecution under Article 100 of the Penal Code. The purposes of the criminal prosecution, punishment and/or rehabilitation, are to vindicate a public interest in social order, not to redress private injuries. The government is pitted directly against the individual defendant and seeks to take away his life, liberty or property. If it succeeds in convincing the court to penalize him it will have introduced a new element of loss to the cause: the defendant will be required to give up a life, liberty or property or property which no other person need have lost, and which in any event does not go to reimburse any victim who may exist for whatever damage he may have suffered. Because, first, it is the government which is involved and, second, the government is seeking to impose a new loss or penalty on the accused, much higher standards of certainty are appropriate in penal legislation than in civil. In the criminal area, statutes such as Articles 2030(1) and 2033(1) of the Civil Code would be much too uncertain; they do not define the limits of possible government action with a precision sufficient to warn the citizen what he may not do, and to protect him against arbitrariness.

How much uncertainty is "too much" is an extremely difficult question. Uncertainty which can be avoided by a more precise use of language is more likely to be found objectionable than uncertainty which is largely unavoidable. Thus, words of infinite scope, such as "immoral" or "evil" are particularly suspect. As has already been suggested, the answer also may vary with the type of activity which is being inhibited by the peripheral vagueness of the statute. A statute inhibiting, for example, religious practice might be more closely examined than one inhibiting questionable forms of sexual conduct. More important social values may be at stake in the first case than the second; there is more to be lost if they are inhibited. One suggested guideline attempts to distinguish between permissible interpretation and an impermissibly broad statute by examining the result of the judicial process on the statute: if a court can eliminate the area of uncertainty by interpreting the statute in one case, then the statute is not "too broad." If, on the other hand, the uncertainty cannot be eliminated by interpretation, then the statute is "too broad" and should not be applied. The legislature should be required to try again, more carefully this time.[30]

The limits on the legislature as well as those on the court, then, respond to the same considerations: the essentially political policies of affording sufficient notice to enable the citizen to make a reasonable prediction about what action the government might take affecting his freedom, and to protect him against arbitrary infringements of his liberty. If this is a valid generalization, then one may recast the analysis of "legality" into the terms suggested by an American criminal theorist, Jerome Hall: that the question involved is one of the proper "girth" of legislative statement and of judicial application of such statements.[31] At what level of generality can a legislature or a court operate in search of solutions impinging on the citizen's liberty? Thus seen, the principle of legality is an exhortation to both legislative and judicial attitudes. In effect, it says: "Be specific!" Particularization, concreteness, concern for methods and rules which will enable the citizen to predict where he stands and which will protect him against whim or fiat are the essential demands of the rule.

XI. IMPLICATIONS OF THE PRINCIPLE OF LEGALITY FOR INTERPRETATION

We concluded that under the principle of legality, the judge retains the power to adopt any interpretation of a statute which a reader of the statute would think possible from its words (subject to the possibility that he will refuse to adopt any interpretation, because he finds it too vague). The question then arises that implications can be drawn from the principle to guide the interpretive process.

A. Indispensability of Statutory Elements[32]

We earlier discussed at length the relationship between the General and Special Parts of the Penal Code, and remarked that the General Part would frequently define or even state elements of an offence in a way that would not be clear from the Special Part provision alone. The example used was the requirement of "intention" for a violation of Article 523, which is not mentioned in Article 523 itself but clearly must be inferred in view of Articles 57–59 of the General Part and the overall arrangement of the homicide provisions. By stressing the duty of the court to ascertain and respect legislative purposes in criminal matters, the principle of legality makes it clear that courts must find all elements of a crime to be present for a conviction to be justified—elements which are implied from the General Part as well as those specifically mentioned in the Special Part. If further evidence of this elementary principle were necessary, it could be found in Article 23(2): "The criminal offence is only completed when all its legal, material and moral ingredients are present." (Emphasis supplied.)

B. Ordinary Usage Over Special or Technical Meanings[33]

Since the judge always assumes legislative regularity, he is entitled to assume that the legislature has acted, in regard to any particular statute, with the principle of legality and its purposes in mind. That is to say, he is entitled to assume that the legislature intended its enactment to give adequate warning of the circumstances in which it would apply. Of course he, too, is under an injunction to interpret and apply a criminal statute in a way which might have been expected from its language and context.

One of the criteria by which the judge chooses among the available, possible word meanings, then, should be a consideration of those meanings which were likely to occur to the persons to whom this warning was directed. If the statute is a criminal statute of general application, he may properly hesitate before giving some word a special or technical meaning, if this will operate to the prejudice of the defendant. If the legislature proposed its statute to have general application, it probably also chose words which could be used in the same sense in which they are generally understood to express its purpose. It would not have meant to trick the ordinary man by using common words in some special sense. On the other hand, where a statute seems to be directed to a special group—as is the case with Article 520, "Refusal to provide Professional Services," for example—it is proper to give uncertain words a meaning which would be understood by members of that group, even if these are not the words' ordinary signification.

This criterion is not exclusive if the judge is convinced by considerations of context, purpose, or the like, that the legislature assigned a different meaning to a word or phrase than the subject of the rule was likely to, he is free to adopt that special meaning; he does not violate the principle of legality thereby. But the purposes of the principle of legality suggest that in determining what the statute actually means it is appropriate to consider how the subject of a statute is likely to understand it.

To a certain extent this suggestion resembles the once popular doctrines that penal statutes must always be interpreted to favour the accused, or that the "plain" or "literal" meaning of criminal statutes must always be adopted. Given the law's acceptance of "warning" as an important function of criminal law, there is reason to favour the meaning a provision is likely to have to those who are governed by it over other possible meanings, in the absence of compelling considerations to the contrary. Such favoritism could be called adopting a "plain meaning," and is in a meaningful sense "favouring the accused." But the principle "in dubio pro re" far overstates the force which can properly be ascribed to the ordinary meaning of statutory language. The judge has the power to choose among any of the possible meanings of a statutory word or phrase, however "plain" one of them may be. The question is how he should exercise his power in order to attain justice. The meaning most likely to occur to an interest reader of the statute is an obvious choice.

C. Ignorance of the law as an excuse [34]

Even though some provision of the law may give clear warning that a particular act or omission may be treated as an offence, a citizen may be totally unaware of the criminal nature of his act. This need not be due to deceitful action on the part of the government in hiding the law once passed. Indeed, if the government ever did act in such a reprehensible manner, it would seem entirely within a judge's authority to refuse to enforce the statue in question. Rather, the citizen's ignorance of the law may occur whenever the "crime" is not an act which the citizen regards as immoral (and therefore likely to be a crime); criminal law today is so complex that few citizens are likely to learn of any "warning," unless it received special prominence because of newspaper stories, the advice of their lawyer, or the like. This is perhaps especially likely to be true in a country such as Ethiopia, where the complexities of modern life are new, where codes, court decisions, and legal information are not widely available, and where not all citizens understand the languages in which they are published.

A consequence of this situation is that several theorists now appear to be arguing for reconsideration of the long-standing doctrine that "ignorance of the law is no defence." If warning of the law's penalties is important, they urge, the law must be prepared to take account of the many cases where citizens do not know the law and could not be expected to surmise it, because the law is highly technical and deals with what are sometimes called formal or statutory wrongs rather than moral wrongs.

Article 623, penalizing failure to register the birth of an infant, is a good example of the kind of regulation they have in mind. Provision for registration of births may be important to a modern nation; enforcement of such a provision by a criminal penalty is commonplace. But the average citizen would not think a failure to register the birth of his child was likely to be a crime, for he would not consider it immoral; his view—whether correct or not—is that the criminal law and morality largely coincide. Nor will he know of the obligation in any real sense simply because it appears in the Penal Code. Few citizens, even lawyers, have carefully read the Code. Unless the provision has been forcefully called to his attention in some way, any punishment inflicted upon him will be punishment for an act or omission which he did not know to be wrong and, realistically speaking, which he had no way of sensing might be wrong. This consideration may explain why, although "ignorance of the law is no defense" under Article 78 of the Penal Code, there are provisions in that article and Article 79(1) (a) for liberal reduction and even limination of sentence in cases of good faith ignorance or mistake. In the case of technical or regulatory offences, the principle of legality may not be protection enough.

Another appropriate reaction to a situation of this kind might be to prefer a relatively narrow meaning for the offence in question. Where a new offence essentially unrelated to previous criminal regulation has been created by the legislature, not only is the citizen unlikely to be aware of the offence, but the legislature, also, is unlikely to have considered as carefully as it otherwise might the extent it wishes the new regulation to have. Where the statute clearly applies to a given factual situation, of course one must assume it was meant to apply. But there is less reason to assume that the legislature meant the statute to apply in any uncertain cases, since the moral judgment made is a new one, and therefore may not have been fully explored. The suggestion that a new rule be narrowly construed is particularly appropriate for statutes touching on conduct previously accepted as legitimate, because of the considerations mentioned above in connection with the discussion of statutory vagueness. That is, legislatures as well as courts have a responsibility to be definite. This responsibility is greatest where enactments may threaten or inhibit legitimate or protected activities. By giving such a statute a narrow construction, the court at the same time assumes that the legislature has obeyed its responsibility, and acts to enforce that responsibility in case it has not.

D. Community Moral Standards as a Supplement to Statutory Warnings [35]

In the case of serious crimes, sometimes described as "infamous" or "bad in themselves," one might expect the situation to be exactly opposite from the birth registration case. Here, it could be argued that no formal warning is really necessary to apprise the citizen that his act will be subject to penalties. Regarding these crimes, most citizens—certainly the great majority of those who could be deterred by a written rule—will know that they are prohibited not because they are included in the written law, but because they are "wrong," "evil," or "immoral" according to a shared set of moral precepts. This suggests that it is the bounds of the moral precepts, rather than the bounds of the written law, which are the more important to be observed. Accordingly, some jurists have suggested that interpretation can be very free when the law in issue is one which refers to shared morals of this sort.

A number of cautions have to be observed regarding this statement, however; it can be seen that all of these relate back to the political functions of the principle of legality in establishing and protecting relationships between courts, legislatures and the citizen. First, there may be cases where the legislature has consciously decided not to punish as criminal certain acts which many regard as immoral. Obviously, any such decision must be respected; the legislature is the primary policy-maker here. Thus, fornication and prostitution are not, generally speaking, crimes under the Code's provisions dealing with sexual relations. While there might be no serious danger of unfairness to the citizen if courts "interpreted" the law to determine that such acts were crimes, any such "interpretation" would give serious offence to the legislative decision that they should not be punished as crimes. Second, all Ethiopian citizens may not share the same set of moral standards, coming as they do from so many diverse backgrounds. Parliament, in recognition of this, seems to have been particularly careful to spell out a number of offences which might not be recognized as such by various of Ethiopia's citizens. Article 524, discussed above, seems to be a good example of such a provision. Ethiopian courts, in turn, should recognize this factor by relying on statutory language to a greater degree than some of their European counterparts might now feel it necessary to do. Finally, it may be noted that considerations of "immorality" tend at the same time to founder and to work their gravest damage in those cases describable as "polititcal crimes." Here the danger of inhibiting valuable activity through imprecise wording of statutes is great. The threat of free interpretation in this area is equally great, particularly when one considers how ephemeral the "morality" of political acts is likely to be. Here, then, there is also a specific reason to restrain the judge's hand in interpretation, just as there is to restrain the legislature's hand in drafting.

XII. CONCLUSION

It is possible to rephrase the discussion above into a series of questions which the interpreter might ask himself when facing the task of understanding any statutory provision:

What could the words of this statute mean? That is, what choices does the statutory language leave open?

What job was this statute meant to do? How does it fit into the overall scheme? How might its function be different from the apparent functions of other provisions of the scheme?

How is this statute likely to be understood by the persons to whom it is directed? Will it be an entirely new standard of conduct for them, or something they more or less expect because of internal moral standards?

What are the practical effects of applying the statue to this case? Does the degree of severity in punishment seem to be about what one would expect an Ethiopian legislature to impose for this act? Will punishing this act imperil those who perform acts the legislature probably did not wish to forbid? Will it imperil acts the legislature is constitutionally forbidden to forbid? Does applying the statute to this case require applying the statute to another case, where its hypothetical purpose is not fulfilled?

Can the decision to apply or not to apply the statute to a particular case be rationally explained? Does it make sense in terms of its language, apparent purposes, and application or non-application to other cases?

The principle of legality requires that if the judge is deciding a case in favour of conviction, he must be able to conclude, "The language of the statute could mean this." The constitutional subordination of the judge to the legislature in statutory matters according to the separation of powers doctrine requires that in every case, civil as well as criminal, he must be able to conclude, "The language of the statutes does not require me to reach another conclusion." These are the only constitutional limitations on his interpretive power, on his freedom of choice. But a sense of his subordination to the legislature and of the policies represented by the principle of legality will make an interpreter anxious to assure that his interpretation satisfies at least some of the following criteria:

Consistency with ascertainable statutory purposes;
Uniqueness of function within a rational legislative scheme;
Sensibility of punishment in the context of contemporary moral standards;
A meaning which could be ascertained or at least expected by those who will be subject to the provision;
A meaning which does not threaten legitimate or protected acts;
Distinctions which can be explained in terms of believable hypotheses of legislative policy.

It should not be so surprising that the concrete limitations on judicial choice are so few. The so-called rules of interpretation are only verbal expressions, slogans which may represent useful policy but often overstate it. Choices exist, and always will exist, for judges to make. It is more honest to accept this fact and attempt to state a spirit or series of goals which might motivate choice than to attempt to conceal the fact of choice behind a camouflage of "rules." The major limitation will inevitably be found in the attitude which the judge—and the legislators—maintain towards their task. The principal role of the principle of legality is to suggest an appropriate attitude for both legislator and judge in the area of criminal law. It "can do no more than implement the attainment of the maximum possible certainty resulting from the operation of specific rules in a social milieu. It means no less." [36]

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: In response to your letter of February 3, 1972, in which you expressed an interest in suggestions drawn from comparative law that might help in drafting a Federal Penal Code for this country, I am sending you enclosed a Memorandum composed of two parts: A. An Introductory Part dealing with certain principles which I believe to be essential in utilizing foreign materials; B Comment on More Specific Topics. Since it is my belief that no foreign rule or solution should be considered apart from a context, I should appreciate it if this Memorandum were to be reproduced in its totality rather than partially or in parts.

Very sincerely yours,

HELEN SILVING.

STATEMENT BY HELEN SILVING, PROFESSOR OF LAW, UNIVERSITY OF PUERTO RICO, COMPARING STUDY DRAFT OF PROPOSED NEW FEDERAL CRIMINAL CODE TO EUROPEAN PENAL CODES

GENERAL PRINCIPLES

I am gratified to find that a Subcommittee of a Committee of the Senate wishes to include in its deliberations concerning a Draft Study of the Proposed New Federal Criminal Code lessons to be derived from experiences of foreign nations, especially those of the European Continent.[1] I have been stressing the need for cross-cultural fertilization of legal thought for many years, and I should be pleased to cooperate to the best of my abilities with the Subcommittee in its commendable task. But the time allotted to my reply is much too short for anything but a most cursory consideration.[2] I shall, therefore, limit myself to a few remarks of a general nature. Such limitation is also justified by the fact that most of the specific questions addressed to me have already been ably answered by Professors Andanaes and Damaska.[3] Moreover, I am glad to note that, as your letter of February 3, 1972 indicates, you are "searching for ideas and possibilities rather than material for a treatise or encyclopedia." Nevertheless, certain preliminary matters of a comprehensive nature should be taken into account by way of introduction to anything said thereafter.

I. Nature of Comparative Law

Comparative law does not—at any rate, should not—consist of ad hoc comparisons of disparate individual rules, principles or case-solutions. For each rule, principle or solution plays its crucial role within an integral system; it is not truly "functional," perhaps not even "relevant," outside of the system. Professor Paul K. Ryu of Seoul, Korea has demonstrated this feature of law and culture in his "field theory of culture."[4] Each "system," in turn, forms part of an ideology, which has its roots in a specific history of ideas, ideologies and attitudes, evolving an overall ethical, legal, sociological, political, in fact, also epistemological, project of thinking. As an illustration of a basic political-epistemological approach I might mention the fact that Marxist law proceeds from the ontological view of "naive realism" which eliminates epistemological doubts regarding the possibility of reliability of official access to knowledge of truth or justice. According to this ideology, which has its parallel in the Marxist view of economic value as inherent in the things themselves rather than determined by market valuations, there appears to be no need to formulate legal rules (especially those of evidence) in terms of "probabilities" stemming from epistemological doubt: in this view, the law and its organs are deemed infallible, and thus, the individual must yield.[5] Our own doctrine of judicial review of the constitutionality of statutes, as well as our institution of an autonomous "law of evidence," which take account of the fallibility of law and of judges[6] incorporate different epistemological ideas. An ideological line of thought similar to that underlying the mentioned American institutions may be found in the recent acceptance in some countries of the European Continent of the exemption or mitigation for "error of law," which on a verbal level has been also adopted in the Soviet Union,[7] but is outright rejected in this country.[8] But, as will be shown, in the mentioned European countries, that policy is believed to originate in the ideology of "legal science," next to be discussed.

Another example of an ideological underpinning of legal approaches is the continental European jurists' belief in "Criminal Law Science" as a source of law interpretation and unavowed law-creation. In earlier periods of our own law there obtained a remotely similar ideology that a specifically "legal science" can reveal what "is" law or proper law. But when we speak of "science" today, we have in mind disciplines that substantially assume a "causative" orientation, such as physics, chemistry, biology, anthropology, psychology, sociology. The so-called "science of law" of civil-law imprint might at best qualify as a systematization of a chosen policy scheme, as a specific type of axiology, hardly a "science" as we use this term. There is no denying the fact that the continental European jurists' "science of criminal law" affords certain legality safeguards which we would simply classify as considerations of a constitutional order. On the other hand, it has introduced into the law of civil-law countries a rigidity utilized by jurists in—often unconscious—schemes of manipulating symbols rather than determining consistent policy choices.[9]

The fact that we proceed from constitutional policy guidelines rather than from would-be "scientific considerations" of the described nature, is an asset which we should not readily abandon. Thus, I must warn as emphatically as I can against leaving determinations of any issues of criminal law interpretation to "legal science." Wherever such reference is made, it will ultimately result in judicial legislation, as the statute thus subject to be interpreted is to the extent of such interpretative gap "vague and uncertain."

Marginally, it should be noticed that the inductive "common-law" approach to legal solutions, proceeding from specific issues rather than dispositions based on a Weltanschauung, itself represents a choice of "system" and is by no means wholly chaotic or indeed inchoate.[10] But when code-drafting is planned, there is need for an overall policy-choice, in the light of which each individual rule should be formulated. In the specification of such rules, there is every reason to draw on the experience of other nations. However, that experience is barren unless such rules can be rationally integrated in our chosen policy scheme.

II. The Place of Definitions in a Code

Contrary to predominant assumptions, a "definition" in law is not a cognitive assertion but a normative, constituent part of the legal rule for which it is being formulated. This is true whether or not the definitional portion of the rule refers in ultimate analysis to some genuine "science;" for the point in issue might be controversial in the respective science itself, and the legislator should certainly be aware of the fact that in referring the judge to "science," he is actually permitting him to resolve a scientific controversy. Certainly, however, delegating to the judge disposition of an issue of the so-called "legal science" is opening the door to "judicial legislation," delegating legislative functions to the judicial branch, and in all likelihood creating "vague and uncertain" legislation.

The belief in the "infallibility" of judges in Marxian ideology forms part of the official Marxian interpretation of the continental European doctrine of "free evaluation of proof." On this interpretation, deviating from that of the Western democracies, see Silving, op. cit., supra, at 154–155.

The Soviet acceptance of this doctrine—even though practically only verbal—is inconsistent with its official ontological approach.

[8] See the Study Draft § 610, which admits such error only on the basis of a sort of "fault of government" basis, while one might well ask whether the government (including, if course, State Governments) is free of blame for not teaching criminal law in public schools.

The question of whether a Penal Code should or should not have definitions of general concepts, such as causation, intent, negligence, is controversial in civil-law countries. To be sure, experiences with some penal code definitions, particularly those of the Italian Penal Code, have been most disappointing, since these definitions do not actually indicate any legislative choice of policy; they lend themselves to inconsistent interpretations and often amount to useless "idem per idem" translations, as in defining "negligence" by "imprudence." (Art. 43, par. 3, Italiam Penal Code; for translation see Silving, Criminal Justice, vol. 2, 1971, at 683). In Germany, statutory law (including the latest version, Law of July 4, 1969. BGB1. I 717) does not define either intent, negligence, or causation, the theory being that these concepts can be best defined by "legal science". Actually, projects submitted by various groups in the preparatory stages of the German Code did define "intent" and "negligence" (see §§ 16–18 of the Draft of 1962, and §§ 17–18 of the so-called "Alternative Draft" [1969 version]), but these definitions were omitted in the final Act, along with the definition of "causation". As the preparatory drafts were the creature of the representatives of so-called "legal science" (mostly law-professors), one might assume their definitions to have been "scientific" enough for adoption in the Code. Indeed, it seems strange to expect judges to define "scientific" notions which "men of science" are unable to define in general terms.

It is a postulate of our constitutional "legality" barring "vagueness and uncertainty" of statutory terms as well as enjoining "separation of powers," that definitions in a Penal Code be made by legislators. However, utmost care should be exercised to make these definitions truly meaningful in the light of latest teachings of "language analysis." In terms of the philosophies of Charles Peirce, Wittgenstein, and others, these definitions must convey to judges the legislative choice reached by legislators.

III. Constitutional Substantive Criminal Law

"Constitutionalism" is perhaps the greatest American contribution to the world's legal culture. Our principle of judicial review of the constitutionality of statutes served as a pattern for the so-called "professorial constitutions" of Professors Preuss in Germany (Weimar Constitution) and Kelsen in Austria (1919 Constitution). But the incidents of constitutionalism have developed in a somewhat distinctive direction in these countries.[11] The differences are pertinent to the topic of the instant memorandum, but require an elaboration which would exceed its scope in terms of time and space. A few selective points of difference must suffice. In this country stress is placed on procedural legality, whereas in countries of continental Europe greater significance is attributed to substantive "legality." This is in accordance with the general preference in Europe for "substantive law" over "procedure," the latter being regarded as "instrumental" rather than "material." To it comes that, e.g., the Bonn Constitution is very much younger than ours and has developed more elaborate specified modern notions, such as "dignity," freedom of personality development," [12] which in our federal Constitution are at best implied. The fact is that our "substantive constitutional criminal law" is but incipient and as yet ill-equipped to resist the impact of archaic and ancient law survivals, supported by our traditional orientation to the past as source of wisdom.

COMMENTS ON MORE SPECIFIC TOPICS

1. Our "Police Power" Ideology Compared with the More Restrictive Substantive Law Notions of Civil-Law Jurists

Our prevailing ideology is that the police power of a state (also the Federal Union) in substantive criminal law matters is very wide. Only when it affects first freedoms is there a real tendency on the part of courts to assume jurisdiction. Peculiarly enough, so far there has been no awareness in this country that first freedoms are vitally and comprehensively restricted, if not eliminated, whenever a person is imprisoned. Our system of arrest, permitting it even for crimes which would not carry imprisonment after conviction,[13] our bail system which clearly discriminates against the poor, our prevailing belief in the state's power to define as crime anything that displeases a legislature or "the man in the street" (the "Clapham bus commuter" in England),[14] our notion of the total power of the state to impose sentences not proportionate to the significance of the precipitating offense, our allowing the sentencing process to turn "administrative," our failure to subject sentence enforcement to adequate legality safeguards, are features of our criminal law, which have no counterpart in the systems of continental Europe.[15] These features are challengeable under our own Constitution; since constitutional litigation is not and cannot be as prompt and as comprehensive as is warranted by the significance of the mentioned subjects, Congress would be well-advised to subject each and every aspect of the Draft Federal Criminal Code to elaborate, conscientious constitutional scrutiny; for "legislatures are ultimate guardians of the liberties and welfare of the people in quite as great a degree as the courts." Holmes, in Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. v. May, 194 U.S. 267, 270 (1904).

There may be quite as much basis for relating the triviality of our arrest grounds to the rules on resistance to an arrest as there is for reversing a judgment because of a technical inadmissibility of the products of an illegal search. Similarly, the structure of our bail system undoubtedly bears on our substantive rules on prison escape.[16] However, discussion of these topics would lead us deep into the area of specific rules. I will rather briefly deal under separate headings with the remaining above-mentioned topics.

2. State's Power to Define Crime

Imprisonment carrying a total deprivation of civil rights, definition of crime sanctioned by imprisonment ipso facto raises a constitutional issue; since the rights involved include "first freedoms," the presumption is against constitutionality of any such definition. The Government thus has the burden of proving that the statutory definition is constitutionally proper, meaning, that there obtains an overwhelming community necessity for making a conduct as defined criminal. I submit that this principle constitutes the basis of the recent trend toward "decriminalization" of the law.[17] In this context I should like to draw attention to the fact that in Germany the influential "Alternative Draft" (Alternative to the Draft of 1962) suggests elimination of numerous crimes, among them, obscenity; incest; pandering other than "bringing about prostitution" of certain minors (§ B 10); pimping.

Structures of crime in which there obtains a gross disproportion between the requirement of actus reus and mens rea, such as crimes of specific intent (typical example, our burglary concept), known in Germany as "crimes with an overflowing inner tendency," and crimes aggravated by consequences ("durch den Erfolg qualifizierte Delikte") are in disfavor.[18] The former crime structures are but one step removed from "conspiracy" which as a general category is rejected by jurists of the civil-law tradition.[19] In accordance with suggestions of the American Law Institute Model Penal Code (Section 5.03), the Study Draft, § 1004, has somewhat improved the "conspiracy" notion of our law. But this improvement does not meet basic objections of civil-law jurists against its "punishing thought." [20] Along with the notion of "attempt" (Study Draft, § 1001), "conspiracy" is due for a complete overhaul.[21] In this connection, there also obtains an urgent need for reassessment of our "burglary" concept, which has no parallel in civil-law penal codes,[22] and similarly, of all crime structures of the category known in European law as "versari in re illicita." [23] Subjectivism, characteristic of the National Socialist "criminal law punishing the evil mind" ("will") has no place in a democratic criminal law. Nor is "responsibility for results not related to guilt" consistent with such law.

3. Constitutional Vagaries in Sentencing and the Need for New Ideas

A most peculiar feature of our constitutional system is the lack of coordination between trial and sentencing safeguards. One might query to what end, if not for the purpose of potential sentencing, defendants are being tried. If our constitutional system of criminal law is to survive, Williams v. New York, 337 U.S. 241 (1949), must be overruled or Congress and State legislatures must revise all legislation that survives under the protection of its ruling. I cannot dwell upon this matter at this time, but wish to refer to my criticisms of this case in various publications.[24] Perhaps, to demonstrate the absurdity of this decision, it may suffice to refer to its grotesque assertion of the rehabilitative ideal in affirming a death sentence. Supra, at 248. The ruling is quite incomprehensible to civil-law jurists, trained in the belief that punishment must be reasonably proportionate to the crime to which the defendant is sentenced.[25] In recent German legislation, proportionality to the significance of the act is required also for measures of security and cure. Compare German Act of July 4, 1969 (BGBl. I 717), § 62.

I wholeheartedly approve of the Draft's systematization of punishment scales (§ 3002), as contrasted with the civil-law specification of a scale for each crime individually.[26] This systematization requires the legislators to clarify in their own minds and to others into which among the several punishment classes they ought to assign any given crime type in terms of its reprehensibleness or harmfulness. But I have grave doubts regarding the justice or rehabilitative potential of indefinite sentences (Study Draft, § 3201), as they tend to produce anxiety. In practical terms, the parole potential available in European codes renders their definite sentences perhaps also, to this extent, indefinite.[27] However, the prisoner is informed of what he may expect in the worst event, and the maxima being shorter than those of the Study Draft, the scope of uncertainty is less traumatic.

As regards punishment types, I should like to draw attention particularly to an interesting innovation introduced by the Penal Code of Poland of 1969 (Official Journal of Laws of the People's Republic of Poland, May 14, 1969, Item 94, Act of April 1969), Arts. 30–34, whereby "restriction of liberty" (ograniczenie wolno sci) functions as an autonomous punishment type, distinct from probation. The defendant's freedom of action is limited in his being held, (1) not to change his place of residence without court permission, (2) to perform unremunerated labor for public purposes to the extent of 20 to 50 hours a month, (3) to be barred from performing functions in civic organizations, and (4) to give account of matters relative to the course of the execution of the penalty. May I also draw attention to my own suggestion for formulation of an autonomous sanction type, consisting in an impersonal form of "supervision," to be applied in principle to all crimes other than those affecting the bodily security of persons.[28]

Even within the Thyren system, fines are essentially inegalitarian, and since most prisoners are poor, grave doubts obtain as regards the function a sanction of this type may realistically perform.

4. Judicial Obligation to State the Grounds of Decision

Appellate Review of Sentences (Study Draft, § 1291) is a welcome innovation introduced by the Study Draft. However, it should be supplemented by a most heuristic institution of foreign penal laws: the judicial obligation to state the grounds of decision, including the considerations which formed the basis of reaching the given sentence. German Code of Criminal Procedure, § 267. Some believe that this obligation is of constitutional dimension. Brüggemann, Die Richterliche Begündungspflicht (1971). This institution contrasts favorably with the position assumed by our law, best exemplified by Justice Black's statement in Williams v. New York, supra, at 252: "And it is conceded that no federal constitutional objection would have been possible if the judge here had sentenced appellant to death... giving no reason at all."

5. The so-called "Dual System"

In 1959, Professors Lasswell and Donelly wrote a paper in which they believed to have initiated the idea of "isolating the condemnation sanction," that is, punishment, by creating alongside with it a differently structured, preventive sanction. See The Continuing Deate Over Responsibility: An Introduction to Isolating the Condemnation Sanction, 68 Yale Law Journal 869 (1959). This division of criminal sanctions into punitive and protective types was known in Europe at least since 1893, when Carl Stoos's Project of a Swiss Penal Code was published See Exposé des Motifs de l'Avant Projet de 1898 (Basel-Geneva, 1893). In fact, it was adopted by several penal codes, the German, the Swiss Federal, the Italian, and the Polish Penal Code. The sanction contrasted with "punishment" is known as a "measure of security and of cure," and it is deemed not to carry a judgment of censure, but rather to function for the protection of the community and for the care and cure of the person concerned. It is, however, in principle imposed where the defendant is found to have engaged in a criminal conduct but shows certain special personal characteristics, such as insanity, alcoholism, addiction, or habitual criminality. This type of sanction is, on the other hand, also distinguished from an administrative "measure," in that it is predicated upon a judicial finding of engagement in a criminal conduct, and can be imposed only by a court. I believe this system, where properly structured to fulfill the "isolation function,"[29] to be most heuristic, as it avoids the erratic method of groping for the limits of punishment within the ambit of criminal law itself.

6. Courts of Sentence Execution

Jourists of the civil-law tradition would object most strenuously to any attempt at turning the criminal law "administrative." "Measures" too must be imposed by judges and judicially controlled. Precisely for the purpose of administering measures that may require revision, substitution or termination in the course of the enforcement stage of judgment and sentence, there has been introduced in Italy in 1930 the institution of the so-called "giudice di sorveglianza," "supervisory judge," who supervises the process of the execution of measures, as well as that of punishment. A similar institution was introduced in France in 1957, the task of the "juge de l'application des peines" being mainly that of individualizing punishment and its execution (since in France the system is monistic).[30] The "Vollstreckungsrichter" has been lately also introduced in Germany. See, e.g., Act of July 4, 1969 (BGB1. I 717) § 57, 67.

I firmly believe that a court of this type, sitting inside prison walls and determing controversies between prisoners and the prison administration, seeing to it that the prisoner receive proper "justice" and that his civil rights not be curtailed beyond necessity, determining the grant and revocation of parole,[31]

[30] See Silving, "Rule of Law" in Criminal Justice, supra, note 15, at 130–138, 152–154.

[31] I would abolish "parole boards" and deny any jurisdiction in the matter of parole to correctional authorities. It may be also pertinent to add that "judges of sentence execution" in Europe are not as independent as our judges are. I suggest that they be granted full independence and power to decide (not merely to advise).

supervising the administration of measures (e.g., any problems that may arise in the course of an assignment to a mental institution pursuant to a court order) is an irreducible "must" at this time in this country, for the preservation of human dignity and in the light of recent insights into the conditions of prison administration. This institution should be integrated into the Federal Criminal Code as part of its working apparatus.

7. Constituent Elements of Crime

Among the "Constituent Elements of Crime," which form the first part of the "General Part" of a Criminal Code, the second part being devoted to "Sanctions," I can mention briefly only two most essential points. One pertains to the structuring of the "mental element," meaning "intent," "recklessness" and "negligence." The definitions of the Study Draft (§ 302) are preferable to those of, e.g., the Italian Code (Art. 43), but they do not appropriately separate the subjective and the objective elements; only such analytical separation can afford a clear and precise guide to the judge.[32]

The second, crucial need of our jurisprudence today is recognition of error of law as an exemption ground. According to dominant jurisprudential opinion in this country, "law consists of predictions of what courts will do in the future" (Holmes). Where such opinion prevails, is it proper to convict a man for acting in ignorance or mistake of the criminality of his conduct, that is, for "predicting wrongly?" Much injustice could be rectified by admitting the exemption from criminal responsibility based on legal error. I have in mind such injustice as that done to Ginzburg,[33] who certainly had every reason to believe that the statute under which he was later convicted was unconstitutional and whose belief was substantiated by practically all previous and subsequent cases.[34] The fact that such belief is not protected tends to discourage constitutional challenges and thus to perpetuate the life of unconstitutional statutes. For it is hard to expect a man that he risk imprisonment as a price of testing the constitutionality of a statute.

In my own view,[35] no distinction should be made between the treatment of legal and that of factual error. However, the doctrine that is now dominant in Germany and Switzerland permits a middle of the road approach, which may perhaps be more suitable at this time for acceptance within our federal system, steeped in the doctrine of error juris haud excusat. According to the doctrine at present accepted by German courts (BGHSt. 2, 194), known as "doctrine of guilt" (Schuldtheorie),[36] a person violating a law in ignorance or mistake as to its prohibition is totally exempt from punishment for intentional crime only where his error was excusable. Where it was not excusable, he is subject to a more or less severe punishment depending on the degree of his guilt in failing to "exert his conscience" (meaning, to make an effort) in order to ascertain the law. In practice, this doctrine affords a mitigation ground for legal error, and only in extreme situations a total exemption.

This rule evolved in Germany in the course of judicial interpretation. Its statutory formulation is of recent date. In fact, the pertinent statute of July 4, 1969 (BGBl I 717), § 17 (for text see Silving, Criminal Justice, Volume 2, at 811), will not become effective until October 1, 1973.

The rules on "Complicity" (which in the Study Draft are structured solely in terms of "acting through an innocent agent"), those on "Crime Plurality," the "insanity" rule, require a total reassessment. For comparative consideration, I refer to my "Constituent Elements of Crime," "Criminal Justice," and "Essays on Mental Incapacity and Criminal Conduct." For "perjury" rules, see my "Essays on Criminal Procedure."

[32] I suggest, with all humility, that my own definitions of the mental element (see my Constituent Elements of Crime, op. cit., supra, at 206–254) are more precise than those of the Study Draft.

[33] Ginzburg v. United States, 383 U.S. 463 (1966).

[34] As aptly pointed out by Alan M. Dershowitz, "The Court Made a Law Just For Him." See The New York Times of February 13, 1972, E 8. Dershowitz quotes Alexander Bickel stating that in the "Ginzburg case, the Court punished a man under a rule applicable to no one else, past or future. It made of Mr. Ginzburg an example that exemplified nothing." For the purpose of the discussion in the text, I assume without admitting that the rule in the Ginzburg case is per se just. My question is thus reduced to the following query: should Ginzburg be punished if he misconceived that rule (in terms of its constitutionality), which after all was enunciated ex post facto?

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, BERKELEY,
Berkeley, Calif., February 8, 1972.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate, Committee on the Judiciary, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I have your circular inquiry of February 3, 1972 requesting comparatists around the country to submit comments on your questionnaire concerning foreign criminal laws.

At the outset I should state that I cannot consider myself an expert in this area, never having taught the subject and that, I fear, very few will consider themselves qualified to report on "foreign laws as such" in view of the enormous differences existing even between civil law countries. My only qualification consists in the fact that up to 35 years ago I was an Austrian judge in criminal matters, and I am glad to state whatever minor observations I can offer on that basis. I should also add that a few weeks ago I published a book on "Psychoanalytic Jurisprudence" which contains a fairly extensive chapter on psychological problems bearing upon the administration of criminal law. Since perhaps some of my observations may be of interest to members of your staff, I enclose a xerox of that chapter for casual perusal. I am encouraged to do so by the statement in your inquiry according to which your main purpose is that of "searching for ideas and possibilities."

In studying your individual questions it struck me that, as everywhere else, the question of criminal responsibility phrased in terms of "insanity" will probably be among those creating the greatest difficulty. As no doubt known to you, Germany has been through several years of discussing drafts and counter drafts of a new criminal code and here, too, that question has remained in the center of public discussion without leading to a satisfactory solution. I truly believe that a distinction among different types of crimes as suggested in my book would offer a new approach which conceivably could remove some of the now existing difficulties. In this context thought should perhaps be given to what in some continental codes is referred to as the defense of "emergency" which, in contrast to the justifying facts of "self defense" typically offers "excuses" from responsibility.

While I have personally somewhat unorthodox views about the problems surrounding sentencing, I feel that it would be presumptuous for me to take a position in view of my lack of practical experience in this country. Merely to introduce foreign code provisions in this context would appear to me potentially misleading in view of the wholly different background in the judicial administration of foreign countries.

I might add that one of my students, Thomas Robertson, has just completed a book on a comparison between American and German criminal law reforms, together with Professor Lee of Wayne University and would no doubt be greatly honored if permitted to submit the result of his research.

Sincerely,

ALBERT A. EHRENZWEIG.

Fourth Chapter

LAWS AND LAWNESSES

§176. In earlier chapters we observed the central problem of legal philosophy about the concept of "justice" resolve itself into an emotional conflict between inconsistent justnesses, which called for a prevailingly psychological analysis. Here, an attempt will be made to test in the same manner several central problems of the law which have earned their place within the traditional scope of jurisprudence by relying on justnesses anchored in the deepest layers of our minds. Since man encounters the law most frequently and most dramatically in its sanctions, criminal and civil responsibility as well as the sanctioning process itself will be discussed in this context.

A. JUSTNESSES OF CRIMINAL LAW: PUNISHMENT AND "TREATMENT"

1. Why we punish

a. Social justification and motivation

(1) "Reason"

§177. At least since Bentham's utilitarian message,[1] hornbook learning has taught us that modern punishment is determined by three rational purposes: the "general deterrence" (general prevention) of potential wrongdoers, the offender's "special deterrence" (special prevention, reformation), and the protection of society by his "rehabilitation," total elimination, or at least segregation through preventive detention. Some psychologists are even satisfied with the discussion of criminal law only in terms of these last measures, omitting not only irrational retaliatory punishment as an unavoidable institution but even general prevention by deterrence as a rational purpose.[2] Increasingly, however, we seem willing to face the fact that the classic purposes of punishment are only very imperfectly served by the administration of criminal justice. Yet, all our efforts continue to be limited to attempted improvements of this "official" structure. We rarely admit, and hardly ever face, the overwhelming impact of that "unofficial" motor of much of our criminal law, our retaliatory urge.

Almost everything that can be said in criticism of this attitude has been said in an immense number of writings in all countries, not only in law but in virtually every branch of the humanities. But one point which is essential for the present purpose is only rarely made. All leading texts deal with crime as if it were a homogeneous concept.[3] And, unhappily, current legislative proposals largely persist in a similar unitary treatment.[4] They are thus unable to resolve the ever more pressing controversy between "humanitarians" who aim at the abolition of all punishment, and "conservatives" whose creed is the preservation of the status quo with its conception of criminal responsibility.[5] Any analysis of criminal law, any diagnosis and prognosis, to be helpful, must distinguish between the several principal types of crime in accord with the enormous variations in both the rational and irrational elements of their treatment by society. Yet, even those few studies which are devoted to a psychology of the punishing society rather than of the punished offender, fail to draw the necessary distinctions.[6] Before we can explore this further, we must restate and trace those neglected irrational bases of punishment which we have preliminarily identified as retaliatory urges. Since these urges appear in criminal law as "moralized aggressions", we must begin this discussion of non-reason with the origin and function of aggression itself.

(2) Non-reason

§178. Pregenital aggression. That the very concept of responsibility is clearly related to the early function of the Superego has often been said and shown. In preceding sections we met this Superego in its original Freudian description as "the heir of the Oedipus complex."[7] As such, it sufficed as a working hypothesis for the origin of our sence of justice. For our present purpose, however, we shall also have to avail ourselves of post-Freudian insights and speculations concerning certain pre-oedipal aggressive reactions, some of which were anticipated by Abraham in 1916.[8] But details are likely to remain controversial due to the impossibility of analyzing the nonarticulating or half-articulating infant.[9] Indeed, we may never progress beyond the study of mankind's primeval tradition which, from Zoroaster and Empedocles to classic Greece and Israel, worshipped gods whose aggressive desires exceeded those of their creatures.[10]

Perhaps it is ethology which may supply us with new insights into the origins of pregenital aggression. Konrad Lorenz sees the animal "this side of good and evil" in thoughtful juxtaposition to Nietzsche's "beyond."[11] In this sense it would be man who inbred into his own race a needless aggression based on his first deliberate revenge as a vanquished fighter who had been deprived of his chance to flee or surrender by the long-distance weapon of his victorious opponent.[12] It would thus become mankind's fateful question whether we shall in time develop those new psychological tools which will enable us to forego such aimless aggression before our final mutual destruction.

Until and unless we come to grips with this problem, we shall probably persist in our existentialist, wishful illusion which conveniently relegates all aggression to a presumably reversible postnatal experience, to "nurture rather than nature."[13] But it is difficult to doubt the instinctive nature of human violence "in spite of the occasional waves of pollyannaism and denial."[14] There is too much evidence for a pre-superego aggression "turned inward."[15] How could we otherwise account for those aggressive urges which, "without hatred and the spirit of revenge," "want the infliction of Psychoanalysts have begun to be concerned about the parallels and distinctions between human and animal aggression. "Violence and aggression in animals of the same species is an inborn protective device, a limited discharge reaction, usually with a built-in security system for their members. But in man atavistic bestiality gets mixed up with that strange human computer called brain and mind and finally with the man-made machinery of organized brutality and warfare. Man's atavistic werewolf delusions are continually fortified by frenzied fantasies of hate and revenge, of guilt and punishment, of scorn and humiliation. Man's aggression is not innate and persistent as such. It is the result of a disorganization of drives provoked by manifold inner and outer factors and by lack of cultural transformation and control. What environmental mistakes have we made? Where did our taming and ritualization of instincts go wrong?" Merloo 55.

positive suffering"?[16] It is these urges that, extroverted, are the ancestors of that "moralized counter-aggression" of revenge by retaliation, which has remained an essential element of punishment and war.[17]

§179. Moralized counter-aggression (revenge by retaliation). We hardly need anthropological support for the ubiquity of retaliation.[18] "Men, like many other animals, grow angry and retaliate when they are hurt...Such retaliation when it is not immediate or spontaneous but implies some degree of deliberation is what we often speak of as revenge."[19] Contrary to an age-old assumption,[20] "brutes" and "beasts" are incapable of such a reaction. They either flee the victorious foe or they surrender. It is man, we have seen, who alone has indulged in deliberate revenge ever since his first long-distance weapon has enabled him to reach his enemy unseen and has thus prevented the vanquished foe from fleeing or surrendering to end the fight and has prevented the victor from sensing that inhibition of pity known to his brother the wolf.[21] It was thus that the loser was forced into taking revenge himself or through his group.

Group deliberation, having first turned individual revenge into the tribal "feud,"—in a more complex society became the punitive action of the state. Thus, the curse of feud and war with their threat of final self-annihilation has become man's privilege which at times has not shunned even the infliction of vicarious suffering on children and brothers, from the Bible's gruesome tales to the killing of hostages by enemies and tyrants. Following general usage, we shall speak of this revenge in the general context of retaliation,[22] although we are concerned only with the criminal law's deliberate retaliatory action.

But in due course, society's counter-aggression by such action has also adopted another vital function. It has been "moralized" by being used to help the agressor in fighting his own temptation. By "punishing" the offender, "we are not only showing him that he can't 'get away with it' but holding him up as a terrifying example to our tempted and rebellious selves."[23] It is recognition of this mechanism that opens the way to the principal thesis of this chapter: the need of criminal law for a fundamental distinction between types of crimes. We have assumed that the superego's "punitive," moralized counter-aggression acts to reinforce the potential offender's repression of criminal urges. But the degree of such repression which the offender must overcome when yielding to a criminal impulse, and thus the degree of the superego's need for the reinforcement of this repression vary greatly with the type of the offense. To be sure, these variations of both the repression and its reinforcement remain largely unconscious in an irrational mechanism. Yet it is these unconscious variations that require a distinction between several types of crimes even where the rationalized purposes of punishment, deterrence and restraint, seem to permit unitary treatment. This distinction, it is true, must remain as vague and doubtful as both the offender's and society's motivations. But in order to state the problem and point the way to new answers, it may prove expedient to use a dramatic illustration as a tentative basis for a first analysis. We shall use as such a starting point that early infantile "complex" which, for better or for worse, has come to be identified with the tragedy of King Oedipus who slew his father and married his mother.

22. Hegel's acceptance of this retaliation (Grundlinien §218), as contrasted with a revenge which he considered the very negation of law (id. §102), is hardly tenable. See also Marcic, Hegel 68. Such a distinction would, of course, be rationally desirable. But it is beyond the irrational irreality of our unconscious reactions.—Jeremiah (XXX 29-30) warned against vicarious punishment. And we may well proudly claim that we have ceased to punish the offender's descendants as mankind was punished for Adam's sin. (But see e.g. on Anglo-Saxon practices, Pollock and Maitland I 56.) And we may continue to attempt to de-rationalize mankind's guilt feeling for its real or imaginary first crime of killing the son of the Lord. (See Freud XIII 140-146). But have we succeeded? Shall we ever succeed? Family feuds, hereditary wars, and the killing of hostages may make us doubt even this minor achievement.

(3) Oedipal and post-oedipal crimes

§180. The needed distinction. Freud, without ever attempting to engage in psycho-legal speculation, observed: "There are countless civilized people who would shrink from murder or incest but who do not deny themselves the satisfaction of their avarice, their aggressive urges or their sexual lusts and who do not hesitate to injure other people by lies, fraud and calumny, so long as they can remain unpunished for it; and this, no doubt, has always been so through many ages of civilization."[24] These two types of crimes, according to the genesis of their underlying urges, can very roughly be distinguished as oedipal and post-oedipal, according to whether their commission presupposes repression of an urge which dates back to our oedipal period of parricidal wishes. I am very much aware that the proposed terminology is open to many attacks, from a wholesale denial of the Oedipus theory to innumerable disputes over lines of distinction. But no other terminology has been proposed that would serve the present purpose as provocatively and significantly. Refinements will have to await further study.

23. Flugel 169. To put it differently: "A man who has agreed to bargain away [by repression] instinctual desires at no small psychic cost to himself, is incensed that another may pursue his anti-social impulses without being punished." DeGrazia 760. See also infra §185. In this sense, there is a relation between guilt and fear. Niesen 27.

24. Freud XXI 12.

In our culture, the "normal" person who commits a passion murder[25] must overcome earliest and, therefore, strongest repressions which are normally imposed at the oedipal stage. Such an oedipal crime can thus occur only due to an "abnormal" absence of repression or due to an overpowering urge. In either case, fear of punishment will be ineffective to act as a rational deterrent to both the actually and potentially tempted. It is too weak both to replace the normal oedipal repression and to compete with urges strong enough to overcome it. Moreover, insofar as the process of repression remains unconscious, it is inaccessible to conscious motivation. Any punishment of such crimes, lacking rational purpose, must thus in effect be understood, at least primarily, as an irrational and largely unconscious reaction of society, unless we are satisfied, which we are not, with such punishment merely serving as a public condemnation of a "wrong" (§185). Attempts at penal reform in this area should, but do not take account of this fact.

On the other hand, there are those crimes which, like theft, "welfare offenses," or simple infractions, can be roughly characterized as postoedipal because they respond to desires whose repression occurs at a postoedipal stage. This repression is essentially weaker than that of oedipal urges. Since it is also wholly or partly conscious, punishment can often fortify it effectively. Here the administration of criminal law is, therefore, susceptible to rational improvement by effective deterrence, reformation, and restraint.

Group actions excluded. Regretfully we must exclude from this discussion many situations which, though appearing as criminal violations of valid laws, defy classification and analysis in the present context despite their crucial relevance particularly in times of social and political unrest. Mob actions of all kinds may present psychological problems fundamentally different from those involved in individual crime. Here, the effort of overcoming even oedipal repression may be left to the father figure of the leader or to the "family" of the group or nation. Moreover, initial or ultimate denial of the validity of the national or international apex norm (§§13, 132) may analytically exclude the action from the realm of criminal law altogether and transform it into an incident of an "amoral," civil or international, war. At a lower level, gang crimes or, in historical perspective, feuds and duels, might equally require re-evaluation of "crime" and "punishment". Shallowness and consciousness of the transgressor's repressions and desires may in such cases permit rationalization of punishment as deterrence where repressive measures would otherwise have been irrational retaliation. We must leave these all-important problems to others more qualified by specialized experience and knowledge and return to the only theme of the present analysis:

25. Freud included incest in this group, presumably on the pattern of the Oedipus crime. If we do not follow Freud's model at this point, this is due to the many disparate types of incest in daily judicial practice which center around intra-family crimes between nonrelatives such as the step-father and his "child."

the relation of the purposes of punishment to definitions of responsibility in the area of the individual, typical crime.

We may safely assume that non-oedipal crimes constitute the vast majority of those prosecuted in courts and other agencies.[26] We shall, therefore, discuss them first, beginning with "technical" infractions and other non-property crimes as the most obvious instances.

b. Rational deterrence, reformation, and restraint (post-oedipal crimes)

§181. Technical and other non-property crimes. There are not many among us who, without the threat of punishment, would hesitate to violate some of the innumerable, merely technical, "a-moral" prescriptions and prohibitions which surround us, be it by a parking violation or a petty theft. Here, our temptation is fully conscious and punishment can act rationally as a means of both general and specific deterrence. A former judge may presume to lighten the heavy analysis at this point by recounting from his experience in an Austrian, prevailingly rural community what he considers as two significant instances of effective punishments or threats of punishment with regard to such crimes.

In one instance, he had been faced every Monday for years, with the frustrating task of convicting and sentencing to fines or light prison terms young ruffians who, according to age-old custom, had engaged on previous Saturdays in wild brawls in a tavern, which, by accident rather than design, often resulted in serious injuries. One day, however, the judge announced on the court house door, perhaps unlawfully but with good intentions, that, in the future, he would impose the maximum sentence of six months in jail on any sabbatical fighter who, having inflicted however slight an injury, would be found to have carried a knife. Thenceforth, Saturday entertainment was continued without knives. In the other case, the judge actually imposed the maximum sentence on a very wealthy, incompetent driver who, after repeated warnings to let himself be driven by his chauffeur, was involved in his third, though harmless accident. To be sure, the sentence was commuted as expected. But our motorist never again drove himself.

As to such non-oedipal crime, then, we are able and likely to measure the severity of punishment by need and purpose and can thus in good reason and good conscience inflict hardship on the offender.[27] This proposition was

26. California felony statistics state the proportion between personal and property crimes as 3:20. But see also Norval Morris and Gordon Hawkins who properly stress that crime is not a unitary phenomenon, and that research into its "causes" is about as sensible as a project of research into "disease."

27. See e.g. Schoenfeld, Symbolism 67-77. Any deterrence must be directed to one, some, or all stages of the superego's development: fear, shame, and internalized guilt. Bernard Diamond, Ray Lectures, suggests persuasively that the ineffectiveness of most attempts at deterrence is due to the law's inability to reach beyond the first stage. Id. at note 13. For perhaps most strongly supported by the experience of German-occupied Denmark where removal of the police resulted in the abandonment of all punitive measures. There was hardly a change in the number of oepidal crimes which, as we shall see, are largely inaccessible to deterrence (§203). On the other hand, the number of post-oedipal crimes increased enormously, quite clearly because of the absence of the needed deterrence.[28] Unhappily, the relative ineffectiveness of such deterrence for oedipal crime was not taken into account by such fundamentalists as Pufendorf,[29] such utilitarians as Bentham[30] and such other leaders of the science of criminal law as Liszt[31] all of whom saw punishment as a means of deterrence and reformation for all types of crime. This view, which still persists, could not but provoke equally overgeneralized denials of this function of punishment[32] and has contributed greatly to the current confusion[33] which has become particularly pernicious in the area of property crimes where all purposes of punishment compete.

§182. Property crimes. Like other post-oedipal infractions, we punish most property crimes with the primary aim to deter, with little need of retaliation.[34] Here a shallow, post-oedipal repression can often be decisively enhanced against temptation. But here in the areas of property crimes, the retaliatory element is not so generally absent as in response to most other infractions. Thus, at one time, a negligible violation of private property led the illiterate to the gallows, while unbridled class law granted the literate "the benefit of clergy" to escape secular punishment. Indeed, in this area vindictive laws have been as pervasive as their mitigation by the most varied means of statutory, judicial, and administrative evasion.[35] In any event, reason relatively unburdened by retaliatory unreason, has increasingly come to understand severe punishment of lesser crimes to be counter-productive.[36]

Ironically, those very attempts progressively to replace the retaliatory element in this area by schemes which are primarily to serve both general and special prevention effectively and humanely, have posed new difficult problems. Increasingly such schemes seek to add to these rational purposes the equally rational aim at the same time and by the same means to advance the offender's rehabilitation.[37] Even these rational purposes of punishment, however, are typically irreconcilable with each other. "If you are to punish a man ... you must injure him. If you are to reform him, you must improve him."[38] But these problems, serious as they be to the penologist, do not concern us here in a philosophical and psychological analysis which seeks to determine the meaning and function of criminal responsibility. Indeed, the latter's concomitant, the defense of insanity, has little relevance in the entire area of non-oedipal crime, for which the incidence of this defense in the United States has been estimated at two percent.[39] Leaving aside unavoidable skirmishes in the "borderland" (§203), the discussion about the "theories" of criminal law is thus virtually limited to what I have proposed to call oedipal crimes.

c. Irrational retaliation (oedipal crimes)

(1) The proof: death row and elsewhere

§183. The test case: insanity in the death cell. "Henry Ford McCracken, 34, condemned Santa Ana sex murderer ... was morose, slovenly and full of fantasies. He imagined he had rabbits and cats in his cell, and he made a mess in pretending to feed them. [He] has been given six electric shock treatments of the kind usually prescribed for insane persons ... Since the treatments, the warden said, McCracken has again become neat in his personal habits, and he now plays the guitar and occasionally sings." Briefly, the prisoner was ready for the gas chamber and the judge so ruled.[40] This is not a parody of a medieval chronicle, a tale of totalitarian sadism, or a demented fantasy, but a clipping from the San Francisco Chronicle, dated San Quentin Prison, January 15, 1953.

At all times and in all countries there has apparently been agreement that no insane person may be executed though he was sane and responsible at the time of his deed and trial.[41] Coke found it "cruel and inhuman [to kill an insane man] because by intendment of law the execution of the offender is for example ... but so it is not when a madman is executed."[42] This pious rationale is palpably wrong. No wonder that it was rejected only half a century later. Ever since, we have been told instead that every prisoner should be able to raise "his just defense" until he dies.[43] And as late as 1962, a California commission proposed to protect any prisoner "unable to confer or consult, or ... to communicate knowledge of any fact that may have a bearing on his guilt or on the mitigation of his penalty." Yet, obviously, "it is possible to speculate endlessly about the possibilities that would rescue a condemned man from execution provided it were delayed long enough."[44]

Why then do we spare the insane prisoner in the death cell? Official theory fails.[45] Execution precludes his "reform," and deterrence could be achieved whatever his state of mind. We have chosen him as our test case for the role of retribution in penology, because as to him this facet is irrefutably the sole determinant of punishment and will remain such despite any procedural safeguards.[46] Indeed, such procedural safeguards which often lead to indeterminate imprisonment under the ever-present threat of execution, will to most observers be little more than vengeance "with a vengeance." A Mississippi court has explained, with disarming frankness, that it spared the lunatic on the ground that "amid the darkened mists of [his] mental collapse, there is no light against which the shadows of death may be cast. It is revealed that if he were taken to the electric chair, he would not quail ..."[47]

§184. And otherwise? It is true, of course, that the irrational retaliatory element of punishment does not appear anywhere so clearly as in the death cell. But nobody can deny that this element is highly relevant also at other levels of this process, even where it is combined with rational motivations of deterrence, rehabilitation, and restraint. The frightening tale so often told of man's inhumanity to man need not be retold. Only he who wants to shut his ears and his eyes, can deny that retribution has always been our primary motivation, both conscious and subconsious, in our dealing with oedipal crime, and, for that matter, also such post-oedipal crimes as political[48] and many narcotics offenses. Even the great 19th century scholar Stephen knew this when he compared the role of punishment in relation to revenge, to that of marriage in relation to the sexual urge.[49] And a leading German 19th century author saw the day on which the urge for revenge would yield to reasoned punishment based on pure love for one's neighbor, as the "day on which man will cease to be man."[50] It is little short of incredible, therefore, that in 1964 an outstanding American judge could be "amazed" at the fact that "a few theorists of the criminal law have now come out into the open and argued" a rationale of retribution:[51] or that in 1968 a leading continental text could insist on outlawing retaliation as denying that "even the criminal is human."[52] It is less incredible, though equally significant, that in the same year, the important new criminal code of Bulgaria thought it feasible to limit the official purposes of punishment to general and special deterrence (art. 36). These and other current efforts to extend the process of rationalization and humanization from the treatment of post-oedipal crime to oedipal crime can only cause harm insofar as these efforts ignore psychological reality (s 187). If we are to avoid this result, we must explore further the origin, growth and function of aggressive and retaliatory urges.

(2) The roots: conscious and unconscious

§185. Conscious theory. There have been many dialectic and moral justifications for our need of retaliation.[53] Theological reverence[54] and age-old sophistry are still reflected in Hegel's conception of "punishment as only the manifestation, the second half of crime,"[55] in Kant's categorical imperative,[56] or in Pius'XII restoration of the equilibrium.[57] Utilitarian reasoning appears in Bierling's "essential vindication of governmental authority;"[58] more covertly in Lord Denning's "emphatic denunciation of the community;"[59] and most naively in a revived "concept of Desert."[60] No less

No attempt will be made here to review again the welter of pious language that has accumulated through the ages. An analytical study would have to cut through the thin surface of conscious pretense in order to reveal the unconscious facets at the root of retribution. Such a study is still lacking. But some of these facets have become obvious.

§186. Subconscious reality. "Punishment dreams fulfill the wish of [society's] sense of guilt which is the reaction to the repudiated impulse."[64] Since repression of aggression creates anxiety, "unconscious guilt feeling remains a secret motive for a demand for scapegoats."[65] Thus retribution offers to the grateful agent of punishment the opportunity of "committing the same outrage [as the offender] under the colour of an act of expiation." "There is no longer any need for one to murder, since [another] has already murdered."[66] In this sense the Greek chorus identified itself with the offender as both the actor and the victim.[67] To be sure, society in this process unhappily accepts the role which the criminal's cruel superego has projected into its behavior.[68] But this sinister mechanism is often accompanied by pity[69] and gratitude. Indeed, it may account for the ancient lex talionis which may thus in part have operated to restrict rather than to legalize unlimited vengeance.[70] The same source may explain the less gratifying solemnities which have always accompanied retributory punishment.[71] Such ceremonies of atonement make capital punishment appear akin to the sacrificial killing of animals.[72] But perhaps most important, we use retribution unconsciously to counteract our own unconscious temptations. Our Ego seeks "to enforce the opposition of the Superego against the pressure of its instincts."[73]

(3) The price: society's guilt and gratitude

§187. Satisfaction in aggression is always paid for by feelings of guilt. The offender, by abating such feelings in the commission of his crime, may transfer them to punishing society. Indeed, much of our criminal procedure reflects our desire for forgiveness. Anybody who has ever had a part in the investigation or trial of a crime, or for that matter of any litigated issue, knows of the relief it meant to him to receive or to witness a confession in a criminal case or even an admission of a crucial fact in a civil case. Consciously, to be sure, he will attribute this relief to having fortified his conclusions. But subconsciously he has gained freedom from his guilt, both its burden and its pleasure. The victim has turned into an ally and a co-judge.

So great, indeed, may be our relief and gratitude they may turn into genuine affection for the offender. Beginning with the extortion of confessions by the Inquisition to our day, society has mitigated punishment of the "cooperative" defendant. To be sure, rational excuses are not lacking: from an alleged recognition of the offender's promise of reform, to the promotion of quicker and cheaper justice and a justified defense against "overcharge." But such rationalizations must probably recede behind society's urge to atone for its own guilt and aggression by rewarding the victim's admission.

Disgraceful bargains such as the one between the state and Martin Luther King's assassin are common and even lawful in the United States[74] and were, as late as 1970, in sadly pious language, partly re-sanctioned by the Supreme Court.[75] But, to assure the accused of milder treatment for pleading guilty to a lesser offense is only one sordid instance of a general practice. Art. 38(9) of the Russian Code (1965) gives officially mitigating effect to "sincere repentance or giving oneself up."[76] And the codes of many other civil law countries provide for mitigation of punishment in exchange for a guilty plea. Indeed, American apologists of criminal procedure take pride in the fact that as many as nine-tenths of all convictions are based on such pleas.[77] And others even praise the purifying function of confessions. Was this the "irrationale" of feudal Japan's refusal to execute a man without confession?[78] The price which society pays for its indulgence in revenge and retaliation is a heavy one. But to seek salvation in wholesale abolition (§199) means to ignore an irrefutable need.

(4) The need: safety valve

§188. Many penal reforms are justly extolled as the expression of a growing humanization of our criminal law even in the area of oedipal crimes.[79] Thus, capital punishment, which was previously the most obvious outlet for society's aggressive instincts, is being widely dispensed with or made as "painless" as possible. Some prisons, formerly arenas of open sadism, have been turned into "internment" centers which are purportedly designed to serve the rehabilitation of "inmates." And most recently even the imposition of sentences has, however thinly, been disguised as an educational measure. In the area of post-oedipal crimes, some such improvement may prove to be more than a temporary fashion and hold promise to turn much of our penal order into a scheme of rational deterrence and rehabilitation (§182). But where retribution prevails, as it does for oedipal and some post-oedipal crimes, there looms danger. Here aggression, purportedly displaced, may return with a vengeance.[80] Even here, of course, many of our humane reforms which reflect guilt reactions of a society overfed with centuries of patent cruelty, may outlast generations.[81] But where irrational urges lurk, their threat remains. And under closer scrutiny many a step forward to reason and charity will prove to be a mere shift of an at least subconscious societal aggression. Thus the much praised "indeterminate" sentence, which purports to promise forgiveness for "goodness," may in effect, for both oedipal and post-oedipal crime, easily be turned into a novel instrument of torture by suspense. The world-famous California Adult Authority is a significant example.[82] And the reversion of communist penal law to pre-revolutionary patterns particularly in the area of sexual crime should give us pause.[83] We cannot be confident that such current reforms in this area as that under the new German Penal Code[84] and some American legislation will survive the next swing of the pendulum.

Far from supporting a plea for abolition of oedipal punishment, proof of that punishment's irrational origin and function demands recognition of such unreason as an inescapable element of our criminal process. For irrational urges, of course, are as real as rational considerations. All we should seek to do—all we can do, I believe, is to weaken the standing of these urges as pseudo-rational tools, while fully accepting their continued vitality in the area of oedipal crime.[85] Only thus can we hope to reach viable conclusions as to whom we should punish (§§ 198-203), and particularly as to how we can give full play to reason in the myriad of prosecutions for post-oedipal infractions, including property and gang crimes. And only thus can we hope to rationalize the defense of insanity, that "conscious anomaly" (§§ 194-197), which, in the area of oedipal crime, rephrases the question of why we punish as one of "whom we punish", a question which, in turn, can be answered only on the basis of a conscious hypothesis of free will (§ 189) and the subconscious reality of presumed guilt (§§ 190-193).

2. Whom we punish

a. Freedom of will: conscious anomaly

§ 189. So long as we shall punish ourselves and others, we must postulate the existence of guilt[1] and thus the freedom of choice. Yet we are not readier to comprehend such guilt and freedom than we are to comprehend the possibility of their absence. Even the greatest minds have done no more than pour hollow words into the vacuum, be it to prove, as determinists, the inescapable causation of all human action or the freedom of choice.

Determinism. Equation of human action to all other happenings in nature as similarly subject to inexorable laws of causation, may be traced at least as far back as Democritus.[2] Two millennia later, it was scientific learning that again affected the issue of freedom in Descartes' work who found himself "determined" by the ubiquity of physical laws[3] in the same manner as Goethe stressed man's similarity to animals and plants as to which causation is freely accepted.[4] The same argument led Comte to deny any distinction between physics and ethics[5] and Durkheim to apply causality to all social phenomena.[6]

But the great dilemma was always alive in Hobbes' helpless trust in "true liberty from necessity,"[7] Spinoza's awe at God's inscrutable nature,[8] as well as in Kant's causality as "theoretical reason."[9] Pavlov's "reaction theory" cannot be easily divorced from the ambivalent determinism of socialist psychology.[10] And the biologist finds scant comfort in the strange "self-coined aphorism [that] nothing is outside heredity."[11] We shall hardly advance beyond Freud's resigned conclusion that, "so long as we trace the development of a chain of events from its final outcome backwards, it appears continuous, and we feel we have gained an insight which is completely satisfactory or even exhaustive,"[12] while we think otherwise before the event.[13]

The determinist creed has always been compelled to deny or at least to doubt the possibility of guilt.[14] The same denial and doubt pervades the history of theology. It is implied in Augustine's doctrine of the original sin, despite his rejection of Manichean determinism,[15] and culminated in Calvin's and Luther's teaching of man's predestination.[16] Phenomenological reconciliation of "being" and "doing," of a voluntary and a "status" responsibility, has but added a new vocabulary.[17] And Bonhoeffer's faith in the paradox of God's commanding our freedom has but movingly restated the predicament in terms similar to those of Sartre's "coerced free will."[18] It represents little more than a fateful return to the Stoic's admission of defeat.[19]

Freedom. Unavoidably, the same ambivalence appears in the thoughts of those clinging to an image of freedom. Plato would have had the insane, infants, and seniles at least pay full compensation for their crimes, or in case of homicide, would have condemned them to exile or even prison, although he considered these crimes involuntary.[20] Epicurus, though condemning "the determinism of the physicists," had to be satisfied with seeing man's freedom in his "choice to gain the gods' grace through honors paid to them."[21] Theology has never resolved or ceased to attack the riddle how man can be free and responsible for his actions if an omniscient God can foresee them, and an all-powerful God can mold them. St. Thomas saw the answer in another dimension of time,[22] Duns Scotus in God's all-goodness,[23] and a 20th century legal philosopher in God's inability to "make man a mere medium after having given him freedom."[24]

Secular philosophers did not fare better. Leibniz found a "sufficient reason" which "merely inclined without necessitating."[25] Hegel identified his central concept of volition with free will, though his dialectics may defy the dichotomy between freedom and compulsion.[26] Kant, having reserved his "theoretical reason" for causality, offered his "practical reason" for freedom and thus laid the foundation for Kelsen's distinction between causation and imputation.[27] Schopenhauer saw free will as "the Ding an sich, the essence of all existence."[28] Bergson borrowed from animal instinct his belief in an intuitive "élan vital"[29] and others have devised similarly tortured formulas.[30]

Such "theories" may have reached their nadir in Frankl's vacuous "meaning,"[31] in possible competition with Simon's Thomist blessing[32] which Mortimer Adler, in his monumental work on the dialectics of our problem, has treated as the only major essay on free choice written in this century that illuminates the controversy.[33] No wonder that philosophers, finding "neither proved nor disproved by arguments outside ethics [the determinist position, feel] fully justified in rejecting it if we decide that it does really conflict with the fundamental principles of ethics" which require at least a degree of freedom.[34]

Psychoanalysis has never undertaken to break the impasse. All that Freud noted was that, if we will look forward rather than backward,[35] "we no longer get the impression of an inevitable sequence of events which could not have been otherwise determined."[36] It is certainly wrong to charge psychoanalysis with a determinism which encourages the negation of criminal guilt.[37] This charge is conclusively disproved by Freud's teaching of "overdetermination" which is "prepared to find several causes for the same mental occurrence" and admits the use of punishment as one determinant.[38] Indeed, leading analysts have expressly attributed to the ego "some possibilities of choice."[39] And Max Weber (§52), who came so close to Freud without joining him, concludes that "we associate the highest measure of an empirical 'feeling of freedom' with those actions which we are conscious of performing naturally."[40] Contemporary "phenomenological indeterminism" has attempted to give this common sense observation the dignity of a new school.[41]

Resignation. Logic seems to tell us that we must choose between freedom and constraint. Yet we shall have to acquiesce in the conclusion that it is "equally impossible to develop a consistent world picture based on complete determinism or one based on complete indeterminism; both assumptions lead to untenable, or at least unimaginable consequences."[42] Once again we must bow to the helplessness of our minds, as we must when facing the choices between finity and infinity of space and time, and the riddles of justice.[43] Let us cease as "fools of nature, so horribly to shake our disposition, with thoughts beyond the reaches of our souls." Perhaps, Heidegger, the poet, has put it most aptly for our age: Knowledge, he felt, "will be given only to him that has experienced the winging storm on the path of our Being to whom the terror of the second path to the abyss of the Nothing has not remained foreign, but who has accepted the third path, that of Appearance as his pervasive need."[44]

Few will be happy in this resignation. But fewer yet will share Camus' trust in the absurd when he applauds "that appetite for the (unattainable) absolute which illustrates the essential impulse of the human dream;"[45] or the "humanist's" praise of the "healthy man who can live in both of these worlds of freedom and the lack of it."[46] For, as Goethe said, "the word freedom sounds so beautiful that we could not do without it even if it stated an error."[47] Nor will many find comfort in the biologist's reliance on progress in "cultural evolution,"[48] or the nuclear physicist's assurance that there is "freedom" even in the causality of natural events.[49]

"As if." Neither the pleasure principle's search for the fulfillment nor the reality principle's rejection of our wish have given us the answer. "We must postulate a third or magical principle that deals with the world outside as if it were governed by our wishes or drives or emotions. [This, indeed,] is the only way in which we achieve something in reality."[50] We shall have to be satisfied with the fact that we act and decide as if we knew freedom.[51] In this sense it is true that the "first act of free will [is] to believe in free will," and "a creature which can even suppose himself free, is free."[52] Or, to quote

Martin Buber: "The only thing that can become fate for a man is his belief in fate."[53] We shall continue to mete out punishment like Zeno of Citium. When the slave pleaded innocence because his theft had been pre-determined, his master answered that so was the punishment.[54]

Ambivalence. But this conscious working hypothesis of man's freedom leaves unresolved society's—and the psychiatrist's—ambivalence in dealing with crime.[55] Why is it that in one case we permit the psychiatrist to prove to us that the defendant's crime was unavoidably caused by mental disease (§195), while in another case we refuse to listen to such proof and proclaim the accused's freedom of choice? What seems to matter is whether, in the particular case, society's retaliatory urge will prevail over a "philosophy of exculpation."[56] This prevalence in turn expresses itself in our decision either to follow the presumptions by which we subconsciously attribute to the offender a guilty mind, a mens rea; or our conscious willingness to concede his inability of avoiding the offense. This decision, again, varies with the type of crime.

b. Presumption of mens rea: unconscious reality

§190. Presumed intention. We punish only the guilty. Only the guilty injurer is liable in damages. These principles of modern criminal and tort law we praise as moral[1] and therefore as results of progress over what is generally seen as an earlier primitive "strict" or "absolute" liability without fault.[2] This interpretation of legal history, I submit, is misleading in both areas. A child who hits the table at which he has hurt himself, is angry at the table and punishes it for guilty action. Indeed, an adult may "kick the door when it pinches his finger."[3] In the same manner, early laws punished and amerced the "innocent" offender and injurer, not becau sethey insisted on punishing innocence but because they did not believe in it.[4] The punishment of things may have a similar root. Exodus speaks of stoning the guilty ox.[5] Later law demanded the surrender of the harmful instrument.[6] And modern statutes, while rationalized in terms of deterrence, may provide for the impounding of the "guilty" automobile.[7]

Justice Holmes was inclined to discount such imputation of guilt. He insisted that the dog "distinguishes between being stumbled over and being kicked."[8] This may be so. But could it not be as well that man, less rational than his dog, projects into his aggressor a guilty conscience which is related to his oedipal urge and to its repression? Could it not be that it is this repression of subconscious guilt, that makes us disbelieve our fellow man's claim to innocence?[9] Oedipus' incest appeared innocent. Yet Sophocles' audience thought Oedipus' blinding just. It may be claimed that this was due to early conscious acceptance of a predestination of both crime and punishment. But is it not easier to assume an unconscious presumption of guilt, which justified the offender's punisment? As Freud said, feeling of oedipal guilt can exist even where "the violation occurs unwittingly."[10]

To be sure, owing to a growing understanding of mental processes, the presumption of intent has gradually lost at least some of its conscious impact. Beginning with early Greek and Hebrew philosophy, the defendant has been permitted to plead accident in mitigation or excuse,[11] and mens rea has since become the conscious basis of criminal responsibility. But the surviving unconscious and irrational elements of this rule have made it a playground of semantic confusion in a moral-legalistic swamp. Since Blackstone's "vicious will,"[12] the mens rea has been defined as felonious, fraudulent, or guilty intent, as malice aforethought, guilty knowledge, willfulness, guilt, or scienter.[13] Little clarity can be gained from a diagnosis of court opinions and not much more from their linguistic surgery.[14] Thus, though mens rea may have become an indispensable element of criminal law, in defining it we have hardly advanced beyond medieval belief in an "evil spirit" or for that matter, beyond the ancient acceptance of mere "negligence" as sufficient guilt in a concededly non-intentional offense.

§191. The evil spirit. Certain African tribes have come consciously to accept a killer's excuse to have lacked intention to kill. Yet they may put him to death so as to expel the evil spirit.[15] As late as 1484, Innocent VIII, when authorizing the Malleus Maleficarum,[16] the work of his Inquisitors Kramer and Sprenger, attributed to "devils, Incubi, Succubi," such "horrid offenses" as abortion in humans and animals as well as contraception. Thus, if the offender was innocent as a lunatic, he was to be punished after all, since he "had abandoned himself" to the devil. The history of witchcraft[17] ended but yesterday—for how long?

§192. "Negligence." In many concededly non-intentional offenses another mens rea has always been punished. Hammurabi's code provides: "If a man has struck a man in a dispute and wounded him, that man shall swear 'I do not strike him knowingly' and he shall pay for the doctor."[18] In medieval England, the king waived his wite in cases of "misadventure," and the killer had a "pardon of course." But the bot remained payable to the injured. "If a man have a spear over his shoulder, and any man stake himself upon it, that he pay the wer without the wite."[19] And for a long time the Church continued to punish the homicidium casuale.[20] In such cases to be sure, intention was not presumed or shifted to an evil spirit. But why then the punishment of one who had been found innocent?

The answer is simple. Even where the offender's conscious intention is not consciously presumed, he is still unconsciously charged with an at least unconscious guilt. If his deed was not malicious or "reckless," it must have been "negligent." Indeed, for oedipal crime this conclusion has remained the rule. As late as 1813, the Bavarian Penal Code based on Anselm Feuerbach's teaching,[21] presumed any unlawful act to have been intentional.[22] And even today the Model Penal Code of the American Law Institute would punish certain unintentional causations of death or bodily injury by a deadly weapon. The accused in such cases would be guilty of "negligence" if he had failed to live up to the "standard of care that a reasonable person would observe."[23] Some laws expressly provide to this effect.[24] But why should one be thus held guilty if he was not able to observe the standard of a reasonable person? Significantly, such penal rules which do not even purport to require guilt, are often rationalized on the ground that they are needed to convict the truly guilty whose intent cannot be proved.[25] The at least subconscious presumption of guilt thus appears obvious.[26] This true "irrationale" we see confirmed in those cases in which punishment does not even purport to require fault, however slight. It is such "strict liability" that has met growing opposition although it seems to differ little from other cases of presumed fault. Distinctions between types of crime may enable us to identify those cases where such opposition is justified because of the very absence of the unconscious presumption.

§193. Strict Liability? Opposition is unjustified, it will be submitted, with regard to those crimes as to which a genuine liability without fault can conceivably be defended on the rational grounds of deterrence and restraint,[27] although it might be preferable here to relieve such liability of the stigma of punishment. Indeed, in this area, strict liability has been widely recognized by denying defenses based not only on errors of law[28] but also on errors of fact.[29] That theoretical objections and constitutional attacks against such liabilities have persisted,[30] must probably be attributed to the unfortunately unitary treatment of crime[31] which identifies the justifiable, deterrent punishment in such cases for non-fault, post-oedipal infractions with the clearly objectionable, retaliatory sanction of oedipal crime which requires at least a presumption of mens rea and thus the "excuse" of errors of both law and fact.

There have been other attempts, it is true, to draw a distinction which would permit strict liability for certain crimes, though not for others. But lack of a psychological foundation has doomed such distinctions and may account for the aggressiveness of their advocates. Thus, we have been told that mens rea is indispensable only for actions which are "mala per se," i.e., actions which would "be considered wrongful even if no punisment therefor was provided by law."[32] This proposition has been said to vindicate natural law thinking and to condemn the presumably evil theory of "positivism" which is seen embodied in the teaching of a certain suspect "foreign philosopher" due to his ignorance of the common law.[33] But rather than a distinction between mala per se and mala prohibita, the psychological character of the crime is relevant for the permissible scope of strict liability. Oedipal crime requires at least a presumption of mens rea to make punishment bearable which here, in contrast to post-oedipal deterrable infractions, is prevailingly a retaliatory measure. Throughout this chapter, to be sure, we are met with the difficulty of drawing clear lines. Between the extreme and thus easiest example of a post-oedipal crime, the technical infraction, and the other extreme case of the truly oedipal passion murder, there is a vast borderland of all-important practical relevance. Thus, strict liability has been accepted even in such cases of unintentional killing as felony murder and manslaughter. This can perhaps in part be explained on the ground that here the punishment is primarily directed against the act that preceded the killing. Moreover, in practice, conviction in most cases of strict liability is apparently sought and imposed ordinarily only where a guilty causation is in fact assumed but cannot be proved in law.[34]

The obscure concept of mens rea, consciously or unconsciously required for most crimes, is frequently tested by the defense of insanity. But this defense inevitably offers the same problems as the concept that it is designed to test: One commiting an oedipal crime cannot rationally be punished since he is "insane" by definition, while post-oedipal crime can rationally be subjected to deterrent punishment without regard to the offender's state of mind. Nevertheless, the law has accepted this "conscious anomaly" so as to permit rational correction of the irrational working hypothesis of the freedom of will which owes much of its workability to the irrational reality of a presumption of guilt (§§189, 190).

c. The defense of insanity: conscious anomaly

§194. The law's ambivalence. Sirhan Sirhan was accused of killing Robert Kennedy. In order to prosecute him for murder, society had to assume that

But he has, of course, never precluded thereby that actions may be prohibited as mala, by rules of the civil as well as the common law which are valid whether or not expressly posited "by law." his will was free to act otherwise. Yet the law, in it pervasive ambivalence, permitted him to claim insanity or psychopathy and thus wholly or partly to deny the freedom of his choice. No wonder: except for acts approaching automation,[35] we cannot imagine an "insane" actor's complete or a "psychopath's" partial predestination any more readily than a "sane" man's freedom of choice. This ambivalence of the law, probably inevitable, accounts for the worldwide, painful confusion in both the official theory and actual practice of the insanity defense. Two excellent studies have traced the 1500 year history of attempts to conceal that confusion.[36] We can limit ourselves, therefore, to a description of the contemporary scene.

§195. From M'Naghten to the Model Code: impotent words. For some hundred years, in the United States, the so-called M'Naghten test of insanity ruled virtually alone. The defendant was held insane if he "was laboring under such a defect of reasoning, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing, or if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong."[37] So naively, and therefore effectively, did this formula reflect the law's predicament that it has been preserved in modern codifications and repeatedly defended by progressive scholars.[38] Occasionally it has even entered the almost equally confused theory of civil fault.[39] But the rapid development of psychological knowledge during the last few decades seemed to call for a change. Indeed, psychiatric experts began to refuse to testify on "rightness" or "wrongness," declaring this test to be outside their expertise in light of their advanced science.[40] Thus new tests were developed to meet this resistance and to enable the psychiatric profession to use the language of their own science.[41] Here are some of the resulting formulas. The defendant was to be held insane (1) if he had acted under an "irresistible impulse;[42] (2) if his "act was the product of mental disease or mental defect;"[43] (3) if he "as a result of mental disease or defect lacked substantial capacity" to resist doing what he did;[44] (4) if he did not have the "substantial capacity either to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law."[45] Indeed, additional suggestions have entered the futile competition[46] and various statutes have sought inept compromise in the United States as well as in the Commonwealth.[47] Even major legislative projects have failed to seek new approaches.[48]

I shall not repeat my earlier attempts to analyze these efforts.[49] They are quickly losing the remnants of their shortlived élan and significance. For all of these tests, for some time now, have engaged lawyers and psychiatrists in a rather disgraceful game of pingpong, in which each profession attempts to leave to the other the final responsibility.[50] Indeed, the new tests, while seeking to respond to medical knowledge and demands, have in turn betrayed the law.

What the law desires to know is whether or not to punish. And this question cannot be answered by any medical test. Whenever society purports to treat the offender's "sanity" as decisive, it primarily seeks to rationalize what is likely to become the result of irrational reactions of aggression or guilt.[51] We must learn to admit to ourselves that, where a plea of insanity is permitted to succeed, society, more often than not, merely lacks or abandons a claim to retaliation. Notwithstanding purported reliance on expert testimony, such a decision is likely to be due either to pity, namely our identification with the accused, or to the absence or weakness of the retaliatory urge with regard to the particular type of the criminal or crime. Attitudes favoring or counteracting such reactions usually occur in cycles between trends toward "humanization," such as the abolition of capital punishment or the legalization of "abnormal" sexual practices, and counter-movements against "the coddling" of the criminal (§199). Such a-rational motivations, then, will ordinarily determine admission or rejection of the a-rational defense of insanity. They offer, I believe, the sole, but compelling justification for retaining, as society's mouthpiece and tool, the jury or other lay bodies which are neither qualified nor compelled to articulate pseudo-rational argument where there can be only irrational reaction. And the same a-rational motivations must help to explain growing resort to a-rational compromise.

§196. "Diminished responsibility:" bootless compromise. We saw how society has proved its ambivalence by conciously permitting the anomaly of a defense of insanity even in the penal treatment of oedipal crime whose very commission typically implies such insanity and which yet in principle is held punishable due to a presumption of guilt and a fiction of free will. Though plagued by such ambivalence, society is faced with a choice between all or nothing, between conviction and acquittal. No wonder there has always been a search for compromise, in addition to the hybrid liabilities for negligence (§190) and "innocent" conduct (§191). Borrowing from Scots tradition and competing with English legislation as well as with continental doctrine, American courts have been intent on devising a formula under which a presumably "sane" offender, while found "guilty" due to his free will and proved or presumed mens rea, could be given the benefit of a merely partial sanity, free will and mens rea resulting in a merely "partial" or "diminished" responsibility or capacity.[52]

Sirhan's counsel and experts, whether or not they thought him to be "insane," presumably saw little prospect for such a defense against the threat of a public outcry. If they thus expected retaliation to preclude acquittal, they hoped it might at least tolerate mitigation. If they failed to prove Sirhan wholly "insane," then perhaps they could succeed partially by digging into what has been called the "wastebasket" of their diagnosis.[53] Need it really be said again that this technique is nothing but a "ploy to avoid conviction for an offense that may incur the death penalty"?[54] But often the ploy is too crude. Often the triers of the facts will be repelled rather than seduced by the magician's bag of tricks. Sirhan was sentenced to death. Indeed, a decade's English experience with the recognition of a "diminished responsibility" has added few cases in which an accused has escaped the punishment which he would have incurred if found fully responsible.[55] We can hardly expect more or less from introducing specific "medical categories" in analogy to non-age.[56] May we not suspect that such formulas may yet prove treacherous tools in the hands of juries or judges who, wary of their power, would without them have resorted to acquittal but may now find comfort in a compromise, to the defendent's detriment? Psychiatry has failed the law's question. But have we not proved too much? Should we, can we, just because of such failure, halt the battle of experts?

§197. The battle of experts: "bread and games". Psychiatrists, having won their Pyrrhic victory over the law (§195), had hoped that their skill would now be given free range in dispensing cure rather than punishment. Instead, juries, finding the accused fully or at least partly responsible, have continued to demand punishment rather than cure in at least unconscious response to the community's reluctance to forego vengeance for charity. And we must assume that, with this demand, they are frequently inclined to ignore both the judge's instructions and the psychiatrist's testimony. If the former may sound to them as the law's ancient, secret curse, the latter may at worst recall to them magic incantations of the medicine man,[57] at best the trickery of a physician who is more concerned with his "patient" than with justice. If "proof" be needed for these assumptions, the artist's intuition in "The Twelve Angry Men" has furnished it more persuasively than the sociologists' staged experiment.[58]

Should we then put an end to the game in the arena of the court room whenever the actors fail to follow both law and science?[59] Indeed, it has been suggested that lawmakers "should consider abolition of the insanity defense," so as to force into the open the purpose and shortcomings of criminal responsibility.[60] But it has also been conceded that such a measure would have to face "the enormous ambivalence toward the 'sick' reflected in conflicting wishes to exculpate and to blame; to sanction and not to sanction; to degrade and to elevate; to stigmatize and not to stigmatize; to care and to reject; to treat and to mistreat; to protect and to destroy."[61] The Imperator gave "panem et circenses" to his unruly plebs: Not only bread but the deadly fight between gladiators in the Colosseum.

It seems that we must continue a similar tragic game in the court room to cater to society's retaliatory urges where reason fails. But if this be so, we might wish to make it easier for the players.[62] Perhaps we can help them in their thankless task of deciding upon the mysteries of freedom and guilt without the help of either law or science. Perhaps we can do so even in an adversary framework by preserving the semblance of fairness and orderly procedure in the battle of counsel and experts.[63] But we must remain wary of seeing the spectators' thumbs forced up or down by the gladiators' skill and strength. At least we must demand from judges, counsel, psychiatrists, and ourselves that we remain aware of the fact that guilt and innocence will often be determined by fluctuations in the community's irrational reactions; and that therefore the expert's role is, more often than not, no more—and no less—than that of a thirteenth juror.[64] The battle of experts will continue as will the defense of insanity. But once the battle is fought, the prisoner's fate remains at stake. Whom are we to punish?

3. Whom we should punish

a. The current debate

§198. Past and present: "acquittal" of the "insane." Before analysing some of the innumerable measures now being proposed for the reform of the law of criminal responsibility, we must summarize the most obvious shortcomings of our present system: (1) This system is philosophically inconsistent in that its requirement of a mens rea is based on the hypothesis of a free will, yet must rely on the disingenuous formulas of the "insanity" defense (§195). (2) All of these formulas lack the indispensable reference to the purposes of punishment (§§177-187). (3) Both denial and reduction of responsibility (§§194-197) are accompanied at best by embarrassing publicity and at worst by indefinite confinement for "treatment."[1] (4) Such treatment, despite its purportedly medical character, actually represents a severe sanction of presumably innocent conduct. Moreover, it is removed from judicial control and may thus be objectionable on grounds of procedural fairness or even due process.[2] The last point requires elaboration.

When the lunatic began to escape the stake and to be granted "asylum," this mercy all too often became a new instrument of torture.[3] Even in our day, ever more frequently, public attention is drawn to the horror of the snake pit. "Apparently terrors of bedlam exceed those of prison."[4] Ever more frequently, we learn that many a demented offender or his counsel prefers not to claim the "benefit of lunacy." A definite criminal punishment surrounded by due process of law may appear less threatening than a "mere" indefinite detention in the near absolute power of the medical profession. "Label the judicial process as one will, no resort to subtlety can refute the fact that the power to imprison is criminal sanction. To view otherwise is self-delusion. Courts should not, ostrich-like bury their heads in the sand."[5] Retaliation for crime continues, be the offender guilty or "insane."

§199. The future: "abolition of all punishment"? Psychiatrists, we have seen, have reproached the M'Naghten rule of "right and wrong" for ignoring the existence and impact of mental disease in terms of their new science. "Progressive" legislatures, courts and writers have attempted to respond to this reproach by devising new formulas based on that science—only to meet near general failure (§193). Should we acquiesce, then, in an outstanding judge's conclusion that, under these formulas "no man can be convicted of anything if the law were to accept impulses of the unconscious as an excuse for conscious misbehavior"?[6] There are those who would be willing to pay this price. Alexander and Staub assumed that "medical treatment and education [would] naturally [sic] take the place of punishment."[7] Indeed, Karl Menninger, invoking the tenuous authority of Protagoras and Plato, has since condemned the "Crime of Punishment" as such.[8] And Lady Wootton has taken up the gallant fight for the replacement of all criminal law by measures of education and restraint,[9] by what has at times been called the "défense sociale."[10] Others, while keeping the mechanics of punishment, would rename it atonement (Sühne) on the precarious ground that while "punishment dishonors, atonement liberates."[11] Similarly, the legislatures of a few countries, including Mexico and Greenland, have sought to implement these postulates by largely substituting, at least in terms, "sanctions" and "security" measures for punishment.[12]

But many are the arguments that can be raised against such radical general proposals: (1) Least convincing seems insistence on every "person's right to be punished rather than treated."[13] (2) But one may well claim that the determinist who, denying all guilt, advocates the abolition of all punishment, ignores like Zeno's slave (§189) the potential deterrent effect of punishment itself (§202). (3) Moreover, one might resist abolition of punishment on the weighty ground that it would necessarily have to be accompanied by measures of restraint and education and that the ensuing replacement of judicial by administrative techniques would raise insurmountable questions of due process and many others of expediency.[14] (4) Most crucial, abolition of punishment would neglect society's retaliatory urge at least in the area of oedipal crimes and would thus result in a return of aggression through the back door.[15] To inhibit the "highly compulsive behaviour on our part ... by premature reform might endanger the precarious cohesion of the social fabric."[16]

§200. Abolition or segregation of the defense of insanity. We have mentioned current suggestions that the defense of insanity be abolished entirely and that the issue be made part of determining the mens rea. This would result in conviction or acquittal based upon the external conduct with ignorance and mistake continuing to function as defenses. Such a procedure could, however, contravene constitutional guarantees of due process or against cruel and unusual punishment, as could the indeterminate abandonment of the offender to medical treatment in cases both of conviction and acquittal.[17] Similar objections apply to the bifurcated trial as it now operates in California. Here, the ultimate finding of the offender's sanity, although it was, of course, required for his conviction, is left for a second trial.[18]

b. The needed distinction

§201. It will not do, then, to resolve the innate inconsistency of criminal law by either generally denying or upholding mens rea as a requirement of punishment. Nor will it do, however, generally to maintain the status quo on the ground that "most of our commitment to the democratic values, to human dignity and self-determination, to the value of the individual, turns on the pivot of a view of man as a responsible agent entitled to be praised or blamed depending on his free choice of conduct.[19] We must remain aware of the fact that at least as to oedipal crimes this argument disregards society's "wishes to neglect, stigmatize, punish and destroy" without much regard to blame.[20] It is not feasible, therefore, to limit proposals for reform to developing such general rational guidelines for the "disposition" of the convicted offender as the degree of his dangerousness, deterrability or need for treatment[21]. Such proposals ignore the crucial role of retaliation in dealing with oedipal crime. This urge requires retention of punishment for its own sake with the defense of insanity as its most important corrective.

Once we have recognized this function of the defense, we can no longer treat it as a homogeneous concept. Thirty-one areas of the law (including divorce, contract, tort, and wills) have been counted in which this concept is relevant. Needless to say, its definition must vary widely among these areas in accord with its object,[22] and similarly such variations must follow us into what only seemingly is a unitary concept of insanity in criminal law. If we agree that punishment is designed to serve conflicting purposes (§§177-187), we shall also have to agree that we must adopt as many different definitions of insanity for criminal law as are needed in light of these varying purposes. Only such a distinction will enable us to admit the continued need for often irrational sanctions of oedipal crime, while striving to eliminate from that area the most pernicious features of both punishment and insanity defenses. And only such a distinction will then permit us to devise to the fullest possible extent, rational sanctions and treatments for post-oedipal crime.

§202. Post-oedipal crimes. Such crimes are relatively unencumbered by irrational roots and reactions.[23] From mere infractions to most property crimes, post-oedipal crimes call for and can perhaps expect rational reform (§§181-182). Such a reform will have to seek a balance between two not always consistent, but equally rational, "justnesses:" protection for society and help for the offender. Where the first aim seems pre-eminent, we shall take into account that, with regard to such crimes, "nearly all of us are potentional criminals."[24] Punishment will thus, above all, have to be devised as an effective deterrent even in partial disregard of "justnesses" concerning the offender.[25] Thus, if the threat of punishment promises general deterrence, we may have to maintain that threat even if it should prove ineffective with regard to the offender himself or inequitable because of excusable motivations of his crime. No wonder that as to such post-oedipal crime the defense of insanity will usually fail, although a conscientious and compassionate prosecutor may well forego prosecution of an "insane" offender willing to undergo "treatment."[26] Indeed, it has been said that "insanity as a defense is an exception in crimes other than murder."[27]

On the other hand, at times and places were society does not feel threatened, the law's concern with the offender can and should prevail in this area. The psychiatrist, relieved of his assignment to decide upon guilt and innocence, will be able and needed to assist us where his expertness matters—namely, in the treatment and cure of the offender and, where restraint is needed, in combining maximum effect with a minimum of cruelty. Here, and only here, "progress is possible by strengthening the role of the ego,"[28] in contrast to those crimes which we have characterized as oedipal because of their early source.

§203. Oedipal crimes. As to these crimes, before we can seek cure and prognosis, we must repeat our diagnosis which, in juxtaposition with post-oedipal crimes, can perhaps be restated as follows: Commission of any crime reveals the offender's legal insanity in a degree proportionate to the effort needed by a medically sane person to overcome the normal repression of that urge to which the offender must typically yield when committing the crime. Or, to put it differently, any offender is insane in a degree conversely proportionate to the effect society expects from his punishment for maintaining the repression of that urge. For most post-oedipal infractions application of these tests, we have seen, leads ordinarily to the denial of insanity in the courtroom. For in such cases the repression is absent or so superficial that the offender needs little effort in overcoming it. And, correspondingly, the threat of punishment can be expected to counteract his temptation to overcome the repression. All this is otherwise with regard to most homicides and other oedipal crimes.[29]

Killing has been characterized as oedipal because it is "always inside the family."[30] This aphorism may be too general. But earliest and therefore strongest repression is implanted against the child's Oedipus wish to kill one parent and commit incest with the other.[31] So strong is this repression that our temptation is rendered totally unconscious and powerless. And we are generally inclined to assume at least temporary insanity where the temptation can nevertheless be overcome in a passion murder (§§185-187). In such cases society is quite ready to waive punishment. We do not ourselves need the offender's punishment to deter us from overcoming our repression by committing these crimes ourselves. And anybody who, overcoming his repression, should feel impelled and able to commit them, will hardly ever be deterred by the threat of punishment. The passion murderer will appear as insane by definition.

But, as we have seen, retributory urges may not only be irrational, but even unrelated to our unconscious need for support against our own temptation. Aggression and vengeance may on other grounds prevail over the plea of insanity and the clamor for punishment. So long as we insist on the "scientific" rationalization of this irrational mechanism, we shall continue to tolerate and, indeed, to require the painful and often ludicrous battle between the psychiatrists (§195). It is no doubt aggressive overstatement "to charge that their testimony is for sale."[32] But where, as is typically true in cases of oedipal crime, such testimony cannot be determined by professional knowledge, the "experts" must, like jurors, ultimately follow their own emotions as members of society. In terms of their professional language they will speak their "sane" or "insane," their "guilty" or "not guilty," according to whether or not on grounds inexpressed and inexpressible they feel that the accused should be punished. Here, professional knowledge may permit them to contribute conscious speculation as to the truly essential question whether in the case before them the public would be willing to forego retributory satisfaction without taking a grimmer toll elsewhere and elsewhen.

The borderland. We have isolated two types of crime by identifying the degree of repression which the "normal" offender must overcome in committing his crime. At the one end of the spectrum we found the post-oedipal crime (from mere infraction to property and gang crimes), where slight, superficial, and conscious repression makes punishment seem rational to the virtual exclusion of the defense of insanity. At the other end we saw oedipal crime like passion murder overcoming an early and therefore deep and subconscious repression. Here punishment, although it typically lacks rational motivation, will either be insisted upon owing to retaliatory urges or waived in "pity" for the insane. But there remains the borderland which corresponds to repressions of varying degrees in post-oedipal childhood. These we may exemplify by reference to the prohibition of many "a-social" sexual satisfactions whose repression occurs at a more advanced, post-oedipal age than that of homicide and is therefore less effective than the latter, leaving us subject to temptation throughout our lives. Insofar as this temptation remains subconscious, as with respect to most perversions, the urge to punishment will often yield to pleas of insanity almost as easily as in the case of murder. But the temptation may, owing to a less effective repression, as with regard to forbidden normal sexual relations, reach the surface of our minds. Then we shall demand punishment of those who have succumbed, and become unwilling to concede to them an irresponsibility in which we ourselves would have liked to indulge. In this twilight zone between oedipal and post-oedipal crime the psychiatrist will often be willing to put aside his professional knowledge of "disease" and "impulse" and accept the need for deterrence without much concern for the offender, as he might in cases of most infractions and property crimes. Nor will he, on the other hand, always be willing thus to give his verdict as a sociologist rather than as a physician and insist on this latter role in an attempt to persuade the jury that their victim is insane having overcome a normally unsurmountable repression. Reason and unreason will alternate and compete for the expert's conscience. Law and psychiatry will continue to share the blame and the shame—until both the creed and the need of punishment will have been forgotten—in Utopia.

In the next chapter we shall see that civil responsibility is beset by psychological problems very similar to those disturbing our law of crime. There, too, we find a "fault" law falsely pretending such rational purposes as deterrence and reform, while in fact seeking irrational retribution. But the law of civil liability, though older than the law of crimes, is less burdened by primitive urges and emotions. It will, therefore, we may hope, more easily turn to purely rational solutions. Also though lacking that emotional appeal which continues to focus public discussion on crime and criminals, the law of "tort" is so much closer to our daily lives than the hangman's or the jailer's threat. In many thousands of cases every day, without the stigma of social condemnation inherent in criminal sanction, tort law reacts to encroachments upon the spheres of our physical and proprietary safety. The running-down accident, the defective merchandise, the slippery sidewalk, though still purporting to respond to a demand for the sanction of fault, now all make us clamor for remedies other than punishment: for compensation by the hazardous yet profitable enterprise, be it "guilty" or "innocent." It is here that we most often seek and meet the law. It is here that society has progressed in psychological maturity far beyond the undirected and unlimited revenge, the eye-for-eye and tooth-for-tooth of our early days. Through a long and painful process, we have come to give ever-increasing consideration to the comparative equities of the parties. But in this process we have now, I believe, reached a stage in which some understanding of its psychological significance has become indispensable to avoid delay of further progress.

REPORT TO THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY UNITED STATES SENATE

Subject.—Proposed Federal Criminal Code for the Revision of Title 18 U.S.C.

Prepared by.—M. C. Bassiouni, Professor of Law, DePaul University, College of Law.

Question 1:

Foreign codes are divided along the lines of Part A and Part B. This division has been adapted to American criminal law in Bassiouni, Criminal Law and Its Processes: The Law of Public Order, 1969, (Charles C. Thomas, Publisher, Springfield, Illinois).

Question 2:

Foreign codes do not usually leave blanks in numbering. Division is by chapters, sections and paragraph are chronological. Additions and amendments are added to each section or chapter.

Question 3:

Intent is a required element but the importance lies in its proof. Proof of guilt is determined by the judge or a combination of judge and jury usually upon the personal conviction or moral satisfaction of the judge. See Bassiouni, A Survey of the Major World Criminal Justice Systems, Part III. (To appear in Handbook on Criminology, Rand McNally, 1972, ed. D. Glaser). Exhibit I.

Question 4:

Same as for Question 3.

Question 5:

Insanity is a defense. Insane defendants are accorded medical rather than penological treatment. No separate procedural aspect for treatment of defense of insanity. The court may appoint a psychiatrist. Parties may introduce expert witnesses. There is usually mandatory commitment in successful insanity defense.

Question 6:

There is no defense for voluntary intoxication but there is a defense if chronic alcoholism can be equated to insanity. No defense for drugged condition short of insanity. Theorists throughout Western Europe criticize their unscientific approach to insanity, drugged condition and intoxication. The Scandinavian countries have particular features dealing with intoxication which merit consideration.

Question 7:

All defenses stated are available. Codes usually enunciate general standards relying on judicial interpretation for specific rules. However, Western European Countries are positive and codes are specific.

Question 8:

Foreign codes classify offenses in the same manner with some variations.

Question 9:

A. Sentences are imposed but execution is suspended.

B. There is division on the question of probation and nonsupervised suspended sentences.

C. In case of supervised suspended sentence or probation, there is division as between probation officers and police officers.

D. Sentences are determinate.

E. Special extended terms for recidivists or dangerous offenders.

F. Range varies extensively.

G. Mandatory prison sentences are determined by codes depending upon crimes.

H. (Unfamiliar with parole system.)

I. No notice or publicity of conviction. To my knowledge only Germany has provision for convicting an organization.

J. No publicity for conviction of individuals.

K. Persistent misdeamant may be treated as recidivists otherwise no special provisions.

L. All sentences must be "motivated" (reasons given).

M. Sentences are reviewable. Most appeals are in the form of trial de Novo.

N Government may appeal as well as defendant.

O. Usually no general standards set for review of sentencing other than proportionality by sentence to crime and rehabilitative opportunities for the defendant (very vague if any).

P. There is practically no uniformity of sentencing other than when the codes specify mandatory sentences.

Q. Multiple offenses if part of a single criminal transaction require concurrent sentences rather than single sentences.

R. (Unfamiliar with treatment of fines).

Question 10:

Mistake of law is no defense. Reasonable mistake of fact is a defense.

Question 11:

No similar judicial approach.

Question 12:

Extraterritorial jurisdiction is much broader, See Bassiouni, Section 1—Theories of International Criminal Jurisdiction as Applied in Municipal Law. Unpublished article (Exhibit II)

Question 13:

Criminal conspiracy does not exist in civil code countries though attempt and criminal preparations may cover the same type of activity in some cases.

Question 14:

Felony murder is treated as separate from the actual crime. Specific provisions for aggravation of crime are established by creating a new category.

Question 15:

No. However, a distinction arises between riots and crimes against the state, they are differently treated in civil code countries because of the absence of a provision equivalent to the first amendment of the U.S. Constitution. See Bassiouni, The Law of Dissent and Riot, 1971, (Charles C Thomas, Publisher, Springfield, Illinois).

Question 16:

Yes. Some codes have specific provisions linking paramilitary activities to treason and related offenses against the state.

Question 17:

Foreign codes do not distinguish on the basis of victims of crimes. Emphasis is on type of activity sought to be controlled.

Question 18:

Provisions dealing with firearms and explosives are much more regulated as most countries have established bans which are severely enforced on firearms. Very stringent licensing requirements for those permitted to carry them.

Question 19:

Concerning capital punishment, see study by Marc Ancel prepared for the United Nations and containing information on comparative studies.

Question 20:

Single prosecution provided for offenses arising out of same criminal transaction. Defense of former jeopardy for identical conduct, no as formalistic as in the U.S. Conviction in another jurisdiction is a defense. See also European Convention on Human Rights which prohibits double jeopardy (NE BIS IN IDEM).

San Antonio, Tex., March 1, 1972.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: In answer to your letter of February 3, 1972, I enclose a list of brief answers dealing with all the desired points. The best idea, of course, would be to work toward the unification of state laws, so that eventually there would be only one state law in all the fifty states. The unified state law could then be amalgamated with the federal law, so that there would be only one American law. Such law could be administered in only one system of courts. This is exactly where the matter stands in Germany. Australia and Switzerland are not much behind. On the surface it seems a very formidable endeavor but the differences in state laws are only superficial with no really fundamental justification for any of them at all. There is also no reason for the duality of state and federal law. They are only the creation of the legislator, not of customary law or of the common law.

In my answers I refer to my article entitled: A Study in the Treatment of Crime and Law Enforcement in the United States as Compared to the European Countries, which will appear in March 1972, in the St. Mary's Law Journal. The article deals with many matters referred to in the questionnaire. I shall send you a copy as soon as it appears.

I hope that my answers will be of use and I shall be happy to answer further queries you may decide to send me. I would be happy to co-operate in your work.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE E. GLOS,
Professor of Law.

To: United States Senate, Committee on the Judiciary, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures (Pursuant to Sec. 7 of S. Res. 32, 92nd Congress), Washington, D.C. 20510.

From: Professor George E. Glos, St. Mary's University School of Law, 2700 Cincinnati Ave., San Antonio, Texas 78284.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONNAIRES AS PER LETTER OF FEBRUARY 3, 1972

1. Foreign codes usually provide for: A. General Provisions, and B. Specific Offenses which are given separately under 1. Felonies and misdemeanors, and 2. Infractions. No part C Sentencing exists. Provisions as to punishment for individual offenses are given directly in the section dealing with the particular offenses. The order followed in the Model resembles somewhat that of the Swiss Penal Code. No fundamental objection can be made to the separate provisions for sentencing in the Model.

2. Foreign codes start with section 1, and proceed consecutively. No space is left for future statutes. On amendment, a new version of any particular section is printed in the new edition of the code. A statute which does not really amend but expands an existing provision is printed following the section under which it falls. This is done especially in the French code.

The Model uses different technique. It numbers chapters not sections and then allots individual numbers to sections allowing thus for future expansion. No fundamental objection can be made to this system.

3. Foreign penal codes distinguish basically two types of culpability: 1. Intent (dolus), 2. Negligence (culpa). The definition of culpability is not always given in general apart from the mental element required in any particular offense. The required mental element is stipulated in the particular offenses. Intent, where present in a criminal act, is usually defined as an act committed "intentionally and knowingly." Negligence is usually defined as an act committed "out of negligence, imprudence, inexperience, or in breach of safety rules." E.g. Italian P.C. art. 43, Swiss P.C. art. 18. The codes deal with dolus malus (intentionally and knowingly), dolus eventualis (recklessly), and with culpa (negligence). E.g. Austrian P.C. para 1 and 238.

The mental element determines which section of the code will be applied. E.g. in the Italian P.C., homicide (murder) requires intent and knowledge (art. 575), manslaughter requires recklessness (art. 584), negligent homicide requires negligence (art. 589). The punishment decreases with the lesser mental culpability from a minimum of 21 years imprisonment for murder, to imprisonment from 10 to 18 years for manslaughter, and to imprisonment from 6 months to 5 years for negligent homicide. The mental element has thus a direct relation to punishment.

The kinds of culpability in the Model compare favorably with foreign provisions. This is chiefly due to the definitions of "wilfully" art. 302 (1) (e) and "culpably" art. 302 (1) (f) of the Model.

4. Foreign penal codes do not generally define causation, with the exception of the Italian P.C. art. 40. All the codes embody, however, the same principle, namely, that the act (omission) of the actor must have been instrumental in bringing about the criminally punishable effect.

5. Insanity is a defense under foreign codes. Foreign provisions are fairly similar to the Model. Foreign codes uniformly provide that the defendant is not guilty because of insanity. Only in England under the Trial of Lunatics Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 38) the accused was to be found guilty of the act but so insane as not to be responsible. The position was reversed in the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964, s.1. which makes the accused not guilty because of insanity. All foreign codes provide that upon the verdict not guilty because of insanity the prisoner must be held in a mental hospital for prisoners. I refer to my article: A study in the Treatment of Crime and Law Enforcement in the United States as Compared to the European Countries, St. Mary's Law Journal 1972.

Foreign codes uniformly provide for the court to appoint a psychiatrist to examine the defendant. More than one expert may be appointed. Experts are selected from a list of approved experts kept by the court. The parties may object to the appointment for cause, just like they may object to the person of the judge trying the case and seek his disqualification. Parties may not bring their own experts nor may they suggest a particular expert to be appointed. This is done entirely by the court.

6. Foreign codes handle the situation similarly to s. 502 of the Model. Some codes, e.g. the German, the French and the Swiss do not mention intoxication expressly but it is understood that when it reaches the degree where the defendant lacks the capacity to appreciate the criminality of his conduct, he is not responsible. He would be responsible, however, if he intentionally became intoxicated for the purpose of committing the offense while so intoxicated in order to provide a defense. A reduced capacity due to intoxication will result in lighter punishment. German P.C. para 51, French P.C. art. 64, Swiss P.C. art. 10–12. Some codes, e.g. the Italian and the Austrian, deal with intoxication expressly. The Italian P.C. provides that a person is not imputable when at the time of the commission of the offense he did not have the capacity to intend and to will because he was totally intoxicated and the intoxication was brought about by accident or superior force. Where the intoxication was only partial without fully excluding the capacity to intend and will, the punishment will be decreased. (art. 91). Intoxication which is not brought about by accident or superior force does not exclude nor reduce imputability. Where the intoxication was procured so as to obtain an excuse for the commission of the offense, the punishment is increased. (art. 92). The same rules apply to intoxication due to drugs. (art. 93).

The Austrian P.C. provides explicitly that where the defendant is fully intoxicated (alcohol or drugs) so as not to realize that he is doing wrong, he is not imputable. (para. 2.c.). Where he intentionally becomes intoxicated for the purpose of obtaining a defense for the commission of the offense, he is liable. (para 2.c.). Reduced imputability due to intoxication may be taken as an attenuating circumstance and reduce the sentence. (para 46, 264, 523). The Spanish P.C. carries similar provisions. (art. 8(1), 9(2).)

All codes provide for the suppression of alcoholism and drug abuse and for the treatment of alcoholics and users of drugs. Where a person has committed an offense under such influences, the court may, and in case of felony or misdemeanor must commit the offender to a hospital for prisoners for treatment. All European countries have special institutions for that purpose. E.g. German P.C. para. 42b,c. French Code de la santé publique, Art. L. 355–1–2. Italian P.C. art. 221, 222. Swiss P.C. art. 44, 45. Austrian P.C. para. 523, StGNov. 1952, BGBl Nr 62. Spanish P.C. art. 8(1).

Mentally ill persons are detained in proper institutions with a view to their treatment and recovery. Equally, drug users and alcoholics are detained in proper institutions for the same purpose. The difference in treatment is purely medical. Legally they are treated quite identically. I also refer to my article above.

7. Foreign codes cover the same field in much the same way. They enunciate specific rules and set general standards. E.g. German P.C. para. 53. French P.C. art. 321, 322, 327–329. Swiss P.C. art. 32–34. Italian P.C. art. 51–55. Austrian P.C. para. 2g. Spanish P.C. art. 8 (4–7).

8. Foreign codes classify offenses in felonies, misdemeanors and infractions, e.g. the French, German, Austrian, and Swiss codes, or only into crimes (delicts) and infractions, e.g. the Italian and Spanish codes. No classes within a given group exist. As to punishment, there are different types of imprisonment in existence with respect to duration and type of imprisonment. The section dealing with every particular offense provides for a given type of punishment. So the German P.C. provides for Zuchthausstrafe (life, 1–15 years), Gefängnisstrafe (1day–5years), Einschliessung (1day–15 years), and Haft (1day–6weeks), and for a fine. Zuchthausstrafe means penal servitude, the other types mean imprisonment. German P.C. para. 14–18.

The French P.C. provides for the death penalty, life imprisonment of two types, stricter (reclusion), and milder (détention), imprisonment for a time, stricter (reclusion), and milder (détention). Imprisonment for infractions (emprisonnement), and a fine. art. 6–9.

Other codes follow a similar course.

The classification of felonies and misdemeanors in classes in the Model serves the same purpose. The grading of offenses is, however, very mild compared with the foreign codes, and also the terms meted within the classes are below those meted in foreign countries. So murder should be punishable with death or life imprisonment with no possibility for parole. No further grading as in para. 3602 of the Model should occur to put it at par with foreign codes. To make murder an A class felony with no meaningful minimum limit is much too mild. E.g. French P.C. art. 295–304. German P.C. para. 211. Swiss P.C. art 112. Austrian P.C. para. 136. Italian P.C. art. 576–577. Spanish P.C. art. 405–406.

The same applies to Aggravated assault, para. 1612 of Model. It should be a class A felony with a meaningful minimum limit to put it at par with foreign codes. All the sentences in the Model should be upgraded to keep them in line with foreign sentences.

9. Part C of Model compares unfavorably with foreign codes. The provisions are too elaborate and allow an unwarranted reduction of punishment. No indefinite sentences exist in European criminal law. Every offense must have a minimum and maximum term. The provision in para. 3201 (4) of Model for no minimum term for class A and B felonies is outrageous. How can crime be stopped if the penal code embodies the principle that felons may go unpunished. See my article above. Foreign codes impose meaningful minimum terms for any offense.

Suspension and probation have basically the same meaning and effect in foreign law. The terms are sursis in French P.C., sospensione condizionale in Italian P.C., remisión condicional in Spanish P.C., Bewährung in German P.C., Bedingte Verurteilung in Austrian P.C., Bedingter Strafvollzug in Swiss P.C. The meaning is always the same. The person is convicted but his sentence is suspended/probated if he behaves within a certain stipulated time. He is free but under supervision of probation officers and the police.

The whole approach of para. 3101 of Model is in contradiction to foreign provisions. The Model para. 3101 (2) provides: "The court shall not impose a sentence of imprisonment upon a person eligible for probation unless, . . ." In foreign law probation is a favor shown to convicted offenders and is with the exception of infractions purely discretionary. See my article above.

All European sentences carry mandatory minimum and maximum sentences. The court may in very exceptional cases assess punishment below the minimum, and may for good reasons exceed the maximum.

Provisions of para. 3207 of Model are unnecessarily involved. Foreign criminal law gives credit for all time spent in custody after arrest. Such time is credited toward any sentence which may be pronounced.

The punishments provided in the Model and in any state law in general are very mild in comparison with punishments provided in foreign codes for practically any offense. See my comments under 8, above, and my article above.

The Parole provisions in chapter 34 of Model are shockingly lenient compared with provisions of foreign codes. In Europe, prisoners are eligible for parole only after they have served ½ to ¾ of their sentences. Parole is generally a privilege not a right, so that the wording of para. 3402 of Model is completely out of touch with European law. See my article above. It is well known that parolees commit a significant proportion of US crime. It is hard to understand that anybody really interested in keeping crime down would come up with the mentioned provisions of Model.

Prisoners are released on parole in foreign countries by the Ministry of Justice. Parole boards are composed of officers of administration of justice. The parole board recommends, but final decisions rests with the Ministry, the Minister bearing full responsibility. Consequently, no irresponsible releases on parole occur.

My copy of Model does not contain any provisions as to publicity of offenses committed by corporations, allegedly to appear in para. 3007. No such provisions seem to exist in Europe. The situation would most likely be governed by administrative law, not penal law.

Foreign codes have an equivalent of para. 3003, but a much more effective one. Provisions of Model are much too lenient. See my article on habitual criminals above.

Foreign codes require the court to give reasons in the judgment for the sentences imposed. The judgment must be made out in writing. Failure to give reasons makes the judgment void.

The appellate court may not raise the sentence on the appeal of the convicted person, but only on the appeal of the prosecutor. If both appeal, then the court may either increase or decrease the sentence. Either party may generally appeal the sentence.

With the exception of insignificant fines, any criminal judgment is subject to appeal. In France, judgments of the Assize courts are not appealable on the ground that a jury judgment cannot be appealed. Assize trials are the only jury trials in France. The judgments are, however, subject to cassation. All judgments in any civil law country are subject to both appeal and cassation or, as in the case of Assize courts in France, only subject to cassation. Uniformity of sentencing is secured by the Court of Cassation (Supreme Court) which exercises supervisory authority over all courts and which is bound to insure uniformity of sentencing. It is admitted that it is impossible to achieve this end 100% in any system.

Foreign codes provide for joint sentences rather than for consecutive sentences. Where the offender has committed several offenses, he is generally assessed the penalty for the most serious of them with a proper increase in punishment. There is always a limit on the maximum so arrived at, stipulated in the code. E.G. Maximum of the term for the most serious offense plus one half thereof, Swiss P.C. art. 68. The German P.C. para. 74 provides for maximums. Austrian P.C. para 34–35 provides for an increased penalty. French P.C. art. 5, imposes only the sentence for the most serious offense with the rules for an increased penalty applicable.

The Spanish and the Italian codes provide for cumulation of offenses and punishments. The Spanish P.C. art. 70, imposes a limit, namely three times the term for the most serious offense. The Italian P.C. art. 78, has a limit, five times the term for the most serious offense.

If one of the elements of the sentence is reversed on appeal, the court of appeal will impose a new sentence. It may decrease the sentence pronounced by the trial court, or it may rule that the reversal has no measurable effect on the sentence pronounced and affirm it.

Foreign codes do not have provisions closely similar to para. 3301(2) of Model. There are, however, similarities. E.g. Swiss P.C. art. 48, and Italian P.C. art. 24, set upper limits for fines but allow the court to exceed them. Provisions of foreign codes are far superior to chapter 33 of Model.

In foreign countries fines must be paid at once, or security given and an arrangement for payment approved by the court before the offender is allowed to leave. If he does not pay or cannot pay, the fine is converted in a term of imprisonment and the offender is committed to jail. The argument that an offender who is too poor to pay a fine and must therefore serve a term is being done an injustice is out of place. Poverty does not give a license to break the law. The codes carry conversion values to convert fines into imprisonment. The sum which equals one-day jail is fixed in the code, e.g. 10 Francs equal one day, with a maximum of 3 months jail in lieu of a fine. Swiss P.C. art. 49. The gravity of the offense or the ability of the defendant to pay are irrelevant.

10. Mistake of law is not a defense under foreign law. Para. 610 of the Model has, as far as I know, no counterpart in any legal system and should be deleted. Mistake of fact is a defense. Arts. 303. 304 of Model are unclear. They could simply provide that mistake of law is not a defense, and that mistake of fact is a defense to the extent of e.g. Swiss P.C. art. 19. Foreign codes are greatly superior to the provisions of the Model.

11. In all foreign countries jurisdiction is territorial and as to the subject matter. There are courts of limited jurisdiction, general jurisdiction, appelate courts and one supreme court. Every piece of national territory is covered by the entire hierarchy. Infractions are tried in the courts of limited jurisdiction, misdemeanors and felonies in the courts of general jurisdiction, specifically enumerated serious felonies in courts of general jurisdiction but in a jury trial. Territorial jurisdiction is vested in the proper court having jurisdiction as to the subject matter in the district where the offense was committed.

Chapter 2. of Model is peculiar to the US. No European country is likely to enact anything similar. Similarities may be found in the Latin American countries but they all took the idea from the US.

12. Extraterritorial jurisdiction of foreign states is more extensive. Foreign codes punish all offenses by whomsoever committed within the national territory, and by citizens abroad. They also punish foreigners for offenses committed abroad in special cases, or when they are apprehended in national territory and are not extradited. E.g. German P.C. para. 3–7. Austrian P.C. para. 36–41. Swiss P.C. art. 3–7. Italian P.C. art. 3–13. French C.C.P. art. 689–696. Spanish L.E.C. art. 824–833.

13. Criminal conspiracy is covered partly by provisions referring to accomplices and partly by independent provisions corresponding to para. 1004 of Model. Criminal conspiracy is sometimes punishable in general and with respect to offenses against the state and the public order in particular. E.g. German P.C. para. 129, 129a. Swiss P.C. art. 275 ter. French P.C. art. 87, 94. Italian P.C. art. 304–305. Spanish P.C. art. 143. Austrian P.C. para. 5.

14. The felony-murder rule is usually not expressly elaborated but any such homicide falls within the definition of murder and is punishable by death or by life imprisonment with no possibility of parole and only very exceptionally with long term penal servitude. E.g. French P.C. art. 304. Italian P.C. art. 576(1). Spanish P.C. art. 407. German P.C. para. 211. Swiss P.C. art. 111–112. Austrian P.C. para. 136, 141, 142.

Provisions of para. 1601(c) of Model are very mild compared to foreign provisions.

15. The US federal—state system was adopted in Latin America, but it never surpassed the US model. Consequently, the study of Latin American jurisprudence is not very helpful. The European federal states are such only in name as far as the legal system is concerned. They are perfectly unitary systems just like e.g. France or Spain. In Germany there is just one law and one system of courts. Switzerland has more features of a federal state, but there is just one substantive law. Laws of procedure are cantonal, not federal, but are very similar. A more pronounced federal system exists in Australia with the difference that there the states are powerful and the federation weak. Australian federal law deals only with offenses against provisions in federal statutes, like defense, mail, currency. In addition, the federation exercised its grant of power in the federal constitution and enacted uniform laws of bankruptcy and matrimonial causes. The law of bankruptcy is administered in federal courts of bankruptcy. All other federal law is administered in state courts which have been invested with federal jurisdiction, so that in Australia there is no duality of courts and no diversity jurisdiction exists. In addition to bankruptcy courts, there is the High Court of Australia which is the supreme court in federal matters on appeal from state supreme courts. The enumerated offenses are against state law and will be tried in one system of courts, as no other system exists.

In all countries the enumerated acts are punishable, but the penalties are much higher than in the Model. See my article above.

16. Provisions as to Para-Military activities in para. 1105 of Model are usually not directly spelled out in the codes except in the United Kingdom, Denmark, Norway, Canada, and Sweden, as mentioned in the working papers, and also in Germany, P.C. para. 127, in Spain, P.C. art. 173(5), and in Italy, P.C. art. 699. The field is, however, well covered by provisions relating to offenses against the state (treason) and by provisions of administrative law. Every such organisation would need a permit from the Ministry of Interior. Exercising such activities without permit is an offense.

17. Drugs are dealt with in foreign law in separate statures. E.g. French Code de la santé publique, L. 629, R. 5165. Italian L. 22 ott. 1954, n. 1041. and art. 446–448 C.P.

Again, the provisions of the Model are too complicated in comparison with foreign provisions and the penalties are too mild.

Abortion is treated in foreign penal codes and is generally punishable. The existing policy is, however, expected to change in the future.

Unauthorised gambling is prohibited, but the government gives licenses to gambling houses which are properly supervised and it licenses lotteries. Experience has shown that it is impossible to stamp out gambling. It is therefore prudent to license it on reasonable conditions, have it well supervised, and have the state take the profit which is then used to pay for hospitals and social projects. An excellent model is the system in all Australian states, e.g. Victoria and Tasmania, as well as in all European countries. E.G. French P.C. art. 410.

Prostitution cannot be stamped out. All attempts which have been made in recorded history failed badly. Common sense therefore commands that the law should not prohibit it but regulate and supervise it. This is the foreign approach. The French and Italian system used to provide for the licensing of houses of prostitution. After this system was abolished after World War II, veneral diseases began to spread so that to-day there is considerable pressure in both countries to re-introduce the system.

All other countries, and now including France and Italy, do not license but tolerate, supervise and regulate prostitution. Provisions of criminal codes prohibit and punish making profit on prostitution by persons other than the women themselves. E.g. French P.C. art. 334 and foll. German P.C. para. 180 and foll. Swiss P.C. art. 198–199. Italian P.C. art. 531–538, L. 20 feb. 1958, n. 75. Spanish P.C. art. 452 bis a.—bis f. Austrian P.C. para. 512–515.

Prostitution is regulated by administrative provisions set up by the government in the exercise of its police power. This is also the approach adopted in a number of countries within the British Commonwealth. It is interesting to note that in all countries which try to suppress prostitution there is not only a very high rate of veneral diseases but also a very high rate of sexual offenses like rape. Sexual offenses are nearly nonexistent in countries which tolerate prostitution. The moral is that the prospective sexual offender rarely materializes if he has an ample outlet.

The provisions of para. 1841 and foll. of Model are unrealistic.

Para. 1844 of Model—Patronizing Prostitutes—is ill advised. It is a world first but in the wrong direction. It is likely to produce results similar to the ill advised prohibition legislation, namely, organized crime will move into the prostitution business and its position will be greatly enhanced. I would recommend the adoption of the normal world practice on prostitution and also, consideration should be given to the system presently existing in the State of Nevada.

Para. 1851 of Model—Disseminating Obscene Material—is in line with foreign provisions. Foreign provisions prohibit trafficking in obscene material to minors, and are generally so drafted as not to punish the passing of such material privately to consenting adults. E.g. Swiss P.C. 204, 212. German P.C. para. 184, 184a. Italian P.C. art. 528 and foll. Prosecution is mainly on the complaint of the person offended.

Homosexuality is generally punishable. The United Kingdom is one of the exceptions.

18. The manufacture, distribution and possession of firearms is regulated by statutes in every foreign country. Every manufacturer, distributor and possessor must have a proper license. Possession of firearms without license is a very serious offense. This includes any firearms, excluding only airguns, i.e.

hunting rifles are included and require a license. Licenses are given as a matter of course to persons over 21, of good moral standing, who have never been convicted. The firearms statutes are administered by the Ministry of Interior and its subordinate agencies. E.g. French Décret-Loi du 18 avril 1939—Fixant le régime des matériels de guerre, armes et munitions.

Provisions with respect to explosives are yet stricter. No one may possess explosives except licensed enterprises, e.g. mines, quarries.

Provisions of para. 1811 and foll. of Model should be made stricter.

19. Practically all foreign countries provide for the death penalty. Exceptions are the United Kingdom, Germany, Italy, Switzerland, but even they retain the death penalty under provisions of military law. In all these countries the death penalty is commuted into life imprisonment without any possibility of parole. Pardon may be granted. The penalty of life imprisonment in lieu of the death penalty is a different penalty than the penalty of life imprisonment, which may be paroled after the prisoner has served some 15 years. See my article above.

Para. 3602 of Model has no counterpart in foreign law. No separate proceedings for determining sentence are held. It does not make any sense to hold them. Sentencing is an integral part of criminal proceedings.

There usually is a jury in the civil law countries in trials for serious crimes, the exception being Spain where there are no juries at all. Juries are composed of six to nine jurors only and sit usually with the court as lay judges, the judges also voting on questions of fact. See my article above. There are no restrictive rules of evidence in existence comparable to the Anglo-American rules. No hearsay rule exists, but the witnesses must stick to the topic.

20. Para. 703 of Model—Multiple Offenses—are mentioned above under 9.

Para. 704–705 of Model—Former prosecution of different offense is within the defense of autrefois acquit, autrefois convict. It applies in all countries.

Para. 706–707 of Model has no counterpart in European countries as they are unitary systems, nor in Australia as there state courts are invested with federal jurisdiction.

Para. 708 of Model—Former prosecution invalid—Unlikely to arise in foreign countries All arrangements to this effect are invalid. See my article above.

A STUDY IN THE TREATMENT OF CRIME AND LAW ENFORCEMENT IN THE UNITED STATES AS COMPARED TO THE EUROPEAN COUNTRIES

GEORGE E. GLOS*

It is well known that crimes are being similarly treated all over the world and that the various systems differ only in details. Yet, it is equally well known that the crime rate in England and in the other European countries stands at a much lower level than that in the United States. The reasons for the high crime rate in the United States are varied and complex and they have not, to a large extent, been fully determined. They may be sociological, economic, or racial, but they may as well stem, at least in a limited way, from the difference in treatment accorded to the several crimes in the legal system of the United States as compared with that prevailing in England and the other European countries and from the difference in prosecution and treatment of offenders. The purpose of this article is to explore such differences as they exist today in the treatment of serious crimes in the leading systems of criminal law and law enforcement.

HOMICIDE

Differences in the treatment of homicide occur in the area of criminal homicide as distinguished from innocent homicide.[1] Criminal homicide is traditionally of two kinds, murder and manslaughter. The distinction between them consists in the presence or absence of malice aforethought.[2] Further, the concept of negligent homicide is becoming

* Professor of Law, St. Mary's University. B.A., Lycee College; LL.B., J.U.D., Charles University; LL.B., University of Melbourne; LL.M., J.S.D., Yale University Law School.

1 Innocent homicide is understood not to involve criminal guilt and is presented in two forms as justifiable and excusable homicide. It is not discussed in this article.

2 Malice aforethought has had different meanings at different times. It has been defined as an unjustifiable, inexcusable and unmitigated man-endangering state of mind, or as a freely well established.[8] This approach recognizes thus a threefold division of criminal homicide; namely, murder, manslaughter and negligent homicide.[4] Apart from this basic division, several degrees and shades of guilt may be statutorily recognized within murder, manslaughter and negligent homicide with a corresponding differentiation in punishment. Significant differences also occur throughout the law of criminal homicide, especially with respect to punishment of both completed crimes and attempts. As to punishment, the penalty for murder in the several states of the United States usually ranges from imprisonment for some two years to the death penalty,[5] that for manslaughter from a fine to imprisonment for some twenty-five years,[6] and that for negligent homicide from a fine to imprisonment for some fifteen years.[7] The punishment for attempted murder usually ranges from imprisonment for about one year to a term of some twenty-five years.[8]

In English law, the traditional division of criminal homicide into murder and manslaughter is retained so that the area of negligent homicide is fully covered by manslaughter. Murder may be defined as the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought.[9] Malice is either express or implied. Constructive malice having been abolished,[10] a killing will not amount to murder unless it is done with the intent to kill or to do grievous bodily harm from which malice aforethought might be implied.[11] The punishment for murder is formed intention of a man to pursue a course of conduct which he realizes will or may bring about the death of some person. It includes both an intention to kill, and an intention to hurt by means of an act which the actor realizes is likely to kill.

3 Negligent homicide is such homicide which would be excusable except that it results from criminal negligence. It necessarily encroaches on the area covered by manslaughter and extends to cases in which guilt is based on negligence. It usually deals with traffic accidents.

4 Even where manslaughter is statutorily abolished as e.g. in Texas, the same concept of criminal liability is covered in the statute under a different, more specialized heading.

9 This is a modernized version of the definition given by Coke and later by Blackstone. According to them murder occurred "when a person of sound memory and discretion, unlawfully killeth any reasonable creature in being, and under the King's peace, with malice aforethought, either express or implied." 3 Co. Inst. 47; 4 Bl. Comm. 198.

11 Malice aforethought may also be implied when the killing is done with knowledge that the act in question would probably cause death or grievous bodily harm.

imprisonment for life.[12] Manslaughter is in effect any homicide which does not amount to murder. It covers both the concept of voluntary and involuntary manslaughter as well as negligent homicide.[13] The wide scope of criminal responsibility in manslaughter is fully reflected in punishment which may be assessed, namely, imprisonment for life or imprisonment for any shorter term.[14]

The French law makes a fundamental distinction between voluntary and involuntary homicide. Voluntary homicide is murder,[15] and murder committed with premeditation or while lying in wait is an assassination.[16] The punishment for assassination is death,[17] and that for murder is imprisonment for life.[18] The killing in the course of commission of a crime,[19] or in circumstances which have for their object to prepare, facilitate or carry out a crime, or to enable an escape, is also punishable by death.[20] A voluntary infliction of wounds without an intent to kill which, however, causes the victim's death, is punishable with imprisonment from ten to twenty years.[21] If there is premeditation or lying in wait, the penalty is imprisonment for life.[22] Involuntary homicide which is defined as killing by lack of skill, by imprudence, inattention, negligence or inobservance of rules, is punishable by imprisonment from three months to two years and with a fine.[23] Attempt is treated as a completed crime.[24]

12 This is in consequence of the Murder (Abolition of Death Penalty) Act 1965, c. 71. Although the Act abolished the death penalty only for five years and was to expire on 31 July 1970, Parliament in accordance with the provisions of § 4 thereof resolved that the Act should not so expire. Resolution of the House of Commons of December 16, 1969. Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons, 16th December 1969, No. 36, p. 163. Resolution of the House of Lords of December 18, 1969. House of Lords, Minutes of Proceedings, 18 December 1969, No. 26, p. 218. The Murder (Abolition of Death Penalty) Act 1965, c. 71, took thus permanent effect.

The life sentence is mandatory and no lesser sentence can be assessed. The statute abolishes the death penalty only with respect to murder, so that the death penalty is still in effect for treason, piracy with violence, and setting fire to Queen's ships, arsenals, etc.

13 The definition of manslaughter is unsatisfactory. Voluntary manslaughter comprises only those killings which are reduced from murder to manslaughter due to provocation. Involuntary manslaughter covers all other cases. The English law recognizes, however, that homicide by pure inadvertence is not manslaughter but will involve the inadvertent person in civil and not in criminal liability.

14 Offences against the Person Act, 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, § 5; Criminal Justice Act, 1948, 11 & 12 Geo. 6 c. 58, § 1 (1); Criminal Law Act 1967, c. 58, § 7 (3).

The Italian law makes a distinction between homicide, homicide under aggravating circumstances, non-intentional homicide, homicide as a consequence of another crime, and negligent homicide. On homicide it basically states that whosoever shall bring about the death of a person will be punished with imprisonment for not less than twenty-one years.[25] Homicide under aggravating circumstances is punishable with imprisonment for life.[26] Aggravating circumstances are: To cover up the commission of another crime; when committed by an escapee to avoid arrest or to obtain provisions; in the course of committing rape; when committed against an ascendant or descendant; by poisoning or by other base means; with premeditation; with cruelty.[27] On non-intentional homicide it provides that whosoever with the intent to cause bodily harm brings about the death of a person shall be punished with imprisonment from ten to eighteen years.[28] The term of imprisonment will be increased by one-third and up to one-half when there are aggravating circumstances as enumerated above, and up to one-third when the crime was committed with arms or corrosives.[29] On homicide as a consequence of another crime it provides that whenever death is brought about as an unintended consequence of a crime, the punishment is as in negligent homicide, but the term of imprisonment there prescribed is increased.[30] Negligent homicide is punished by imprisonment from six months to five years. When more than one person is killed, or one is killed and another or more persons are injured as a consequence of negligent homicide, the term of imprisonment may be increased up to twelve years.[31] An attempt to kill is punishable with imprisonment for not less than twelve years, but if there are aggravating circumstances, with imprisonment from twenty-four to thirty years.[32]

The Spanish law differentiates between parricide, homicide under aggravating circumstances, simple homicide, and negligent homicide. Parricide is defined as the killing of the father, mother, child or any other ascendant or descendant whether legitimate or not, and is punishable with imprisonment for twenty years and one day as a minimum, and by death as a maximum.[33] The same punishment is prescribed for homicide under aggravating circumstances. They are: Treacherous killing; for reward; by flooding, arson, poison or explosives; with premeditation; with cruelty.[34] Simple homicide is punishable with imprisonment from twelve years and one day to twenty years.[35] Negligent homicide may be caused by gross imprudence under such circumstances that had there been malice, it would have amounted to homicide. It is punishable by imprisonment from six months and one day to six years. When death is caused by simple imprudence or negligence in breach of regulations (usually safety rules), the punishment is imprisonment from one month and one day to six months.[36] An attempt to commit parricide or homicide under aggravating circumstances is punishable with imprisonment from six years and one day to thirty years. An attempt to commit simple homicide is punishable by imprisonment from six months and one day to twelve years.[37]

The German law distinguishes murder, simple homicide, homicide under attenuating circumstances, and negligent homicide. Intentional homicide under specially enumerated circumstances amounts to murder and is punishable with imprisonment for life. The circumstances are: Killing with a desire to kill; with a sexual motive; with a pecuniary motive; with any other base motive; treacherously; with cruelty; using life-endangering means; in order to facilitate or to cover up the commission of another crime.[38] Simple homicide is defined as an intentional killing under circumstances not amounting to murder. The penalty is imprisonment for five years as a minimum, but imprisonment for life may be assessed in cases of particular gravity.[39] Where there are attenuating circumstances as provocation and the homicide is committed in hot blood or under other attenuating circumstances, the punishment is imprisonment from six months to five years.[40] Negligent homicide is punishable with imprisonment from one day to five years.[41] Attempt to murder is punishable with imprisonment for not less than three years. In other types of homicide, the term may be reduced up to one-quarter of the lower limit stipulated for the completed crime.[42]

that whosoever with the intent to kill a person acts so as to bring about the death of that or any other person, is guilty of murder and is punishable with death.[43] Homicide in the course of robbery is also punishable with death.[44] Homicide brought about with the intent to cause bodily harm, but without an intent to kill, is manslaughter. The punishment is imprisonment from five to ten years, but where there is a close family or other relationship between the offender and the victim, the term ranges from ten to twenty years.[45] Negligent homicide is punishable by imprisonment from six months to one year, but the term is extended up to three years when the act was committed in the operation of railways, ships, mines, waterworks, and any other machinery; while intoxicated; or when the offender left the scene of the accident without giving assistance to the victim.[46] Attempted murder is punishable with imprisonment from five to ten years, but in case of an attempt to commit murder in furtherance of robbery; by poisoning or other treacherous means; for hire; on relatives by blood or on a spouse; the term is from ten to twenty years, and in cases of particular gravity it is punishable with imprisonment for life.[47]

The Swiss law provides for murder, simple homicide, manslaughter, and negligent homicide.[48] Murder is defined as premeditated homicide whereby the baseness or dangerous character of the offender is manifested. It is punished with imprisonment for life.[49] Simple homicide not amounting to murder is punishable with imprisonment for a minimum of five years.[50] Manslaughter is a homicide committed while the offender's mind was inflamed by passion and is punishable by imprisonment of up to ten years.[51] Negligent homicide is punishable by imprisonment from three days to three years or with a fine.[52] Attempted murder is punishable with imprisonment for ten years as a minimum, and attempt to commit simple homicide with imprisonment from one to twenty years.[53]

Compared with the provisions of the various states of the United States, the European provisions are somewhat simpler and carry somewhat stiffer penalties. This trend is quite pronounced especially in the area of attempt. It is also to be pointed out that the penalty of imprisonment in homicide in the European countries is not just imprisonment but penal servitude.[54] Although the death penalty for homicide has been abolished in a number of European countries carrying with it an obvious loss of deterrent, it has not been followed by a pronounced increase in the crime rate. In circumstances prevailing in Europe, where homicide is, percentagewise, a nearly nonexisting crime, the abolition of the death penalty can hardly effect a change in the mores, and the deterrent factor implicit in the death penalty may be abandoned. Such experiment is, however, not advisable for countries with a notoriously high rate of homicide such as the United States where the deterrent factor of the death penalty should not lightly be given away. Wherever the death penalty was abolished in the European countries, its place was taken by imprisonment for life, and the various European legal systems take it to mean life. Thus the other factor implicit in the death penalty, namely, to keep the offender out of circulation whereby society is protected against his dangerous propensities, is fully kept intact. Consequently, if the deterrent factor in the death penalty is regarded as not worthy of preservation, incarceration for life will suffice to protect society. Moreover, imprisonment for life embodies in it a considerable deterrent of its own, so that it is generally regarded as an adequate substitute for the death penalty. It must be clearly understood, however, that whenever this approach is adopted, it is imperative to see to it that the offender is actually kept behind bars for life, or for at least such a time as to give an assurance that due to his age and general disposition, there is no likelihood of his committing further crimes.

Another point worth noting is the treatment of cases where the offender's intent is of importance. The European system conclusively presumes an intent to kill in cases where the offender makes use of a weapon which is commonly known to be likely to produce a fatal result, and also, where the generally vicious character of the offender's conduct is manifested. Therefore, voluntary rather than involuntary homicide will be presumed where the offender used a firearm, an explosive, a poison, a knife, a heavy object, and virtually any means likely to cause death.

[54] This is so everywhere in the above mentioned countries with the exception of England where penal servitude was abolished by the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, 11 & 12 Geo. 6 c. 58, § 1(1).

The human element in administering justice is also of importance, and it can be noted that the European courts show little or no sympathy to persons found guilty of homicide and assess the penalty accordingly, very close to the upper limit established by law, rather than to follow a medium course, or even to assess terms just above the permissible minimum.

Aggravated Assault

Only one type of aggravated assault is singled out for comparative evaluation, i.e., an assault involving wounding or violent injury short of homicide. The penalty prescribed for aggravated assault in the various states of the United States ranges from a fine to imprisonment of up to some ten or fifteen years.[55]

In English law, the matter is treated under the name of grievous bodily harm. The punishment is imprisonment for life.[56] The French law calls it wounding and voluntary assault. The punishment varies in conformity with the circumstances between five and twenty years of imprisonment.[57] In Italian law, it is dealt with under bodily harm with a range of imprisonment from six to twelve years.[58] In Spanish law, it is called serious bodily harm and is punishable with imprisonment from six years and one day to twelve years.[59] The German law treats the subject under the heading of bodily harm. The offense is punishable by imprisonment from two to ten years.[60] The Austrian law deals with the subject under the title of serious bodily harm. The punishment is imprisonment from five to ten years.[61] In Swiss law, the crime is termed serious bodily harm and is punishable by imprisonment from six months up to ten years.[62]

In English law, robbery is punishable with imprisonment for life.[64] In French law, it is punishable with imprisonment from ten to twenty years, but with imprisonment for life if the victim suffers a physical injury.[65] If it is committed under certain enumerated circumstances it is punishable by death.[66] Italian law punishes robbery with imprisonment from three to ten years and with a fine, but the term is increased from one-third to one-half if the crime is committed with weapons, in disguise, or by two or more persons acting together.[67] Spanish law provides for imprisonment from six months and one day to thirty years in accordance with the gravity of the crime.[68] German law punishes robbery with imprisonment from one to fifteen years.[69] Under aggravated circumstances the minimum term is increased to five years,[70] and the offense is punishable with imprisonment from ten years to life if the victim suffers bodily harm.[71] Austrian law punishes robbery with imprisonment from ten to twenty years but when the victim suffers serious bodily harm, the punishment is imprisonment for life.[72] In Swiss law, robbery is punishable by imprisonment from six months to life in accordance with the gravity of the crime.[73]

If the victim dies in consequence of the act and the offender could have foreseen it, or if the crime is carried out treacherously, the punishment is imprisonment for life.

BURGLARY

Burglary has been defined as the breaking and entering of the dwelling of another at night with intent to commit a felony. If committed during the day, it is usually termed housebreaking. Today, it is a statutory offense and the term burglary generally applies regardless of the time of commission. In the several states of the United States, burglary is punishable with imprisonment that ranges generally from one up to some twenty or twenty-five years.[74]

English law punishes burglary with imprisonment not exceeding fourteen years,[75] and an aggravated burglary with imprisonment for life.[76] French law provides for imprisonment ranging from five years to life.[77] In Italian law, burglary is punishable by imprisonment from one to six years and with a fine, and an aggravated burglary with imprison-

(a) he enters any building or part of a building as a trespasser and with intent to commit any such offence as is mentioned in section (2) below; or

(b) having entered any building or part of a building as a trespasser he steals or attempts to steal anything in the building or that part of it or inflicts or attempts to inflict on any person therein any grievous bodily harm.

(2) The offences referred to in subsection (1)(a) above are offences of stealing anything in the building or part of a building in question, of inflicting on any person therein any grievous bodily harm or raping any woman therein, and of doing unlawful damage to the building or anything therein.

(3) References in subsections (1) and (2) above to a building shall apply also to an inhabited vehicle or vessel, and shall apply to any such vehicle or vessel at times when the person having a habitation in it is not there as well as at times when he is.

(a) "firearm" includes an airgun or air pistol, and "imitation firearm" means anything which has the appearance of being a firearm, whether capable of being discharged or not; and

(b) "weapon of offence" means any article made or adapted for use for causing injury to or incapacitating a person, or intended by the person having it with him for such use; and

(c) "explosive" means any article manufactured for the purpose of producing a practical effect by explosion, or intended by the person having it with him for that purpose.

(2) A person guilty of aggravated burglary shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for life.

ment from three to ten years and with a fine.[78] Spanish law punishes burglary with imprisonment from one month and one day up to twelve years in accordance with the value of the property stolen.[79] When, however, the offender is armed, or the crime takes place in an inhabited building, or a public building, or a building dedicated to religious purposes, the term of imprisonment ranges from four months and one day to twelve years. When the offense is committed in the above enumerated buildings and the offender is armed, the term of imprisonment ranges from four months and one day up to twenty years.[80] German law prescribes as punishment for burglary a term of imprisonment from one to ten years;[81] in aggravated cases from five to ten years.[82] Austrian law punishes burglary with imprisonment from six months to ten years.[83] In Swiss law, the punishment for burglary lies between three months and ten years.[84]

Riot

Riot is defined as a disturbance of the peace by three or more persons acting together in the commission of a crime by open force, or in the execution of some enterprise, lawful or unlawful, in such a violent, turbulent and unauthorized manner as to create likelihood of public terror and alarm. In the various states of the United States, the punishment for rioting generally ranges from a fine to imprisonment for some ten years.[85]

In English law, riot is a common law misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment. If an injury to buildings, machinery, etc., is caused by rioters, it is punishable by imprisonment not exceeding seven years,[86] and when such buildings, machinery, etc., are demolished, each and every offender is liable to imprisonment for life.[87] In French law, a riot from which no damage to property is caused is punishable with imprisonment from three months to five years in accordance with its gravity.[88] When damage or loss of property occurs, the punishment ranges from imprisonment for ten years to death.[89] In Italian law, riot is punishable in accordance with the gravity of the offense with imprisonment from three years to life.[90] In Spanish law, penalties for rioting range from imprisonment for six months and one day to the death penalty.[91] German law punishes rioting with imprisonment from three months to ten years.[92] In Austrian law, riot is punished with imprisonment from one year up to the death penalty.[93] The penalty for rioting in Swiss law is imprisonment from three days to three years.[94]

Aggravated assault, robbery, burglary, and riot are, apart from homicide, perhaps the most serious crimes of violence known to the law. They are therefore similarly treated. The object of the protracted terms of imprisonment prescribed as punishment is not only to utilize the retribution and deterrent elements of the punishment but foremost to protect society from further crimes likely to be committed by the offender by keeping him in detention. And as in homicide, it can be noted that the terms prescribed by the various European penal codes are generally of longer duration than their counterparts in the United States. In addition, following their practice established in homicide, the European courts actually assess meaningful terms keeping closely to the upper limit prescribed by the codes. Experience has shown that persons who have already committed a violent crime are very likely to commit further crimes of that nature. This may well be attributable to their violent disposition. Naturally, attempts should be made to re-educate these offenders and also to provide medical treatment whenever medical science can offer a cure. Nonetheless, until definite results of re-education and medical treatment are shown, the offender should be isolated from contact with the general public. Experience has also established that it is especially a young and physically fit person who engages in the commission of these crimes. Quite naturally, a person of more advanced age, of more mature mind, and consequently also of less fit physical attributes is less likely to commit a crime which in itself presupposes both mental and physical strain and an element which in lawful activity is rightfully called courage. If therefore a sufficiently extended term of imprisonment is assessed to keep the offender in detention for so long until he reaches a more mature age when he is both mentally and physically less fitted to engage in criminal adventures, there is a good chance that he will actually abstain from further unlawful activity. The observation can therefore be made that there is a definite likelihood that the European technique of assessing longer terms of imprisonment is conducive to keeping down the crime rate both as to first offenders and repeaters.[95]

Insanity

For several centuries insanity has been regarded as absolving the offender of criminal responsibility.[96] Both the Anglo-American criminal law and that of the European countries are in full agreement with the proposition that when a person has committed a crime while suffering from insanity, he should not be punished for having committed the 95 As far as riot is concerned, if riots occur not as isolated events, but on a continuing basis, they are usually caused by organized groups of evildoers who conspire to incite them. The organizers generally rely on paid professional agitators whose task it is to surround themselves with gullible misguided enthusiasts whom they can incite to riot under the pretext of some seemingly legitimate grievances. Youth, due to its lack of experience, has traditionally been a favorite target for misuse by such unscrupulous elements. To bring the rioting to an end, the professional agitators must be placed in custody and vigorously prosecuted.

Whenever riots of continuing nature arose in Europe in recent years, they were designed along the above described pattern. Repeated police charges and attempts to disperse the crowds were exactly what the riot organizers desired, for it produced a new tie of attachment of the misguided persons being used to the professional agitators who directed the riot, and it enabled the professional agitators to make new recruits among the gullible, now made indignant because of alleged police brutality.

Whenever the proper technique to suppress such rioting was adopted, as e.g. in Italy in the late nineteen forties, the rioters were surrounded by concentrated police units, routes of escape were blocked by trucks and armored cars, and the rioters were arrested one by one, handcuffed, loaded in trucks and brought to barracks for questioning. There they were processed and properly prosecuted. Soon the gullible were separated from the professional agitators who in their great majority were out of town people. It appeared that they were in the tens, hundreds, and in large riots even in the thousands. They were paid not only for rioting, but had travel and living expenses paid. They traveled all over the country, sometimes in chartered vehicles, to stage riots and in the tumult were not readily recognized as out of town people. Once in custody, the rioting cycle was interrupted, the rioting decreased immediately as one group was already under arrest. As further groups were taken out of circulation, the whole rioting plan was summarily called off by the organizers because of shortage of agitators, and also because they realized that their remaining agitators faced certain arrest and prosecution.

96 3 Holdsworth, History of English Law 371 ff. (5th ed. 1942). What is meant and discussed here is insanity which relieves the offender of criminal responsibility, as contrasted with the so-called diminished responsibility which has the effect of e.g. reducing murder to manslaughter, and which is not discussed in this article.

act. The punishment would not do any good since the person was not aware that he was doing wrong, nor would the threat of punishment have any prospect of deterring such person from committing the act.

A distinction is always made between insanity existing at the time of commission of the crime and unfitness to plead due to supervening insanity. With respect to unfitness to plead, American law as well as the English and Continental law uniformly hold that if the offender was sane at the time of the commission of the offense but insane at the time of the criminal proceedings instituted against him, he should be committed to a proper institution for treatment and should stand trial upon regaining his mental faculties.[97]

A more serious problem arises in case of insanity existing at the time of commission of the crime. If a person accused of having committed a crime is found insane at the time of the criminal proceedings pending against him, it may also be assumed and should not prove impossible to establish that he was also insane at the time of commission of the crime. The converse would also seem logical, namely, if a person is found sane at trial, it does not seem likely that he was suffering from insanity at the time of commission of the crime. This is especially true when only a reasonably short time has elapsed between the commission of the act and the pronouncement on mental competency and where the accused did not have the benefit of medical treatment in the meantime. Consequently, the finding of insanity at the commission of the act together with a finding of no mental incapacity at trial is rare. The main distinction between the statutory provisions of the several states in the United States and those of England and the countries of Continental Europe in this respect lies in the fact that while such finding may be made under the statutes of the several states in the United States, it may either not be made under those of Europe or, even if it theoretically could be made, it is never so made and the offender is always committed to a proper institution.[98]

It is well known that extremely liberal provisions and practice concerning insanity lend themselves to abuses. It is not uncommon for an offender to plead insanity to a charge of having committed a serious crime, often homicide, and on the strength of a cooperative expert medical opinion, an equally cooperative jury finds him not guilty on the ground of insanity. He is thereupon committed to a proper institution; but a relatively short time thereafter (just one year or so), he is declared sane on the strength of another powerful medical opinion, and is released by another cooperative jury. In these circumstances it is quite evident that if the offender is actually sane at the time of his release, he most likely was also perfectly sane at the time of the commission of the offence and vice versa, i.e., if he actually was insane at the time of the commission of the offense, he would still in all likelihood be so insane at the time of his release.

In order to avoid these doubts and not to lend itself to abuses, the European theory and practice follows a somewhat different course. Where the defense of insanity has been accepted, the court orders the prisoner to be kept in custody during the pleasure of proper administrative authority at such place and manner as the authority may think fit. The confinement is understood to be prolonged and may well be lifelong. Consequently, the defense of insanity is rarely set up except in heinous crimes.

In English law, where the defense proves successful, the jury will return a special verdict that the accused is not guilty by reason of insanity[99] whereupon the court has the duty to make an order that the accused be admitted to such hospital as may be specified by the Secretary of State.[100] The accused is then detained in the hospital or hospitals in the discretion of the Secretary of State and may be discharged only at his direction.[101] The detention is of an extensive nature, possibly for life, and it is therefore not surprising that insanity is plead only in the most serious cases.

French law on the subject is closely similar to English law.[102] In Italian law, the penal code determines the minimum period of time the accused has to spend in a mental hospital for prisoners. Neither the court nor any other authority has power to shorten such period of confinement.[103] The term is ten years if the crime is punishable with imprisonment for life, five years if the crime is punishable with imprisonment for a minimum of ten years, and two years in all other cases.[104] Beyond that, the prisoner may be released only when he is declared sane and neither dangerous to himself nor to society, in special proceedings instituted for that purpose. A release may not easily be obtained under these circumstances and the confinement may extend for a long period of time, even for life. In Spanish law, when the defense of insanity is accepted by the court in prosecution for a crime, the court has to order the confinement of the accused to a proper institution for an undetermined time from which he cannot be released without a further order of the same court upon his recovery.[105] German law contains identical provisions but the release of the detained person may be ordered by any court having jurisdiction.[106] Austrian law contains similar provisions.[107] In Swiss law, the confinement of the accused in a proper institution designated by the cantonal department of justice is ordered by the court for an undetermined length of time. He is then held there in the discretion of the cantonal department of justice and can be released only at its direction. If so released, he may be recommitted by a simple order of the same authority.[108]

The element of concern for the victim of crime and for society at large is apparent from the foregoing approach. It matters little to the victim that he was injured or killed by an insane person. Since the insane cannot be punished for obvious reasons, the law owes it to the victim and to the public at large to make it absolutely certain that the insane offender is securely detained until he is declared fully in command of his faculties and will neither endanger himself nor society.

Bail

Both federal and state laws uniformly provide that any person charged with other than a capital offense shall be entitled to bail.[109] Some state laws go even further and require "evident proof"[110] or "great presumption"[111] of guilt to make a capital offense not bailable. Prisoners are entitled to bail as a matter of right, and bail is usually continued even pending appeal. The present position constitutes a considerable relaxation of the rules in existence at the time of Blackstone when persons accused of murder, manslaughter (if clearly the slayer), and persons taken in the act of felony were not bailable,[112] and there was no bail pending appeal.

The entire idea of bail is predicated upon the principle that an accused is presumed innocent until convicted by a proper tribunal. As his guilt has not been established, there is no reason for his detention which would in fact be tantamount to punishment. If he is detained, it is only to secure his attendance at trial. Consequently, where the accused can be trusted to actually appear when required, he should not be detained. The purpose of bail is thus to secure attendance of the accused in the criminal proceedings instituted against him, and especially, his appearance at trial.

Bail should therefore not be excessive but commensurate with and in proportion to the penalty which could be assessed in case the accused is found guilty of the offense charged.[113] When, however, the penalty which could be assessed in a particular case is of a serious nature, such as imprisonment for a considerable time, for life, or the death penalty, then bail is not likely to serve its purpose, for then in the words of Blackstone, the accused has no other surety but the four walls of the prison.[114]

The justification for granting bail is also not present when the person was apprehended in the act or when although he was not so apprehended, the proof against him is evident. As it is unlikely that he would be acquitted at trial under these circumstances, the presumption of innocence cannot apply in all its force and the likelihood of his not appearing at trial if released on bail is greatly increased. In such cases, considerations for the rights of the victim of crime are also of special cogency. The right of a person not to be the victim of crime must be considered together with the right of the accused to a fair trial and to the presumption of his innocence. Due regard for fair treatment of the victim of crime demands that the ac-

112 Blackstone, Book IV. 298-9. This held true from the oldest times. Glanvil says: "In omnibus placitis de felonia solet accusatus per plegios dimitti, praeterquam in placito de homicidio, ubi ad terrorem aliter statutum est." cused be not granted bail in these circumstances. This is especially true when the victim suffers physical injury. It just does not make sense to let the reputed offender go free on bail while the victim lies in the hospital. To admit persons to bail under these circumstances makes a clear mockery of justice and subverts as well the element of deterrent implicit in punishment. The case for refusal of bail is even stronger if the victim is killed or dies as a consequence of the crime committed against him.

Bail should also not be granted to persons previously convicted of serious offenses because of the possibility of their committing further offenses while free. Similarly, persons previously found guilty of jumping bail should not be admitted to bail because they cannot be trusted to abide by the conditions thereof.

All the above principles are fully embodied in the criminal law in the countries of Continental Europe. These systems go even further and regard release on bail as an exceptional measure. As a general rule, bail is not granted and the accused is kept in custody until trial when further orders as to his release or custody are made. Bail is rarely granted in the case of a felony. It is purely discretionary and is in fact available only in prosecutions for minor offenses and in circumstances when it appears quite unlikely that the accused would not appear when required. As to the actual bail given, the money or value given must actually belong to the accused so that he would suffer a considerable financial loss if it were forfeited. No bonding companies exist. If the accused is penniless or if he has no steady place of abode, bail cannot be granted even in the case of a minor offense.

In England, bail is always discretionary. If it is refused or granted on terms unacceptable to the petitioner, he may petition the High Court which has the power to admit him to bail or vary the conditions on which bail was granted.[115] Although he may be admitted to bail even if he is accused of murder, bail is not readily granted where the petitioner is accused of a serious crime. Bail may, however, be continued pending the determination of an appeal from a conviction.[116]

In French law, the accused is entitled to bail only if he is accused of having committed a misdemeanor or an offense for which the maximum penalty is imprisonment for less than two years, and if he has not previously been convicted of a felony or sentenced to imprisonment for more than three months and the sentence has not been pro-bated. He must still satisfy the judge that he will appear when required.[117] Beyond this rule, and always in the case of felony, bail is purely discretionary and is not readily obtainable.[118]

In Italian law, bail is not obtainable whenever the accused is charged with a crime the minimum penalty for which is imprisonment for five years, or when he is charged with dealing with or possession of narcotics, or counterfeiting of currency irrespective of penalty.[119] Apart from this rule, bail is purely discretionary and is granted only when the accused gives sufficient proof that he will appear when required. A person is entitled to bail when he is accused of an offense punishable with imprisonment for less than three years as a maximum, or for less than two years as a maximum if he has previously been convicted of an offense of a similar nature, or when he is accused of an offense committed negligently if it is punishable with imprisonment for less than five years. He must, however, give proof that he will appear when required, and if he is unsuccessful in doing so, he cannot be admitted to bail.[120]

In Spanish law, bail is not obtainable whenever the accused is charged with a felony carrying a minimum term of imprisonment of twelve years.[121] Beyond this rule, bail is discretionary but is likely to be granted only in cases involving minor offenses which carry a maximum term of imprisonment of six months and when there is no likelihood that the accused would absent himself.[122]

In German law, bail is purely discretionary. It may not be granted when the accused is charged with a felony and when evidence against him is overwhelming. It is also not granted, irrespective of the nature of the offense, when the accused is under suspicion that he would remove himself from the court's jurisdiction in order to escape prosecution, and also when there is danger that he would be tampering with the evidence or that he would influence witnesses.[123] Bail is usually granted only to persons accused of minor offenses which do not carry a penalty of imprisonment for more than six weeks and who are beyond suspicion of escaping to avoid prosecution.[124] prisonment for a minimum of ten years is not eligible for bail. He may be admitted to bail if the felony of which he is accused is punishable with imprisonment for a shorter term. He is entitled to bail when the felony with which he is charged is punishable with imprisonment for less than five years as a maximum. To be admitted to bail, however, the accused must in all cases establish that he will appear when required and he must give an adequate security for his appearance.[125]

In Swiss law, bail is always discretionary. It may not be granted when the accused is charged with a felony or misdemeanor and there is danger that he would be tampering with the evidence or that he would leave the court's jurisdiction in order to escape prosecution. If charged only with an offense, he should be admitted to bail unless he is likely to escape.[126]

Probation And Parole

Probation is a device which makes it possible for the court to suspend the sentence in proper cases and let a convicted offender go free on condition that he shall conduct himself well for a stipulated time. Parole makes it possible for a proper administrative authority to release a convicted offender from serving the remainder of the sentence assessed against him after he had already served part of the term. Both probation and parole are predicated upon the idea of rehabilitation; namely, to offer the offender a helping hand in the hope that he will be thus induced to keep himself out of trouble. It follows that only persons who give reasonable promise of rehabilitation may be admitted to probation or released on parole, and also that certain crimes are excepted from probation.

Probation

In general, the law of the United States and that of the various states of the Union admits to probation offenders convicted of crimes not punishable with death or life imprisonment.[127] Some states do not admit to probation persons convicted of serious crimes like murder or attempted murder or robbery with a deadly weapon,[128] some other states admit to probation only such persons who are assessed a term of imprisonment not longer than e.g., ten years, irrespective of the nature of the offense.[129] The provisions of some states are stricter than others, but in general, rules concerning probation are very liberal as compared with those existing in England and in the various countries of Continental Europe.

In the European system, persons convicted of more serious crimes are not eligible for probation. Probation is generally limited to offenders convicted of minor offenses only who have been assessed a term of imprisonment usually not longer than one year (five years as a maximum), and who have not previously been convicted. Also, offenders considered for probation must appear not to be likely to commit further offenses.

English law provides that where a person is convicted of an offense not carrying the sentence of death or life imprisonment and having regard to the circumstances, including the nature of the offense and the character of the offender, provided it is expedient to do so, the court may, instead of sentencing him, admit him to probation.[130] Although probation is thus available even to persons convicted of serious crimes, it is limited in practice to minor offenses only and to persons not previously convicted, for it would not be appropriate to admit a person to probation in more serious cases having regard to the nature of the offense and to the character of the offender.

French law provides that a person convicted of a misdemeanor or of an offense for which he could not be assessed a term of imprisonment exceeding five years, and who has not previously been convicted of a felony nor of a misdemeanor, may be admitted to probation.[131] In Italian law, only persons who have been assessed a term of imprisonment not exceeding one year and who have not previously been convicted of felony nor of a misdemeanor are eligible for probation.[132] In Spanish law, probation is available only in the case of a conviction to a term not longer than one year, and to a person not previously convicted of any offense.[133]

In German law, a person may be admitted to probation if he is assessed a term of imprisonment not exceeding nine months and if within the last five years before the conviction of the offense he has not been, upon conviction for any offense, assessed a term of imprisonment exceeding six months or admitted to probation.[134] In Austrian law, a person may be admitted to probation if the offense of which he was found guilty is punishable with imprisonment for less than five years, and where having regard to the nature of the offense and the character and age of the offender and to the fact that he has, whenever possible, made good the loss or damage caused, it appears to be preferable to admit him to probation rather than have him suffer the penalty of imprisonment.[135] In Swiss law, probation is available only to persons who have been assessed a term of imprisonment not exceeding one year, and who have not been convicted of a felony nor of a misdemeanor within the five years immediately preceding the commission of the offense. Such persons must also make good all the loss or damage caused, and must appear to be unlikely to commit further offenses.[136]

Parole

As a general rule, the law of the United States and that of the several states of the Union provides that a convicted offender may be paroled after having served one-fourth to one-third of his sentence of imprisonment, and in any case (i.e. life imprisonment), after having served seven to twenty years.[137] Similar to the rules governing probation, these provisions are very liberal indeed, as compared with those of the European countries.

The European provisions make a convicted offender eligible for parole after he has served one-half to three-fourths of the term of imprisonment. A person imprisoned for life may be paroled after he has served some fifteen to twenty-eight years. In each case, the prisoner must have merited parole by his good conduct in prison and must give promise of an honorable conduct after his discharge.

In English law, a prisoner serving a sentence of imprisonment for a term of more than one month may be granted remission of part of the sentence on the ground of his industry and good conduct. Such remission may not exceed one-third of the sentence.[138] Persons convicted to imprisonment for life may also be paroled but no rule exists as to their eligibility for parole except that they may be paroled in the discretion of the Secretary of State. This discretion is rarely exercised and only after the offender has served a very extensive term of imprisonment.[139]

In French law, parole may be granted after the prisoner has served one-half of his term but not less than three months. A prisoner who has previously been convicted of a felony or of a misdemeanor may become eligible after he has served two-thirds of his term but not less than six months. In the case of imprisonment for life, the prisoner may be paroled after he has served fifteen years of imprisonment.[140] In Italian law, a prisoner may be paroled after he has served one-half of his term. He must have served, however, at least thirty months, and no more than five years of his sentence may be remitted. In case of a prisoner previously convicted, he must serve at least three-fourths of the term but not less than four years. Prisoners convicted to life imprisonment are eligible for parole after having served twenty-eight years.[141] In Spanish law, the prisoner must serve three-fourths of his term before he is eligible for parole. Only those imprisoned for a term of one year or longer are eligible.[142]

In German law, parole may be obtained after the prisoner has served two-thirds of his term and three months as a minimum. A person sentenced to life is not eligible for parole; however, the prisoner may petition for remission and obtain pardon.[143] In Austrian law, a prisoner is eligible for parole after he has served two-thirds of his term and a minimum of eight months. A prisoner serving a life sentence may be paroled after twenty years.[144] In Swiss law, a prisoner may be paroled after he has served two-thirds of his term and three months as a minimum. In the case of imprisonment for life, the prisoner may be paroled after fifteen years.[145]

It is thus quite apparent that in the European countries the prisoner has to serve a much longer part of his term before he is eligible for parole. This is, however, subject to a further qualification that while in the United States a prisoner is usually paroled as soon as he becomes eligible for parole, such a rule does not obtain in the European countries. Since a prisoner must give promise of good conduct after his discharge, only very few prisoners are actually paroled as soon as they become eligible, some are paroled at a later date, and many are never paroled. Parole is purely discretionary and it is used with caution. It is interesting to note, in this connection, that many American juries are not in agreement with the liberal policy of granting parole and indicate their displeasure at a premature release of prisoners by assessing prolonged terms of imprisonment of sixty, one hundred, and even more years in the hope that the parole boards will take their advice in consideration and will not parole prisoners who do not deserve it.

Habitual Criminals

The laws of the several states in the United States provide on the average that upon third conviction for misdemeanor or felony, the offender shall be sentenced to the maximum provided as penalty for the offense for which he is then convicted.[146] Some states are stricter and increase the penalty upon a second conviction,[147] or in the case of felonies, provide for imprisonment for life upon a third conviction.[148] Although these provisions appear reasonably strict, they are still quite lenient if considered in conjunction with the provisions for bail, probation and parole and the practice of granting the same. True, habitual offenders need not be granted bail, released on probation or paroled, but in practice they are being given these benefits.

The main difference between the provisions of the several states of the United States and those of England and the other European countries lies in the ineligibility of the habitual offender to bail, probation and parole.[149]

English law provides that where an offender who was previously convicted of an offense punishable with imprisonment for a term of two years or more, is convicted of an offense punishable with imprisonment for a term of two years or more, committed before the expiration of three years from his release from prison, the court may impose a term exceeding the maximum term authorized for the offense.[150]

French law directs the court to assess a term of imprisonment at the maximum provided for by the penal code in case of a second offense, and it gives the court authority to extend the term even further up to double punishment.[151] In Italian law, the term of imprisonment for a second offense is increased by one-sixth. It is, however, increased up to one-half if the offense is of the same type as the first offense, or if it is committed within five years from the first conviction.[152] Upon a third conviction, the offender may be declared to be a habitual criminal.[153] The effect of such a declaration is that the offender is, upon serving his term, further detained in a labor institution for a minimum of two to four years.[154] In Spanish law, conviction for a second offense is considered an aggravating circumstance and carries with it an increased term of imprisonment.[155]

In German law, a person who is convicted of a third offense and who has on both previous occasions been assessed a term of imprisonment of not less than six months, may be incarcerated for a term of up to five years if the third offense is a misdemeanor, and up to fifteen years if it is a felony.[156] In Austrian law, the fact of a second or further conviction amounts to an aggravating circumstance and exposes the offender to an increased term of imprisonment.[157] In Swiss law, a habitual criminal may be imprisoned indefinitely but for not less than three years. If the offense for which he is convicted carries a term longer than three years, he may not be released before that term has run.[158] prosecutor which files a charge against the reputed offender in the proper criminal court. The charge is based on information supplied by the victim, witnesses and the police. Acting on the charge, the court appoints a judge, known as an investigating judge, to take care of the matter and to carry out a thorough investigation. The judge hears the victim, the witnesses, the police, the prosecutor, the person charged and his attorney. He studies all possible leads, consults experts, makes his findings, and does all that is necessary to enable the court to reach a conclusion as to whether the person charged should stand trial or whether the case against him should be dropped. Having made his findings, the judge transmits the papers to the prosecutor for further action. The prosecutor can either abandon the matter if on the findings of the investigating judge the case appears not to be strong enough for conviction. If he requests trial, the court will rule on the request after having made a thorough study of the case. If it rules that the person should stand trial, trial will take place promptly. The trial court is composed either of a single judge or of three judges, in accordance with the seriousness of the offense charged; or in felonies, of three judges and usually of a jury of six, sitting together with the court as one unit. At trial, proof is offered by the prosecution, witnesses for prosecution and defense are examined, cross-examined and re-examined, and the accused is heard through his attorney and by himself. The trial court is required by law to study the case ex officio and not to rely only on the facts and law submitted by the parties. If the court is composed of three judges, or of three judges and a jury, a two-thirds majority of its members is usually required for conviction and a simple majority for the assessment of punishment. The final decision of the court is appealable as well as its intermediate rulings, usually within one week from the decision. If the appellate court disagrees with the trial court, it must render a new decision. It may remand the matter back to the trial court only when the judgment suffers from a defect (breach of the law) for which it should be quashed. In addition to an appeal, a judgment of the trial court may be quashed for breach of law by a proper cassation court. This remedy is, however, exceedingly rare.

It immediately appears that in the Continental proceeding there is no grand jury. The question whether the person charged should stand trial is answered by a court on the basis of a thorough, methodical investigation conducted by an independent investigating judge appointed for life. The proceedings of the grand jury are not only cumbersome, but in their result stand no comparison with the reasoned finding of the investigating judge and the ruling of a court. No wonder that grand juries were abolished even in England where they were originally set up.[159]

On the strength of a proper finding by the investigating judge, the public prosecutor is bound to prosecute the person charged with the offense appearing in the finding. Any agreement between prosecution and defense to drop a more serious charge in exchange for an undertaking to plead guilty to a lesser charge so familiar in some jurisdictions, is unheard of in both Continental Europe and in England. It would not only be unethical but in direct breach of the law and would expose all parties to prosecution. Since the circumstances of the case have been scientifically examined by the investigating judge laying thus the groundwork for trial, the trial can proceed smoothly and speedily. Also, since the investigating judge has screened the evidence and separated the admissible evidence from the inadmissible, no problems of admissibility of evidence are usually encountered at trial. Consequently, no dilatory tactics are available to the defense.

In rendering judgment, both judges and jurors vote on the facts of the case, there being no reason why the judges should not be allowed so to do, as they admittedly can form an opinion on the facts just like the jurors. And since the jury sits with the judges as one unit, no special instructions to the jury are necessary. The function of the jurors is thus of an increased importance as they are elevated to members of the court and sit as lay judges.

If the decision of the trial court is guilty, the only way open to the defense to contest it is an appeal. No motion of any kind (like a motion for a new trial) is entertainable. The appeal is disposed of speedily by the appellate court, and if the decision of the trial court is modified, the appellate court renders a new final judgment. Further appeal to the highest court in the country is available only in felonies and only for breach of the law.

The entire proceeding is therefore quite speedy, consonant with the well known principle of criminal law enforcement that speedy justice provides a considerable deterrent to crime, making it clear to prospective offenders that crime does not pay. Conversely, it is evident that if a system allows the criminal to engage the courts in a seemingly endless battle of motions, changes of site, new trials, etc., especially while the criminal is free on bail, it cannot be expected to produce a desirable deterrent to crime in the minds of likely offenders. In this connection it may safely be said that mere technicalities should not be allowed to fetter the system and give the criminal an undue advantage in criminal proceedings. Such technicalities should be discarded just as they were done away with in England and in the countries of Continental Europe. To discard these fetters on criminal procedure and to achieve suitable improvements, it is imperative to work toward such changes and modifications which would bring about a betterment of the existing system without surrendering any of the well established principles of liberty and personal freedom.

It should also be noted that any rights a person accused of having committed a crime might have with respect to fair treatment and fair trial, including the presumption of innocence until conviction, must be viewed in conjunction with the right of every person to his physical integrity and to that of his property. Also, the right of every person not to be the victim of crime should not be lost from sight. A fair and just criminal procedure must balance these interests and must pay due respect to the interests of the accused as well as to those of the victim and to those of society at large.

Conclusion

A comparison of some aspects of the American, English and Continental systems of criminal law and law enforcement reveals that the observations made by Roscoe Pound in his St. Paul address of 1906[160] have still not lost their persuasiveness. Granted that the judicial system and criminal procedure of the United States are derived from those of England, it may not be fruitless to have a look at the English and Continental systems as they stand today for possible suggestions. The English criminal law and procedure went through several periods of successful reforms both in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries which made it a modern, workable system. There are no grand juries; no excessive dilatory tactics are tolerated in the trial system; no repeated motions for a new trial or against the sentence are allowed; bail, probation and parole are confined to narrow limits; meaningful sentences are assessed; and habitual criminals are kept reasonably off the streets. A glance at the Continental system reveals suggestions for further innovations, like a vigorous system of crime investigation conducted by independent investigating judges, a system of smooth, speedy proceedings from arrest to conviction, juries only in felony cases of not more than six to nine jurors sitting usually with the court as lay judges.

It is inescapable that an improved judicial system would require a considerable increase in judicial personnel but it must be remembered that practically any meaningful improvement would have to begin with the appointment of additional judges to relieve the heavily overworked conditions presently prevailing in the administration of criminal law throughout the country. Although many aspects of the European system are clearly not readily transplantable, it is evident that some features of the English and Continental systems might be considered as suggestions for possible improvements.

International Comparative Criminal Law—Comparison of Asian Criminal Law With Proposed Federal Criminal Code

(By Chin Kim, College of Law, University of Illinois, Champaign, Ill.)

It is, indeed, my pleasure to have an opportunity to present my comments on the topic of international comparative criminal law—comparison of Asian criminal law with proposed Federal Criminal Code. In fulfilling this assigment, I have chosen the criminal law of four Asian countries, Republic of China,[1] Japan,[2] Republic of Korea[3] and Thailand,[4] because the law of these countries[5] has commanded a great deal of respect and attention.[6] Japan, especially, is highly relevant for my inquiry since the Japanese are currently attempting to revise their penal code.[7]

OMISSIONS (SECTIONS 301(2) AND 401(1)(b))

The final Report[8] lists omissions as one basis of liability for offenses, and makes a person an accomplice if he fails to make a proper effort to prevent a commission of a crime that he has a legal duty to prevent. Use of the term "legal" duty seems appropriate. This would certainly eliminate the possibility of assertion of morality or a principle of good faith as a basis of liability.

Some Japanese legal drafters were skeptical about the wisdom of inserting a provision dealing with actus reus by omission in their proposed penal code. This skepticism faded out as a strong argument was made that the insertion is necessary from the standpoint of nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege doctrine, and is also needed to lay out a guide line for the courts in handling this type of crime.[9] The Japanese proposed provision related to crimes committed by omission as it stands now is:[10]

"A person under a duty to prevent the occurrence of facts constituting a crime who intentionally fails to prevent their occurrence when he could have done so shall be dealt with as if he had caused such facts to occur through his own action."

When the original proposed provision was printed in the 1962 Preparatory Draft for the Revised Penal Code of Japan, it began with "A person under a legal duty. . . ."[11] But the word, "legal," was eliminated and the word, "intentionally," was stressed. The above draft adopted by the Special Committee on Criminal Law, the Legal System Deliberation Council, embraces two categories of actus reus by omission known as "crimes by genuine omission" (echtes Unterlaussungsdelikt) and "crimes by pseudo-omission" (unechtes Unterlaussungsdelikt); each roughly corresponds to the category of crime by "non-feasance" and "omission in the narrower sense" in Anglo-American law.[12]

KINDS OF CULPABILITY (SECTION 302)

The final Report defines culpability into four kinds: intentionally, knowingly, recklessly and negligently. This method of defining kinds of culpability differs from that of the Continental system which requires that mens rea be an essential element of a crime. All four Asian countries that we are primarily concerned with here subscribe to this Continental method[13] and the Chinese criminal code which concisely prescribes the mens rea may serve as an example. It reads:[14]

"1. An act is not punishable unless committed intentionally or negligently.

"2. A negligent act is punishable only if specifically so provided."

As it is illustrated in the Chinese criminal code, intent stands side by side with negligence; the latter is not included in the former and both are mental elements of crimes. Thus, in most criminal cases criminal intent at minimum negligence is required. In a typical homicide case in Japan,[15] for instance, criminal intent of an accused is to be ascertained to verify two mental elements: one cognitive, the other volitional.[16]

Two civilian efforts to define the subject related to section 302 of the Final Report are worth mentioning here. First, the German legal drafters in their German Draft Penal Code of E 1962 proposed to define such terms as "intention," "purpose and scienter" and "negligence and wantonness."[17] It is my feeling that this German draft intended to bring in the well-developed American legal concept of negligence. However, this German effort did not materialize in the final text in the revision of the 1969 code.[18] Second, the Japanese legal drafters are currently concerned about the question of culpability. The final draft adopted by the Criminal Law Special Committee, the Legal System Deliberation Council, indicates the Japanese adherence to the traditional Continental concept of mens rea. It reads: [19]

"Acts done without a mind to commit a crime are not punishable provided that this shall not apply where otherwise specially provided by law."

In the course of deliberation of this provision, "negligent acts shall be punished" was proposed to substitute "provided, that this shall not apply where otherwise specially provided by law." This proposal was rejected.[20] In this connection, it seems appropriate to briefly mention the Japanese effort to define crime aggravated by the result. Under Anglo-American legal practices, the felony-murder and misdemeanor-manslaughter doctrine is a form of absolute liability. But, in Japan, the death penalty or life imprisonment could be imposed on an original actor if a person dies as the result of robbery or rape. In this case, according to the prevailing view in Japan, such higher punishment cannot be imposed if these results were not foreseeable. In the course of deliberating this question, a prolonged debate ensued and inquires were directed to find a theoretical basis of the aggravated result. If a basis were to be found, the question was whether it should be in the negligence or in the foreseeability. The latter became the requirement.[21] As it stands before the general meeting of the Legal System Deliberation Council, the provision dealing with crime aggravated by results reads: [22]

"If aggravated punishment is prescribed on the basis of the result of a crime, but it was impossible to foresee such results, such aggravated punishment cannot be imposed."

It is highly commendable that the Commission undertook to define this complex area of criminal law. I do not have much comment on Secton 302; a few words will suffice. In view of the Civilian experiences, it is hard to conceive the term "recklessly" which is situated in an intermediary position in the structure of the kinds of culpability, especially in light of the Final Report which sets up the same test of "a gross deviation from acceptable standards of conduct" for both "recklessly" and "negligently". Needless to say, in distinguishing these two concepts, the court has to arrive at full comprehension and proof of the state of mind regarding the degrees of awareness in the actor. In a case of homicide, the court would have a less difficult task in proving the state of mind of the perpetrator, but it would be perplexing work for the court to draw the line between "recklessly" and "negligently" in proving the state of mind of actors involved in regulatory offenses.

ACCOMPLICES (SECTION 401)

Following the Continental tradition, criminal codes of four Asian countries [23] classify "parties to a crime" into three categories: Co-principals (acting), instigators (encouraging) and aiders (assisting). The Japanese draft on accomplices adopted by the Criminal Law Special Committee also follows this classification by allocating four relevant provisions. They are: [24]

Principals:

1. A person who himself commits a crime is a principal.
2. A person who accomplishes a criminal act by making use of another who is not punishable as a principal is also a principal.

Co-principals:

1. Two or more persons who join in the commission of a crime are all principals.
2. Where two or more persons conspire to commit a crime pursuant to their common design, the other conspirators are also principals.

Instigators:

1. A person who through his solicitation causes another to commit a crime is an instigator.
2. An instigator shall be treated as a principal.
3. A person who instigates an instigator shall receive the same treatment prescribed in two proceeding paragraphs.

Aiders:

1. A person who aids a principal is an aider.
2. Punishment of an aider shall be a reduced form of punishment prescribed for a principal.
3. A person who instigates an aider shall be treated as an aider.

Almost all proposed provisions reproduced above are familiar ones for those who are exposed to the civil law system. However, one provision which needs an explanation is paragraph 2 under Co-principals. This provision is an expression of the conspiratorial co-principal theory which has been developed since 1922 through a series of Japanese court decisions.[25] An author summarizes the position taken by the Japanese Supreme Court on this theory with the following words: [26]

"A recent decision of the Supreme Court seems to have ruled that it is necessary not only to prove the existence of a state of mental agreement but also to produce enough evidence to show the act of forming the conspiracy, including the time and place of formation. . . . The conspiratorial co-principal theory requires that the criminal activity progress beyond the simple overt act to a stage where actual harm is done to society before criminal liability attaches."

A perusal of subsections (1)(a) and (1)(b) of the Final Report in light of the Japanese proposed provisions on accomplices reveals that the distinction between the two subsections is blurred. If "he causes the other to engage in such conduct" under subsection (1)(a) is to cover "a person who through his solicitation causes another to commit a crime" under the Japanese provision and "he commands, induces, procures, or aids the other to commit it" under subsection (1)(b) is to deal with the "aiders" provision under the Japanese proposed draft, then the distinction between the two subsections seems to be somewhat clear. In a structural sense if the subsection (1)(a) is an instigators clause and subsection (1)(b) is an aiders clause, relevant articles of Thai criminal code are worth considering: "Whoever, whether by employment, compulsion, threat, hire, asking as favour or instigation, or by any other means, causes another person to commit any offense" [27] for subsection (1)(a) and "Whoever, by any means whatever, does any act to assist or facilitate the commission of an offense by any other person before or at the time of committing the offense, even though the offender does not know of such assistance or facilities," [28] for subsection (1)(b).

INTOXICATION (SECTION 502)

The Final Report offers two possible grounds for an affirmative defense based on either not self-induced or self-induced intoxication. The Thai Penal Code deals with this issue by providing a possible exemption from punishment on account of not self-induced intoxication. However, it specifically precludes the instances of preordained intoxication. It prescribes: [29]

"Section 66. Intoxication on account of taking liquor or any other intoxicant may not be raised as an excuse under Section 65, except where such intoxication is caused without the knowledge or against the will of the offender, and he has committed the offense at the time of not being able to appreciate the nature or illegality of his act or of not being able to control himself, he shall then be exempted from the punishment for such offense. But, if he is still partially able to appreciate the nature or illegality of his act, or is still partially able to control himself, the Court may inflict less punishment to any extent than that provided by the law for such offense."

How to punish a criminal act committed by a person while in a state of intoxication is one of the public concerns in Japan. Intoxication is often effective as a defense since it is not yet separated from insanity in the Japanese Criminal Law. This public concern was well reflected in the final draft submitted before the Japanese Legal System Deliberation Council. The draft adopted the doctrine of actio libera in causa to cover the problems arising from self-induced mental disorder.[30] Two proposed Japanese provisions relevant to this issue are: [31]

"Article 15. Responsible Capacity

"1. Acts committed by a person who, as a result of mental disorder, lacks capacity to discriminate as to the propriety of his conduct or to act according to such discrimination are not punishable.

"2. Punishment for acts of a person whose capacity as set out in paragraph 1 is markedly diminished as the result of mental disorder may be reduced.

"Article 16. Self-Induced Mental Disorder

"1. The provisions of the preceding article shall not apply to a person who intentionally induces in himself a state of mental disorder and thereby brings about the facts constituting such crime.

"2. The preceding paragraph shall apply to a person if he negligently induces in himself a state of mental disorder and thereby brings about the facts constituting such crime."

By setting up two categories of intentionally and negligently self-induced mental disorders, the Japanese draft intends to treat the issue of non self-induced and self-induced intoxication systematically within the framework of the mens rea concept. In other words, it attempts to cover this issue based on the criminal responsibility principle. As it was stated in the section dealing with kinds of culpability, this question of non self-ordained and self-ordained intoxication well illustrates different approaches to the complex issue of culpability taken by the Final Report and the Japanese code, which is based on the civil law method. However, it is relevant in this connection to raise two issues which do not offer an easy solution. First, how to determine when the commission of the crime or the substantial step to commit the crime started; and second, how to verify and determine the mistakes which occurred while the offender was in non self-induced or self-induced mental disorder prior to or during the course of committing the crime.

MISTAKE OF LAW (SECTION 609)

The traditional rule, Ignorantia facti excusat, ignorantia legis neminem excusat, was modified by the German court in 1952 to the effect that the mistake of law could constitute a defense.[32] The mistake of law as a defense seems to have become a settled matter throughout the civil law countries since 1952. The Final Report has specified four grounds under which mistake of law could be used as an affirmative defense. This approach of specifying grounds is quite contrasting to the one taken by four Asian countries, as the subsequent outline will reveal. In spelling out the contents of the provision covering the mistake of law issue, penal codes of these countries use the term "law" as an indication of "positive law" in a broader sense, definitely precluding "natural law." In the sense that the Final Report specifies the contents of "law" which could enlighten code interpreters in the civil law countries, the Final Report's approach seems to be sound.

The Chinese Criminal Code prescribes that:[33]

"Ignorance of law shall not discharge a person from criminal liability. Provided, that the punishment may be reduced according to the nature and circumstances of the case. If, however, the offender honestly believed that his act is permissible by the law and can give a good reason for his belief, the punishment may be remitted."

The Chinese provision subscribes to Ignorantia facti excusat, ignorantia legis neminem excusat. However, it opens the way for reduction of the penalty for those whose ignorance of law deserves a lesser punishment considering the nature or circumstances of the case. It also opens the avenue for remitting altogether the penalty of those whose honest belief sufficiently excuses them. The Korean Penal Code prescribes the test of the mistake of law as follows: "Where a person commits a crime in the belief that his conduct does not constitute a crime under existing law, he shall not be punishable provided that his mistake is based on reasonable grounds."[34] The Thai Penal Code also provides a provision similar to those found in the Chinese and Korean penal codes. It prescribes that:[35]

"Ignorance of law shall not excuse any person from criminal liability. But, if the Court is of opinion that, according to the nature and circumstances, the offender may not have known that the law has provided such act to be an offense, the Court may allow him to produce evidence before it, and if the Court believes that the doer does not know that the law has so provided, the Court may inflict less punishment to any extent than that provided by the law for such offense."

The final draft on mistake of law adopted by the Special Committee on Criminal Law, the Japanese Legal System Deliberation Council, reads as follows:[36]

Ignorance or mistake of law

"1. Ignorance of law shall not mean the absence of intent, provided that penalty may be reduced in light of the circumstances.

"2. A person who acts without knowing that his acts are not permitted by law shall not be punished, if there is adequate reason for his ignorance."

The first paragraph is a new version of the article 38, III, of the present code. The second paragraph is to provide a guide line for the courts in determining the degree of the consciousness of the illegality. Whether there is "an adequate reason" or not will be the subject of an interpretation.[37] In the course of deliberating drafts on mistake of law in the Special Committee on Criminal Law, there was a proposal to deal with a negligent mistake of law. It proposed that the actor should be punishable for crime by negligence if negligent commission constitutes a crime. It was rejected.[38]

CRIMINAL ATTEMPT (SECTION 1001)

Japanese legal drafters allocate three articles to treat the subject of criminal attempt. As they stand now before the Legal System Deliberation Council, these proposed articles read:[39]

"Attempt:

"1. A person who has commenced but failed to complete the commission of a crime commits an attempt.

"2. An attempt is punishable only when specifically so provided.

"3. Punishment of an attempt may be reduced.

"Offense interrupted by actor:

"1. A person who voluntarily interrupts his commission of a crime or prevents his acts from taking effect shall have his punishment reduced or remitted.

"2. The same is also true in cases where the results are not produced because of external circumstances, if the perpetrator made earnest efforts to prevent his acts from taking effect.

"Impossible offense:

"1. An act which cannot possibly by its nature produce the results intended is not punishable as an attempt."

In the first proposed Japanese article quoted above, "commenced in the execution" test may correspond to "a substantial step" test which the Final Report adopted. On this issue, the Thai criminal code is somewhat elaborate. It reads:[40]

"Whoever commences to commit an offense, but does not carry it through, or carries it through but does not achieve its end, is said to attempt to commit an offense."

On the subject of impossible offense (sometimes known as impossible attempt or inept attempt), the Final Report states that "factual or legal impossibility of committing the crime is not a defense if the crime could have been committed had the attendant circumstances been as the actor believed them to be." The position taken by the Final Report is somewhat different from that of the Japanese draft. However, the Thai Code contains an article which would be closer to the position of the Final Report. It reads:[41]

"Whoever does any act by aiming at the effect which the law provides as an offense shall, if his doing of the act is certainly incapable of achieving its end on account of the factors employed in the doing, or on account of the object aimed at, be deemed to attempt to commit an offense, and shall be inflicted with the punishment of not more than one half of the punishment provided by the law for such offense."

Offense Interrupted by Actor as it was drafted by the Japanese specialists does not appear in the Final Report in any form. Perhaps the Commission has considered that in principle, voluntary desistence from crime is not a ground for mitigating punishment in the Anglo-American law.[42] In the Korean criminal code, a mitigating factor plays a role in cases of desistence from a criminal conduct, of prevention of its completion,[43] of self-denunciation of a criminal conduct or of its voluntary confession.[44]

PERSISTENT MISDEMEANANTS (SECTION 3003)

The Final Report's approach to this issue is practical since it conceives that backsliding thieves, drug addicts, and gamblers are a vexing social problem in a highly industrialized and urbanized society. As in other civil law countries, the existing penal codes of four Asian countries do not cover the issue of habitual misdemeanants.[45] However, the Japanese legal drafters are quick to notice this important social issue of how to control persistent petty theft and repeated assault and battery beside traditional recidivist murders and arsonists.[46] For this reason, it seems appropriate for my purpose to reproduce relevant Japanese proposed provisions concerning the recidivism.

The final draft on recidivism adopted by the Special Committee on Criminal Law, the Japanese legal System Deliberation Council, is as follows: [47]

"CHAPTER 7 RECIDIVISM

"Article 59 Recidivism

"1. A recidivist is a person who, within five years after he has been sentenced by a finally binding adjudication to confinement or a heavier punishment, commits another crime for which imprisonment or confinement for a limited term is to be imposed.

"2. The preceding paragraph shall apply to a person who was sentenced to confinement or a heavier punishment, and was suspended the execution of his sentence, commits another crime, during the period of suspension, for which imprisonment or confinement for a limited term is to be imposed.

"Article 60 Increase in punishment

"Sentence imposed on a recidivist may exceed the maximum term of punishment prescribed for his crime. In such case the maximum term shall be twice the maximum otherwise prescribed.

"Article 61 Habitual recidivism

"An habitual recidivist is an offender who has committed another crime after having been earlier sentenced to imprisonment for six months or more as a recidivist, and is to be punished again as a recidivist by a limited term of imprisonment, and whom the court finds to be an habitual offender.

"Article 62 Imposition of indeterminate sentence

"1. An indeterminate sentence may be imposed upon an habitual recidivist.

"2. An indeterminate sentence may be imposed in a case of accumulative crimes, in which one crime carries an indeterminate sentence and the other does not, only when the crime for which an indeterminate sentence can be imposed controls under Article 64.

"3. An indeterminate sentence pronounced pursuant to Paragraph 1 shall prescribe maximum and minimum terms within the limits, (otherwise authorized by law), provided that the minimum term of less than one year shall be considered as one year."

It was the feeling of the Japanese legal drafters that the criminal acts of habitual recidivists could no longer be deterred only by the mere pronouncement of authoritative law with a method of increasing punishment. Modern therapeutic devices and preventive measures should be utilized in coping with this type of repeated crimes. To achieve the overriding objective of correction of repeated misdemeanants, Japanese specialists recommended the adoption of the system of indeterminate sentencing, by vesting the courts with a discretionary power in pronouncing such a sentence and increase in punishment.[48]

As the translated version of the latest proposal indicates, the Japanese are to deal with habitual recidivism as a part of recidivism. Since the former and the latter are closely related each other by nature, the Japanese approach to this issue deserves giving attention to the Final Report which treats persistent misdemeanants and persistent felons under different chapters. As to the criterion of deciding persistent misdemeanant, both American and Japanese proposals follow the third conviction test against the defendant and also with the court's duty to give a reason that a person is a habitual recidivist. However, the American requirement of "the third conviction against the defendant within five years" test under Section 3003(1) seems clear, while the Japanese counterpart may run into a difficulty in figuring out the third conviction against the defendant within how many years. As to the issue of computation of prior crimes, the Japanese wording seems to be better with "sentenced by a finally binding adjudication," while the U.S. version leaves out the finalized adjudication of a sentence. Japanese specialists are continuously concerned about two issues which may enlighten us.[49] First, in a case of accumulated crimes,[50] an indeterminate sentence should be imposed only if the punishment prescribed for the most serious crime contains recognizable habitual recidivism. This proposal is an outcome of arguments that all the crimes committed by an offender may not be considered of a habitual nature. Second, the Japanese propose that the minimum term of less than one year should be treated as one year. This figure of one year is derived from a persuasive opinion that the maximization of correctional treatment for the habitual recidivists need at least be of this duration.

PROVISIONAL CHAPTER 36 SENTENCE OF DEATH OR LIFE IMPRISONMENT

It is believed that in the Final Report, abolition of the death penalty is recommended with life imprisonment as the maximum penalty for treason and intentional murder. This recommendation is highly commendable in view of a strong movement for abolition of the death penalty that is now developing throughout the world. This movement seemed to gain ground when Great Britain recently abolished the death penalty for cases involving murder. However, the Final Report's position on the death penalty issue is far from the final settlement. This issue will draw public attention until the final outcome of the bill on the Federal Criminal Code comes out.

In light of the importance of the death penalty issue, it will be worth my while to outline the gist of the debate on this issue in the Special Committee on Criminal law, the Japanese Legal System Deliberation Council.

The 1961 Japanese draft adopted the two following articles to cover the issue of death penalty: [51]

"Article 32. Kinds of punishment

"Punishments are of the following kinds:
"1. Death;
"2. Imprisonment;
"3. Confinement;
"4. Fine;
"5. Penal detention;
"6. Minor fine.

"Article 34. Death penalty

"1. The death penalty shall be inflicted by hanging.
"2. A person sentenced to death shall be incarcerated in a penal institution until his execution."

These two proposed provisions drew criticism from legal drafters who advocated the abolition of the death penalty during the course of deliberation of drafts in the Special Committee on Criminal Law. The original action taken by the Committee was to adopt the two provisions proposed by the 1961 Draft, taking into consideration the national sentiment and the current situation of crimes.[52] However, the Second Subcommittee, whose primary responsibility is to handle questions related to punishment, took a stand that even if the death penalty is to be maintained, its sentence and execution should be minimized. Thus, the subcommittee studied various means to achieve this goal. Various means include 1. to place a restriction on sentencing the death penalty involving murder; 2. to require a psychiatric test for death penalty cases; 3. to require unanimous decision of judges in sentencing the death penalty; 4. to adopt the system of postponed execution or suspended execution of the death penalty; and 5. to utilize clemency (reduced sentence) for death penalty cases.[53] The proposal to adopt the system of postponed execution or the suspended execution of the death penalty became the subject of serious discussion by the subcommittee. From this discussion, a draft was prepared to promote this system for the Special Committee on Criminal Law. It consisted of three measures.[54]

"1. In sentencing the death penalty, the court can render a sentence with the postponed execution of death penalty for five years if it can recognize the circumstance which would warrant the reservation of the execution of its penalty, taking into consideration the objective of the general standard concerning the application of punishment. A person whose execution of death penalty is postponed is to be detained in a penal institution to receive correctional treatments.

"2. When the period of postponed execution of death penalty runs out, the court, upon receipt of opinions of Deliberation Committee on Death Penalty, can change the death penalty to life imprisonment or confinement unless there is a need for the execution of the death penalty.

"3. Any offender whose death penalty is reduced to life imprisonment is not entitled to ask for a parole until after the expiration of 20 years from the date of the sentence of the death penalty."

The proposed system of the postponed execution of the death penalty was rejected in the main committee.[55] As it stands now in the Japanese code revision project, the death penalty is to be maintained.

The arguments developed both pro and con on the proposed creation of the system of postponed execution of the death penalty in the revision of the Japanese penal code offer valuable information on the issue of the death penalty. Perhaps, a summary of these arguments would serve our purpose.[56]

Advocates for the establishment of the system of the postponed execution of the death penalty presented a number of arguments. First, the current world-wide movement to either abolish or limit the death penalty has humanitarian meaning and considers one leading objective of punishment as the rehabilitation of offenders. The Japanese legal drafters should carefully consider this world trend. Second, there are some cases where actually the execution of the death penalty was not necessary because of the mental status of the offender, motive of the criminal act, offender's attitude after the commission of the crime and the dangerousness of the offender in the future. Third, by prescribing the death penalty provision in the code, and by delegating a discretionary power to the judges, the deterrent effect which the death penalty purported to have can be maximized. Fourth, based on the current figure that less than one percent of the offenders falling into the category of the death penalty have actually received the death sentence, further check on the execution of the death penalty would not decrease the deterrent effect of the death penalty. Fifth, clemency for the offenders who received the death penalty is seldom extended and is also not expected to be utilized in the future. Sixth, public opinion which originally supported the maintenance of the death penalty began to show a favorable reaction in adopting the system of the postponed execution of the death penalty.

Opponents to the establishment of the system of the postponed execution of the death penalty developed extensive arguments. First, at the present time, the courts render discreet death sentences and once the death sentence is rendered, there is definitely sound reason for it. Second, courts are currently applying a strict standard in rendering the death sentences and yet to promote a measure of not to execute the death penalty for cases which really warrant such penalty, would substantially decrease the deterrent power of the death penalty. Furthermore, if the majority of persons who received the death penalty could receive the postponed execution of the death penalty, then the institution of the death penalty will lose its purpose. Third, suppose the limited application of the death penalty is desirable. This could be achieved through actual trial practices. Fourth, if there is any special circumstance which warrants the postponement of the execution of the death penalty for an offender who deserves such postponement, a reduced penalty to life imprisonment by clemency should be designed. Fifth, it is, indeed, cruel, opponents argue, for an offender to wait for another five years to find out his destiny, The creation of the waiting period is inhuman. Sixth, when the judgment is to be made after the expiration of the five year waiting period to determine if the execution of the death penalty is necessary, records on the behavior of the offender during the past five years could become the basis of this judgment, but the five years are not enough to accurately ascertain the state of mind of the offender.

The basic idea of the postponed execution of the death penalty actually originated from the People's Republic of China where this idea has been in practice since 1951.[57] In mainland China today, the execution of all death penalty cases are postponed for two years from the date of official sentence. When the waiting period of two years expires, the sentence is to be changed into either an indefinite term of imprisonment, a definite term of imprisonment or the execution of the death. The change of the sentence is based on the report prepared by an agency. Historical records indicate that this system of the postponed execution of the death penalty was widely utilized in the Ming and Tsing dynasties through the institutions known as Chan Chien hou and Chiou Chien hou. When the death sentence was rendered by the magistrate, the offender usually had one to three years of waiting period, depending on the gravity of the criminal act committed, before the execution of the actual sentence which usually meant hard labor for life or enlistment in the troops serving in the frontier area.[58]

CONCLUDING REMARK

In concluding, I would like to compliment the work of the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws which organized scattered federal statutes, court decisions, and common law doctrines, and incorporated them into an American federal Criminal jurisprudence. The Commission also carried out well the task of establishing principles and prescriptions for acts deserving punishment with the view toward protecting society and individuals and, at the same time, provided punishments in proportion to the gravity of these acts. The Final Report in the proposed format would certainly offer better service for the practitioners and the general public in the disemination of written law.

In the foregoing statement, I have made comments on the Final Report from the comparative perspective of the criminal codes of the Republic of China, Japan, Republic of Korea, and Thailand with specific reference to the current Japanese attempt to revise their penal code. The four countries were exposed earlier to the T'ang Code and Hindu Manu Code and lately to the Continental code system. For this reason, their experience would bring useful information for the improvement of the Final Report. A perusal of the Final Report leaves a strong impression that the traditional notion of punishment as the deterrence to criminal acts is no longer a principally dominant policy, but the major emphasis is on rehabilitation of offenders based on humanitarian belief and societal responsibility. There is an old Oriental saying that "the aim of punishment is to end the punishment." In this sense, the Final Report had made an advance toward this goal.

6. See Appendix A. China, Japan and Thailand, during the later part of the 19th and early 20th centuries, have all faced a thorny question of how to abolish unequal treaties which were imposed earlier by the Western military powers. These treaties contained provisions for extraterritoriality which permitted Western powers to apply their own laws to their own nationals on the soil of China, Japan and Thailand. Needless to say, extraterritorial rights exercised by foreigners were an infringement of sovereignty and an affront to national pride. The best way left for these countries to eliminate unequal treaties was to introduce a Western oriented legal system in order to achieve quickly the respectability expected of a civilized nation as regards legal rules in the western world. The introduction of a foreign legal system was carried out rapidly and en masse without a well-coordinated effort to incorporate new ideas, doctrines and institutions into the then existing means of social control which had a long historical background. During the course of importing a foreign legal system, all four countries decided to follow the civil law system instead of common law. Their basic approach in achieving justice is still based on the civilian method although there has been a noticeable introduction of Anglo-American legal ideas, doctrines and institutions, especially since World War II. Their penal codes are profoundly influenced by the Franco-Germanic codes.

If the offence is not committed, whether it be that the employed person does not consent to commit, or has not yet committed, or on account of any other reason, the person employing shall be liable to only one third of the punishment provided for such offence."
28. Section 86 reads: "Whoever, by any means whatever, does any act to assist or facilitates, is said to be a supporter to such offence, and shall be liable to two thirds of committing the offence, even though the offender does not know of such assistance or facilitates, is said to be a supporter to such offence, and shall be liable to two thirds of the punishment provided for such offence."
29. Section 66, Thai Penal Code. Section 65 reads: Whenever any person commits an offence at the time of not being able to appreciate the nature or illegality of his act or of not being able to control himself on account of defective mind, mental disease or mental infirmity, such person shall not be punished for such offence. But, if the offender is still partially able to appreciate the nature or illegality of his act, or is still partially able to control himself, he shall be punished for such offence, but the Court may inflict less punishment to any extent than that provided by the law for such offence.

When accumulative crimes, one or more of which are punishable by confinement or a heavier punishment, are to be jointly adjudicated, only the punishment prescribed for the most serious crimes shall be utilized in sentencing, provided, however, that the court shall not impose a sentence lighter than the minimum punishment prescribed for any of the other crimes. 2. The court may also impose cumulatively a fine or minor fine in cases falling within paragraph 1. As to the kinds of punishment, see infra note 51. A final draft adopted by the Japanese Special Committee on Criminal Law spells out imprisonment and confinement. Article 35. Imprisonment. 1. Imprisonment shall be either for life or for a limited term; such limited term shall be not less than three months nor more than 15 years. 2. Imprisonment is incarceration in a penal institution. 3. A person who was sentenced for an imprisonment is imposed with work and with other necessary treatment for the correction. Article 36. Confinement. 1. Confinement shall be either for life or for a limited term; such limited term shall be not less than three months nor more than 15 years. 2. Confinement is incarceration in a penal institution. 3. A person who was sentenced for a confinement may perform work upon petition and shall receive other necessary treatment for the correction.

Appendix A.—Traditional Chinese Criminal Law and Its Radiation Into Japan and Korea

The penal system of traditional China was a mesh between the moral precepts of Confucianism [1] and the framework of a set of laws with physical sanctions created by the legalists of the Ch'in dynasty (ca. 481–221 B.C.).[2] An early approach toward grouping and prescribing penal provisions emerged about 2255 B.C.[3] It was not, however, until the T'ang dynasty (ca. 618 A.D.) that a more complete code was drawn up, called "T'ang Lu Su Yi" meaning "Annotated Code of the T'ang Dynasty." [4] This code consisted of twelve parts, half of which covered criminal law and procedure. The T'ang code was not only applied in China but it was also introduced in Japan, Korea and Vietnam.[5] Its impact on the social institutions of these three countries is still felt. The expanded version of the T'ang code was "Ta Tsing Leu Lee" which contained twenty-eight parts, eleven of which were related to criminal law and procedure.[6] "Ta Tsing Leu Lee", the last penal code of traditional China, had an extensive list of crimes and punishments with the inclusion of over eight hundred capital offenses.[7]

Confucianism was a significant force in shaping the criminal law of traditional China. Basic to maintenance of the family according to Confucius was proper respect and reverence to elders. The criminal law of China sought to enforce this proper respect by punitive sanctions. A person who caused his parent's death, directly or indirectly, intentionally or accidentally, was liable to capital punishment.[8] If an offspring directly and intentionally killed a parent, he received the most severe capital punishment—being sliced to pieces. Other aspects of the social relationships outlined by the Confucian "five relations" received extensive attention in the "Ta Tsing Leu Lee." [9] Punishments for violations of rules to protect the father, sovereign, elder, brother, and friend were particularly severe. Punishment in traditional Chinese law "was the dosed retribution for disruption of the natural order. The severity of the punishment was supposed to correspond to the seriousness of the disturbance of the natural harmony." [10] This accounts for the gradation of punishment for the offenses against the parents. Although intentional and accidental causing of death were both subject to capital punishment, a sentence of being sliced to pieces for the intentional act indicated that this was a greater disruption of natural harmony than an accidental act, which carried a sentence of decapitation.[11]

The Western oriented penal code as a means of social control is not functioning fully in the Republic of China, Japan and the Republic of Korea where such social norms as the family, community, moral precepts and religious beliefs are also functioning. This seems to be true in religious Thailand where Hindu jurisprudence, the ancient Manu code, still influences the social institutions. Legal norms as expressed in Japan in its penal code imported from the West are still partially an oblique. An author's observation that "even a cursory glance that a large number of acts, particularly those involving sexual crimes and crimes against the family, fall outside the bounds of criminality in Japan although they are rather widely punished in Europe and the United States," describes this discrepancy between the law on the book and the law in action.[12]

In terms of layman participation in the administration of justice, the jury system is believed to be an ideal institution. However, the institution of jury was introduced in Japan, but defunctioned.[13] One of the reasons is that the promotion of a jury system would be the cause of hatred or strife among neighbors or friends and very few Japanese accused of crimes wished to be judged by their neighbors. The judgment by neighbors would certainly create a greater disruption of natural harmony.[14]

An illustration of resilient tradition which is somewhat alien to the strict individualistic morality of Christianity is to be found in the patricide clause which is prescribed in the penal code of three East Asian countries.[15] Different penalties are assessed for physical assaults resulting in death against a lineal ascendant than are assesses for the same offense against all others. The constitutionality of this patricide clause was tested by involving the "all of the people are equal under the law" clause of the Japanese Constitution before the Japanese Supreme Court in 1950. This case is known as the Fukuoka patricide case, and was examined in light of the new rights granted in the 1947 Constitution. By sanctioning the traditional roles of filial piety, and the article 205, the Criminal Code, as a reasonable classification based on the character of the offender, the Court ruled with the following words:[16]

". . . the original judgment argues that the affection between parents and children is not a matter to be provided by law and there is no reasonable ground to provide for discrimination by law about the matters relating to relatives, though such matters might be considered in weighing penalties in individual cases. But, if emphasizing the filial morals towards parents is feudalist and anti-democratic and accordingly any law based thereon is unconstitutional as the original judgment concludes, we must say it is also unconstitutional to consider such filial morals as one of extenuating circumstances when weighing penalties in order to render a judgment. That is to say, if such circumstances can be considered constitutionally, we must say it is not unconstitutional to go a step further and stipulate it in the form of law."

Another illustration of resilient tradition is a typical oriental way known as "saving face" which is still preserved in the legal practice. "Saving face" is difficult to define, but central to the existence of most Asians, it is a confused mixture of dignity, pride, self-respect. It is concerned more with the form than the substance of life. Japanese courts, for instance, have the authority to restore the reputation of the injured party along with awarding monetary damages, which includes an explanation that the added remedy of restoration of reputation is awarded at the behest of the sufferer and is for the purposes of rehabilitation. The means of restoration of the reputation of the sufferer is accomplished in one of two ways, either a verbal apology by the wrongdoer in open court or a letter of apology printed in a newspaper.[17] The Japanese seems to be putting more emphasis on the relationship of the injured party with his peer group by allowing such a remedy in that it allows his peer group to be fully informed and to have knowledge of his exonoration of any wrongdoing and thus allows for the unjustly accused to be reintegrated back into society.

With the growth of industry and the cities, urbanization is in progress in Taiwan, Japan, Korea and Thailand as elsewhere. Thus, traditional family and community ties are loosened and individualism is being advanced. In this process, law is no longer a social force insuring that individuals do not upset the natural harmony in the society. As a result, the role of Western oriented criminal law as an instrument of social control will become less moralistic and more functional and also more pervasive.

Footnotes

[1] As the basis of human life, Confucianism consists of five principles. They are loyalty to the King, filian respect for one's parents, harmony of husband and wife, respect for elders, and true friendship. Confucius taught that the whole duty of man consisted in preserving the right relationship towards his fellow man. Its results were to produce cultured and urbane agnostics with a stoic tendency and a great insistence on the repression of all emotions. The outstanding contrast between Western political thought and Confucianism is the Western concept of the supremacy of law and the Confucian concept of a good ruler. While Western political thought culminates in the sovereign law-making body, representative of public opinion, Confucianism attains its richest fruition in the wise, virtuous, and just ruler. Confucious maintained that the rule of virtue is above the rule of law. The system of legal justice, however, is necessary to preserve social order in the present age of practical politics so long as humans can not be regulated voluntarily by the teaching of virtue and rectitudes as Confucious envisioned.

Appendix B.—Current Attempt to Revise the Japanese Penal Code

In 1956, the Ministry of Justice of Japan resumed its pre-war project for the complete revision of the penal code, and "the Preparatory Commission for the Revision of the Penal Code (Keiho Kaisei Jumbikai)" was organized for this purpose. The Commission worked for over five years and completed its task in 1961 by publishing its final work entitled "A Preparatory Draft for the Revised Penal Code of Japan." [1]

The preparatory draft of 1961 preserves basic propositions underlying the articles of the Franco-Germanic oriented present penal code which was adopted in 1907 [2] and went through some changes in 1947.[3] The draft consists of two parts, that dealing primarily with general problems common to all crimes (general provisions) and that defining specific crimes and prescribing their punishment (specific crimes). The part dealing with specific crimes is arranged in a comparatively logical and systematic order in accordance with the interest protected, i.e., whether the deed is directed against the community at large and the state, or whether it is directed against the individual.[4]

In May 1963, the Minister of Justice, in light of 1961 draft, inquired the Legal System Deliberation Council, a government subsidized organ, "to investigate whether or not an overall revision of the penal code is necessary; and when the Council finds such a revision necessary, "to make a draft on the revision and present it to the Minister of Justice." [5] Pursuant to the Minister's inquiry, the Council established the Special Committee on Criminal Law which commenced its work in September 1963 by creating five sub-committees. Their primary assignments are: the first sub-committee is to deal with general requisites of crimes; the second, punishment; the third, security measures; the fourth, crimes related to the state and the society; and the fifth, crimes related to the individual.[6] By the end of 1969, each subcommittee completed its first draft which became the basic material for the deliberation of the parent committee. Most of the basic issues embodied in the first draft of each subcommittee were derived from the "A Preparatory Draft for the Revised Penal Code of Japan." Meanwhile the parent committee examined the first draft and completed its deliberation in February 1970. Taking into consideration the views presented and new issues raised during the course of deliberation in the main committee, the subcommittees began working on their second draft which were completed by March 1971. When the Special Committee on Criminal Law finishes its deliberation on the second draft, the final draft will be submitted to the general meeting of the Legal System Deliberation Council which will confine its deliberation to the basic issues. Therefore, the final decision of the Council is expected soon.[7] The final draft of the Council may become the government proposed bill on the revision of the penal code and the Diet is to pass its judgment on it. Whether the Japanese cabinet will accept the draft on the revision of the penal code proposed by the Legal System Deliberation Council remains to be seen since a younger generation of criminal law scholars has began to criticize the now almost complete Council's draft on ideological grounds.[8]

By observing the progress of the work within the Special Committee on Criminal Law, Legal System Deliberation Council, the main direction of the overall revision of the Japanese penal code can be ascertained. From the standpoint of nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege, efforts are made to strictly define the component elements of crimes. The text of the draft is to be written in easily readable literal style for the general public. Specific provisions are written in to spell out the general principles, but are kept within a limit so as not to deter the development of court decisions and academic theories. New provisions are created to cover the new types of crime which emerged out of the changing social conditions. Mala per se crimes which are currently controlled by way of special legislation are incorporated into the draft. In view of the development of the ideas related to the penological policy and therapeutic measures for crimes, the correctional and rehabilitative functions of the criminal law are rationalized. Throughout the work of drafting, a continuous attempt has been made to maintain a proper balance between theory and practice.[9]

As stated earlier, proposed changes are mostly derived from the 1961 draft, but some deviations are noticeable. From the point of improving the treatment of offenders, the contents and terms of Freiheitsstrafe (penal servitude) were re-examined. Security measures went through a substantial revision. Such proposals made by 1961 draft as application of fines, order to reparation and the term of parole were rejected. Furthermore, revision, deletion and addition to the special crimes proposed by the 1961 draft were made.[10]

Hon JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: In response to your letter of February 3, 1972, I have the honor to submit my observations to some of the questions included in it.

I remain, Dear Senator,
Sincerely yours,

KAZIMIERZ GRZYBOWSKI,
Professor of Law and Political Science.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE DRAFT FEDERAL CRIMINAL CODE TITLE 18 U.S. CODE

(1) The division of the Code into three parts (General Provisions, Sentencing and Specific Provisions) is the result of the effort to combine in one piece of legislation both the substantive criminal law in its most important aspects, as well as that part of the adjective criminal law (sentencing) which is most closely related to the application of the substantive criminal law. Hence three parts, of which sentencing is a part of the criminal adjective law. In effect, the Draft is organized in a manner which conforms to the overall practice of foreign criminal substantive codes, namely the general part which established general principles of criminal administration of justice and of penal policy and the catalog of federal offenses according to their various classes.

The review of the modern codes beginning with those which were enacted in the interwar period demonstrates that this method is uniformly followed by modern legislators. The most recent group of the European Codes (codes enacted by the union republics of the Soviet Union) also follow a bipartite division.

(2) The Draft of the Code compares favorably with other modern criminal codes also as regards the legislative technique. Its provisions are succinct, precise and to the point. It differs, however, from other pieces of modern criminal legislation by great numbers of blank sections, to leave room for the incorporation of future additions to the code, without distorting its organization of cohesion.

The question arises to what extent incorporation of the later statutes into the code is necessary. Perhaps in this country, in view of the fact that for the first federal courts are to receive a code in which basic principles of the administration of justice, of the judicial process and of the penal policy are systematically stated this is a proper thing to do. In European countries such a method is not necessary, because it is always understood that all criminal statutes are to be applied with reference to the general provisions of the criminal code, which makes the incorporation unnecessary. In the Soviet Union where the practice is to incorporate new statutes into the code, new criminal legislation, enacted in order to respond to an emergency situation (usually) distorts the code and its organization. One may avoid the distortion should the judiciary be trained in the conviction that the general part of the criminal code is a codification of due process of law in criminal law, and that it applies to later statutes as well. In that case a simple statement in the general part of the draft to that effect would take care of that problem. Otherwise, I think that the practice of incorporation may be necessary, and reserving a number of sections for future statures may be a reasonable precaution.

(3) Modern criminal law is based on the proposition that the purpose of punishment is primarily to correct and only in exceptional cases to eliminate. As a consequence, liability to punishment, as well as its type and severity, are related to the form and nature of subjective guilt, which modern criminologists consider the surest guide to the personality of the offender. Absolute liability (objective criteria of responsibility) is little known to the European criminal law (except in special laws introduced by the totalitarian regimes). The commission of a punishable act requires intent, in its various forms, or negligence. As a rule, a punishable act requires the presence of intent in order to determine culpability. If the offender was negligent, he is liable to punishment if the law expressly provided for it. So for instance, article 19 of the Danish Criminal Code (1930) stated: "As regards the offenses dealt with in this act, acts which have been committed through negligence on the part of the perpetrator shall not be punished except when expressly provided for." Another example is the Norwegian Criminal Code of 1902 which stated the same principle in a somewhat different manner (article 40): "Whoever acts without a malicious forethought is not subject to punitive provisions of the present statute, unless it is expressly provided for, or undoubtedly follows that the omission is punishable." The Italian pre-fascist code also stated (article 45) that a person is not subject to punishment if he did not intend (non abbia voluto) the result which constitutes a criminal act, unless the law provides otherwise."

The Greek Criminal Code of 1952 (one of the most modern pieces of legislation) which included in its provisions a short theoretcial treatise dealing with various aspects of guilt and forms of criminal acts, introduced a small addition to the generally accepted limitation of criminal responsibility for acts considered punishable but committed without direct intent. Article 15 of this Code States: "When the law requires that a specific consequence should occur as an element of a criminal act, the non-prevention of that consequence shall stand for causation only when the offender was under special duty to prevent that consequence."

In general historical perspective it may be stated that as legislative techniques developed types of guilt were related to the classificatioon of offenses. Crimes and misdemeanors as a rule require intent. In expressly provided circumstances, misdemeanor may be declared punishable without intent but through negligence, while petty offenses (police offenses) are liable to punishment without regard for the type of guilt (absolute responsibility) except when the law provides otherwise.

A full statement of the various forms of guilt seems to have been included for the first time in the Russian (imperial) Code of 1903, and its classification has become almost a rule in modern codes. (Yugoslav, 1927) and Polish Codes (1932) have repeated it almost without change. According to the formula of the 1903 Russian Code, which contains all four forms of guilt, an offense should be considered intentional not only when the offender desired its commission but when he is aware of the possibliity of the result (knowingly) which constitutes the criminal nature of the act. An offense is committed by negligence not only when the offender failed to foresee it, although he could or should have foreseen it, but also when, having foreseen the possibility of the result, he lightminded supposed that could present its occurrence (negligence and recklessness).

Provisions of the Italian Code of 1930 (article 42) represent another type of formulation of the same set of ideas: "No one may be punished for an act or omission deemed by the law to be an offense, unless he has committed it with criminal intent, except in cases of transferred intent (knowingly) or crimes without criminal intent, which are expressly provided for in the law. The law determines cases for which the offender is accountable as a consequence of his act of commission or omission. In regard to contravention (petty or police offense) each person is answerable for his knowing and willful act or omission, whether it be with or without intent."

Intent as a basis for the determination of innocence appears only in the form of various circumstances which excuse the commission of an otherwise criminal act, self defense, emergency, or which will reduce culpability.

Certainly the type of intent shall always play an important role in sentencing and imposition of penalty, but as European courts are given in most cases, great powers (within statutory limits), to increase or reduce the penalty, generally codes do not go beyond the general statement of various circumstances affecting the imposition of the penalty. However, as a rule they determine rather closely circumstances (in which again intent plays an important role) which authorize courts to exercise judicial pardon.

Provisions defining culpability function properly only if they are systematically related to the special part which contains definitions of separate offenses, in which the degree of guilt (culpability) is matched with a penalty depending upon the seriousness of the offense, crimes and misdemeanors always calling for culpable conduct (guilty conduct) and only infractions penalized without presence of guilt (absolute responsibility). Unless this is systematically done, the possibility arises (as it is quite frequent in the Soviet Criminal Code) the defendants are punished for serious crimes and misdemeanors unintentionally committed (without culpable conduct).

The last question which must be considered in this connection is the question of culpability for omission to act. It is an increasingly important problem in the modern society, where professional responsibility for failure to act endangers important values, e.g. life and security, safety of travel, etc., etc. At the foundation of this approach the belief is that profession calls for greater alertness in the member of the profession, than in the member of the public.

The draft deals of the responsibility for omissions in a section separate from one containing the definition of culpability. One may suggest that culpability for omissions should be treated jointly with culpability in its various forms.

(4) Causation is handled in modern criminal codes in connection with the definitions of culpability. There must be a direct connection between the conduct (culpable) and the result in order that liability be established. Section 305 dealing with causation separately from intent, adds nothing useful. It should be omitted.

(5) There is a basic difference in approaches to legislative solutions in the civil law and common law countries, due to the fact that in civil law countries substantive law includes all questions of crime, guilt, liability or absence of liability or belonging to the same class of problems, while in the common law tradition many of these questions are still treated as procedural and therefore cosidered as defenses rather than components of the system of events which establish guilt or innocence or absence of criminal liability. Naturally, this is a theoretical problem rather than one of practical, nevertheless, on occasion primarily, it may result in a different solution.

A matter of principle in civil law countries, the court which controls evidence calls for a testimony of a psychiatrist to examine the defendant. Prosecution or defense may only raise the issue of culpability because of the mental disorder or other facts diminishing or affecting culpability. Obviously, the nature of mental disturbance is an important factor. Somebody who is permanently mentally diseased presents a different problem in terms of criminal justice, than somebody who occasionally (even if regularly) gets drunk. In this last case, it will be the duty of the defense to raise during the trial points which may indicate reduced culpability. Hence, also a different approach to mental disease and drunkenness and similar events (abuse of drugs) in individual cases.

On the whole, foreign codes distinguish between two situations. Should the court come to the conclusion that the defendant, in spite of his mental condition is liable to punishment—the sentencing will take place. However, the court may at the same time prescribe that penalty must be combined with a proper treatment. Should the court decide that the defendant cannot be declared liable, it still may decree a proper treatment, or even isolation of the defendant in a mental institution for a definite or an indefinite period. The purpose of this approach is to introduce the element of expertise and combine it with the judicial control of the administration of justice. It is for the psychiatrist to say whether at the time the offense was committed the condition of the accused was such as to affect his liability. It has not been desired, however, that the court should be bound to exempt the offender from punishment where according to the medical report it is a case, say, of insanity. After all, the question of culpability (a legal question) is for the lawyers to decide. (See Danish Criminal Code, the Italian Criminal Code of 1930 and the Creek Code of 1952).

This is also the position of the Soviet Criminal Code of 1960 which makes the application of various measures of medical and educational character dependent upon the gravity of the offense. In other words, most of the modern civil codes treat cases where mental or other disorders prevent applicaton or normal penalties to the offender as a separate way of dealing with offenders. In the respect the draft follows the prevailing approach to this problem.

There is also a different approach which treats all offenders (particularly those incurring criminal liability for serous crimes) as representing social danger. The duty of the court is to consider criminal offenses primarily in terms of the degree of their social danger. First code of this type was the draft code of Ferri (1921) prepared by a founder of the School of Social Defense. The only code which systematically followed his teachings is the Cuban Code still in force. There are traces of the social defense approach also in the Criminal Code of Argentina and in the Italian Criminal Code of 1930. Under that system there is no difference between penalties and various measures aiming at the rehabilitation, resocialization, reeducation or isolation of the defendant. All of them are applied in order to protect the social order and social values.

Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: In response to your letter of February 3, I am enclosing a description of the Criminal Code of the Russian Soviet Federated Soviet Republic (RSFSR), which is the largest of the 15 republics that constitute the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR).

Given the relations between the United States and the Soviet Union, it might be argued by some that Soviet experience in the field of criminal legislation can safely be ignored by us. On the other hand, it would surely be a source of embarrassment if the proposed Federal Criminal Code were to be inferior in quality to the Soviet criminal codes.

Apart from such considerations, the fact is that the RSFSR Criminal Code, adopted in 1960 after many years of discussion and drafting, represents a modern codification of a high quality and deserves to be considered in connection with the proposed Federal Criminal Code.

I take the liberty of referring you to the translation of the RSFSR Criminal Code, by James W. Spindler and myself, and to the Introduction to it by myself, in Harold J. Berman and James W. Spindler, Soviet Criminal Law and Procedure: the RSFSR Codes (Harvard University Press, 1966).

If I can be of further help to the Subcommittee, please do not hesitate to call on me.

Yours sincerely,

HAROLD J. BERMAN,
Professor of Law.

MEMORANDUM CONCERNING THE CRIMINAL CODE OF THE RUSSIAN SOVIET FEDERATED SOCIALIST REPUBLIC (RSFSR) AND ITS RELATION TO THE PROPOSED FEDERAL CRIMINAL CODE NOW UNDER CONSIDERATION IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE

(By Harold J. Berman*)

The following memorandum contains answers to questions asked in a letter of February 3, 1972 by Senator John L. McClellan, Chairman of the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate.

The memorandum concerns the RSFSR Criminal Code, which was adopted in 1960. The RSFSR is the largest of the 15 union republics of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR). Each of the union republics has its own criminal code; however, they are all quite similar to each other, and all are based on Fundamental Principles of Criminal Legislation valid throughout the USSR.

The contents of the memorandum follow, with some variation, the order of the questions posed by Senator McClellan.

Questions (1) and (8):

The Criminal Code of the RSFSR does not follow a tripartite division such as is proposed for the Federal Criminal Code. Instead, there are two parts: a General Part and a Special Part. The General Part would appear to correspond to the material in Parts A and C of the proposed Federal Criminal Code; i.e., it covers General Provisions and Sentencing. The Special Part defines specific crimes and imposes penalties—which would appear to correspond to Part B of the proposed Federal Criminal Code.

There are twelve chapters in the Special Part of the RSFSR Criminal Code, arranged in an order roughly corresponding to the seriousness with which the lawmaker views crimes of various types. Within each chapter, specific crimes of the type contained in the chapter are also listed in an order roughly corresponding to their seriousness.

The following is a table of contents of the Special Part of the RSFSR Criminal Code:

Chapter I. Crimes Against the State
  1. Especially Dangerous Crimes Against the State
  2. Other Crimes Against the State
Chapter II. Crimes Against Socialist Ownership
Chapter III. Crimes Against Life, Health, Freedom, and Dignity of the Person
Chapter IV. Crimes Against Political and Labor Rights of Citizens
Chapter V. Crimes Against Personal Ownership of Citizens
Chapter VI. Economic Crimes
Chapter VII. Official Crimes
Chapter VIII. Crimes Against Justice
Chapter IX. Crimes Against the System of Administration
Chapter X. Crimes Against Public Security, Public Order, and Health of the Population
Chapter XI. Crimes Constituting Survival of Local Customs
Chapter XII. Military Crimes

Question (2):

The articles of the RSFSR Criminal Code are numbered successively 1–269. There are no "blanks."

Additions are made by appending a dash and numeral to an article number: e.g., Article 213–1, on the crime of stopping a train, was later inserted after Article 213, on violation of transport regulations.

Question (3):

The provisions of the RSFSR Criminal Code dealing with kinds of culpability are contained in Chapter 3 of the General Part. Crimes may be committed either intentionally or negligently. Intent is of two kinds, which roughly correspond to our categories "intentionally" and "knowingly." Negligence is also of two kinds, which roughly correspond to our "recklessly" and negligently." However, negligence is defined in subjective terms: the actor is held to a standard based on his own education, intelligence, etc.

Where a given crime may be committed either intentionally or negligently, the fact that it was committed negligently and not intentionally will bear upon the sentence (within the range of penalties listed in the provision of the Special Part defining the crime) only in a general way. In determining punishment, the court is required to take into account all circumstances of the case and of the defendant's personality. Also there is provided in the Code a list of mitigating and aggravating circumstances, relevant to the assignment of punishment.

Question (4):

Causation is not expressly defined in the RSFSR Criminal Code.

Question (5):

Article 11 of the RSFSR Criminal Code provides that a defendant "shall not be subject to criminal responsibility" if, at the time the crime was committed, he was "in a state of non-imputability." This state is defined as one in which the defendant "cannot realize the significance of his actions or control them because of a chronic mental illness, temporary mental derangement, mental deficiency, or other condition of illness." The Article further states that "compulsory measures of a medical character may be applied to such a person by order of the court." It would thus appear that non-imputability does not, automatically, trigger commitment to a mental institution for observation and treatment; the language of Article 11 is "may." However, the corresponding articles in the RSFSR Code of Criminal Procedure use the term "shall" (Article 403).

The procedural aspects of the insanity defense are likwise to be found not in the Criminal Code but in the Code of Criminal Procedure. Article 79 of the Code of Criminal Procedure provides that expert examination shall be obligatory to determine the suspect's mental state when there is doubt as to his imputability. Article 404 of the Code of Criminal Procedure requires a preliminary examination (1) of the circumstances surrounding the alleged criminal act and (2) of the personal history of the accused; participation of a forensic psychiatric expert is required once there is sufficient data that the accused actually did the act with which he is charged. There is no reference in the Code to a "government psychiatrist" or to "defendant's psychiatrist."

Question (6):

Article 12 of the RSFSR Criminal Code provides that intoxication shall not be a defense to a crime; indeed Article 39 provides that drunkenness is an "aggravating circumstance" to be considered in sentencing.

Article 62 deals with the problem of "compulsory measures of a medical character" for "alcoholics and drug addicts." "Compulsory therapy" is to be applied regardless of whether or not the defendant is punished, may extend beyond termination of a sentence, and concludes when the court approves a proposal to that end from the concerned "medical institution." Thus, such compulsory treatment is not to be thought of as an alternative to the normal punishment. The Article requires a petition from any of certain social groups before compulsory treatment will be administered by court order. Where a defendant is not to be deprived of liberty, the court may "establish a curatorship for him," again providing that a social organization or collective so petitions.

Question (7):

Draft Code 603–607 deal with self-defense and the use of force in much greater detail than does the RSFSR Criminal Code, which only sets broad standards. Moreover, the standards are rather different.

Article 13 of the RSFSR Code provides that, even if an act meets all the standards provided for in the General and Special Parts, it shall not be a crime "if it is committed in necessary defense." "Necessary defense" is any act that protects (a) the Soviet state, (b) social interests, (c) the person or rights of the defender, or (d) the person or rights of another person. The harm thus caused by "the defender" must not be clearly disproportionate to the character and danger of the infringment that would otherwise have been caused to the persons or interests listed above.

Article 14 deals with the defense of "extreme necessity." An action committed in "extreme necessity" is one to eliminate a danger which threatens (a) the interests of the Soviet state, (b) social interests, (c) the person or (d) the rights of the person or (e) the rights of other citizens. Article 14 also requires that the "danger cannot be eliminated by other means" and that "the harm caused is less significant than the harm prevented."

The amount of (and justification for) use of force also plays a role in other important articles used in affixing blame. For example, Article 38 ("Circumstances mitigating responsibility") provides, in 38(6), that even where the defendant may not avail himself of the provisions of Article 13 because he used excessive force, such use of force for the purposes there described is, in itself, a mitigating circumstance.

Examples of the Code's concern with amount of (and justification for) use of force are quite plentiful within the Special Part of the Code. For example, the articles on homicide in Chapter 3 of the Special Part provide for some significant distinctions based on some of the considerations outlined above. Intentional homicide is punishable by penalties ranging from death to three years' deprivation of freedom, depending on the aggravating or mitigating circumstances involved (Articles 102 and 103). But the Code provides for an even lower penalty than might be achieved by the operation of Articles 103 and Article 38(6), by specially providing that homicide "committed while exceeding limits of necessary defense" is punishable by deprivation of freedom for no more than two years or by "correctional tasks" for no more than one year. (Article 105). (The concept and mechanics of the punishment of "correctional tasks" is explained in the answer to Question (17)(b).)

In summary, then, it may be noted that the RSFSR Criminal Code sets general standards rather than enunciating specific rules. However, in certain areas, as in homicide, certain specific application of the rules (in relation to punishment) is given.

It is also interesting to note that Articles 13 and 14 and 38(6) in the General Part do not draw distinctions based on the relationship of threatened party to the defendant himself. Article 13 provides that the defendant may use certain force to protect the "person or rights" of "another person," without specifying relationship. Article 14 is similar, though limited to "rights ... of other citizens." The significance of the relationshiip of the threatened one to the defendant is manifested only in particular areas of the substantive criminal law of the Special Part, and then only in an indirect way. For example, if unlawful actions on the part of the victim result or could result in "grave consequences for [the defendant's] near ones" and if these actions provoke "a state of sudden strong mental agitation" that persists during defendant's use of force on the victim, much reduced maximum penalties are provided (Articles 104, 110).

Question (9), (a) (b) (c):

There are several provisions in the RSFSR Code relating to suspension of sentence. Article 44 provides that "if the court, taking into consideration the circumstances of the case and the personality of the guilty person, becomes convinced that it would be inappropriate for the guilty person to serve punishment, it may decree the conditional nonapplication of punishment"; the court is required to state its reasons therefor. The decree is conditional on the defendant's not committing "a new crime of the same kind or of equal gravity." The probation period is set for a period between one and five years. The most interesting feature of the Article is probably that relating to control of the defendant during the probation. Upon petition or "with their consent," the court may make a particular collective or social organization responsible for carrying out educational work with the defendant. After not less than half the term of probation has passed, the remainder may be reduced upon petition of the responsible collective or social organization.

Articles 41 and 45 when taken together indicate that if defendant commits a new crime during the period of probation, sentences for both crimes are to be cumulated.

A tangentially related matter is given in Article 50 of the Code, which empowers a court to relieve a defendant of any criminal responsibility when, "as a result of a change in the situation, the act committed by the guilty person has lost its socially dangerous character or the person has ceased to be socially dangerous." Article 52 is akin to these provisions but much less sweeping in its scope; it provides for suspension of sentence for defendants accused of minor crimes when the defendant has "sincerely repented." In the event of application of this Article, the defendant is released on surety to the charge of a social organization or collective, providing that they so petition the court. Article 52, like Article 50, relieves the defendant of criminal responsibility but it appears to operate only prior to trial, and Article 52 may not go into effect if the accused has previously been convicted of an "intentional crime" or has already been released on surety.

Suspension of the execution of sentence is also provided for in the Code but only in rather unusual situations: for example, (1) when the defendant is serving in the Army or "subject to call-up or mobilization" (Article 46), and (2) when the defendant becomes "nonimputable" (i.e., non-responsible) after a trial (Article 11).

Question (9)(d):

Sentences are not indeterminate. Aside from the death penalty, no sentence ever exceeds twenty years. It is impossible for any sentence to exceed a twenty year total, even where different types of sentences are consecutively applied for a single crime, and even under the provision for cumulation of sentences for two or more separate crimes. Other than the death penalty, sentences exceeding twenty years are thought to be cruel, inhumane, and counter-productive.

(e) There are no "special extended term prison-sentence" provisions for "dangerous special offenders", but the RSFSR does embody the concept of the "especially dangerous recidivist." Under the new 1969 law, Article 24–1, an "especially dangerous recidivist" suffers added penalties. But there penalties may be imposed only on defendants already determined to be "especially dangerous recidivists" in a special separate proceeding prior to the committing of the crime for which the defendant is being tried.

(f) In responding to the other questions of this questionnaire, maximum and minimum sentences for particular crimes have been listed. This information can be used for comparison with the sentences meted out under the "class A, B, C provisions" of the proposed Federal Criminal Code.

(g) The RSFSR Code provides for both maximum and minimum sentences for each crime, and these are enumerated in each article of the "Special Part." However, Article 43 permits the court to assign a sentence below the minimum, or, indeed, to use a "milder kind of punishment."

(h) and (i) Under the RSFSR system of release on parole, all decisions are made by the court. If no other provisions of the Code have operated to prevent it, and if the convicted person has actually been deprived of freedom, parole ("conditional early release") is not possible in most cases until not less than half of the assigned term has been served. Commission of acts made crimes by certain specified articles require the convicted person to serve two-thirds of his sentence; commission of acts made crimes by certain other specified articles will render any "conditional early release" impossible, as will certain other events such as commission of a new intentional crime before expiration of the remaining unserved term assigned for a first crime.

The same article, Article 53, which sets out provisions for "conditional early release," also provides for "replacement of punishment by milder punishment." This novel idea is to be applied under the same conditions as the more conventional parole ("conditional early release").

Article 55 operates in a very similar way for convicted persons under eighteen when convicted. Only one-third of the sentence needs to be served for Article 55 to become applicable.

The provisions of the RSFSR Code thus differ from those of the proposed Federal Criminal Code in requiring court decision rather than Parole Board decision and in providing for longer periods of actual punishment before consideration of the possibility of release. The standard for the convict's conduct is also differently and less precisely phrased; the convict is to "prove his correction" by his exemplary conduct and honorable attitude toward labor." (Article 53.)

Unlike the provisions of the proposed Federal Criminal Code, there are provisions in the RSFSR law that would allow some review of a parole decision. The RSFSR Code of Criminal Procedure, Article 357, would allow protests by the procuracy, with suspension of execution of the ruling until the upper court had considered the matter. Presumably, each determination could be appealed; it should be emphasized that such "appeals" are not of right but would involve a decision on the part of the procurator, who is in some very rough ways similar to an ombudsman. It should also be noted that though the court is to make the decision, the Code of Procedure provides that certain administrative groups familiar with the conduct of the defendant should first make a proposal for the convict's parole.

(j) and (k) The special publication of a conviction is not one of the "kinds of punishment" listed in Article 21. However, some of the unusual "kinds of punishment" provided for in this article do appear to contain elements of the idea of a "special publication." "Social censure," which is the punishment mentioned in Article 21(9), is defined in Article 33 as requiring a public reprimand by the court, and "if necessary," the court may elect to bring this to the notice of the public through the press or other means. This appears to differ from the proposed Secton 3007 in that the court, and not the defendant, takes the steps in publication.

Another type of punishment, "imposition of the duty to make amends for harm caused," also requires "publicity" of an unusual kind. (Article 21 (8).). Article 32 explains the term to require, inter alia, "a public apology before the victim or before members of the collective in a form prescribed by the court." The "public apology" is deemed appropriate where there has been no material loss, but, instead, an infringement of the dignity or integrity of another person or a "violation of the rules of socialist communal life."

(l) The only concept in the RSFSR Criminal Code that is similar to Section 3003 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code is that of "especially dangerous recidivist." This concept was explained in the response to question (9) (e).

Article 39 of the Code explicitly makes previous commission of any kind of crime an "aggravating circumstance." "Aggravating circumstances" are taken into account in increasing sentences.

(m) In the usual case, the Code does not appear to require judges to set forth the reasons for sentencing a particular defendant to a particular punishment. A Court is required to state its reasons, however, in more unusual proceedings and in application of lower than normal penalties. For example, Article 24-1 requires a setting forth of reasons in any determination that a person is an "especially dangerous recidivist," and Article 43, as previously noted, requires a statement of reasons for sentences below the statutory minimum.

(n) Sentences are subject to review on appeal. Article 380 of the RSFSR Code of Criminal Procedure explicitly provides that when a case is considered "by way of judicial supervision" (on motion of the prosecution or on the court's own motion) sentence may only be reduced, not increased, either by applying the law for a graver crime or by reviewing the discretion of the lower court. However, it may remand the case on grounds of "lightness of sentence." Article 373 of the Code of Criminal Procedure requires all such protests by the prosecution or upper court be made within one year.

(o) The defendant has only one appeal of right. Further appeals following defendant's exercise of this right occur only through the protests of the prosecution or on the court's own motion. Occasionally, the procuracy may intervene to appeal a case for a defendant. This form of appeal may be required even in the first instance, as defendant's first appeal, if the case were tried in the RSFSR Supreme Court or in the USSR Supreme Court, as decisions of those courts may not be appealed (or reconsidered) on defendant's motion alone.

(p) and (q) Uniformity of sentencing is achieved in part through review on appeal, as explained in (n), and in part by the standards explicated in the Code. The criteria are given in Article 37 and include: (1) The character and degree of the social danger of the committed crime; (2) the personality of the guilty person; (3) circumstances mitigating or aggravating responsibility. Article 38 enumerates nine circumstances mitigating responsibility. Article 39 enumerates twelve circumstances aggravating responsibility. Uniformity is also promoted through explicit statements of maximum and minimum sentences for each crime.

(r) If a defendant is convicted of more than one crime, Article 40 of the RSFSR Criminal Code requires the court to assign a separate punishment for each crime. It then may "absorb. . . the less severe punishment in the more severe" or it may "fully or partially" cumulate the punishments. There is, however, a limit to the cumulation; it must be "within the limits established by the article which provides for the more severe punishment." As explained in the answer to question (9)(d), this means that the total sentence may never exceed 20 years imprisonment in severity, except, of course, for the imposition of the death penalty.

Article 47 provides that "the court shall deduct preliminary confinement from the term of punishment." It further establishes conversion rates, e.g., one day of preliminary confinement substitutes for one day of imprisonment. In cases where the punishment imposed is of the milder variety, Article 47 provides that the court may "relieve the guilty person from serving the punishment because of the days spent in preliminary confinement.

(s)(t)(u)(v) A "fine" is deemed to be a "supplementary punishment" (Article 22), which is assigned in addition to or in replacement of a "basic punishment;" however, Article 30 explicitly provides that a fine may not replace or be replaced by deprivation of freedom. If it is not possible to exact a fine, the fine may be replaced by "correctional tasks." "Correctional tasks" are, in practice, a deduction of a percentage of monthly wages for a period of time. When the offender is not a wage-earner, he may be assigned to a job.

A fine may be assigned as punishment only where the relevant article of the Special Part of the Code so provides. The articles that provide for fines list a maximum; e.g., Article 230 ("intentionally destroying, demolishing, or damaging cultural monuments") provides for punishment, inter alia, "by a fine not exceeding one hundred rubles." But Article 30 in the General Part provides the principles by which the exact amount shall be established: "in accordance with the gravity of the crime committed, taking into account the financial position of the guilty person."

Thus, the RSFSR Code has no provision similar to section 3301(2) of the proposed Federal Criminal Code. Article 32 explains the sentence of "imposition of the duty to make amends for harm caused" as including "compensation, with one's own means, for mataerial loss." This is not a fine, and may not exceed 100 rubbles in any event. The duty of compensation, like all other sentences, is imposed only when it is an option provided for in the Special Part of the Code in specific articles. As stated, the "duty to make amends" would not involve the "doubling" of Section 3301(2).

Question (10):

There are no provisions in the provisions in the RSFSR Criminal Code that compare with Section 303, Section 304, and Section 609 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code.

Question (11):

This problem does not arise in the Soviet Union because, although there is a Supreme Court of the USSR, there are no "lower federal courts," except for military courts.

There is no national criminal code. There are, however, Fundamental Principles of Criminal Legislation that apply throughout the USSR. These correspond generally to the articles of the General Part of the RSFSR Criminal Code.

Question (12):

Article 5 of the RSFSR Criminal Code provides that anyone who is situated in the RSFSR shall bear responsibility for acts which he has committed abroad that are deemed crimes under the RSFSR Code. The last paragraph adds that foreigners shall bear responsibility under the Code in instances provide for by international agreements.

Article 5 also provides that the court may mitigate punishment or completely relieve the guilty person if he has already undergone punishment for the crimes abroad.

Thus Article 5 has a broader sweep than the proposed Federal Criminal Code.

Questions (13) and (14):

The RSFSR Criminal Code has no criminal conspiracy rules and no felony-murder rule. No article, nor any combination of articles, has the reach of these doctrines. However, the RSFSR Criminal Code does make punishable the mere preparation of a crime (Article 15).

Questions (15) and (16):

Soviet criminal law does not seem to provide especially helpful insights into the problems raised by these questions.

Question (17):

The following are some notes about the treatment of selected "victimless crimes" by the RSFSR Criminal Code:

(a) Homosexuality.—Article 121 ("Pederasty") provides that sexual relations between men are crimes punished by a maximum of five years' deprivation of freedom, except that the maximum is eight years in cases (a) involving physical force or threats, (b) with respect to a minor or (c) involving the taking advantage of the dependent condition of the victim.

Sexual relations between women are not covered by a separate article in the Code.

Articles 119 and 120 would also cover homosexual acts, but their provisions are limited to "Sexual relations with a person who has not attained puberty" and "Depraved actions [with respect to minors]." The penalty is deprivation of freedom for a maximum of three years, except where there are sexual relations "in conjunction with satisfaction of sexual desire in perverted form," in which case the penalty is imprisonment for a maximum of six years.

(b) Abortion.—Article 116 is entitled "Illegal performance of abortion" and includes (1) non-approved abortions and/or (2) abortions performed by a person "not having a higher medical education." The maximum penalty in the first case is one year; the maximum penalty in the second case is two years. However, a lesser penalty—"correctional tasks" (usually a deduction from monthly wages for a period of time)—is also applicable and available in both cases. The Article also provides for the sanction of deprivation of the right to engage in medical activity. The pregnant woman is not held criminally responsible for illegal abortions.

(c) Pornography.—Making, circulating, trading, retaining in order to sell or disseminate, or advertising all types of pornographic articles is punishable by imprisonment for no more than three years, or by a fine of no more than 100 rubles. Also, the pornography and means of making it are to be confiscated. (Article 228.) There are no qualifications or defenses as in Section 1851.

(d) Drugs.—Article 226 provides stiff penalties for keeping dens for the use of narcotics. Article 225 covers the growing of four substances: (a) opium poppies, (b) Indian hemp, (c) Southern Manchurian hemp, (d) Southern Chuisk hemp. The growing of (a) or (b) without the requisite permit is punishable by imprisonment for not more than two years or by correctional tasks (as explained above) for not more than one year. The growing of (c) or (d) under any circumstances is punishable by deprivation of freedom for not more than three years, or by correctional tasks for a term not exceeding one year. In all cases, the crop is confiscated. The third and most important Article is 224, which deals with "making or supplying narcotics or other virulent or poisonous substances." The penalty for making or supplying narcotics is imprisonment for not more than ten years; making or supplying a virulent or poisonous substance that is not a narcotic receives a penalty of imprisonment for not more than two years.

The related issues of (1) the smuggling of drugs and (2) the medical treatment of addicts are separatedly treated in the Code.

The penalty for smuggling narcotics and "virulent or poisonous substances" across the state border of the USSR is imprisonment for a term of three to ten years with confiscation of property, plus a possible additional exile for a term of two to five years. (Article 78.) ("Exile" is the removal of the convicted person from the place of his residence, with obligatory settlement in a certain locality"—Article 25). Concealment of smuggling is itself a crime punishable by penalties almost as severe. (Article 88-2).

Article 62 provides details of a procedure for "application of compulsory measures of medical character to drug addicts." Its terms were explained in the response to Question (6). There does not appear to be a curatorship for "drug addicts" as there is for "alcoholics," but all other provisions of Article 62 apply to both groups.

(e) Vagrancy or Begging.—Article 209 of the RSFSR Code, revised in 1970, deals with the problem of "systematically engaging in vagrancy or in begging." It provides for deprivation of freedom for not more than two years or for correctional tasks for not more than one year nor less than six months. A second conviction carries a penalty of imprisonment for not more than four years.

Article 209–1 is the new version of the notorious "anti-parasite law." Under it a person who maliciously refuses to fulfill the decision of the executive committee of the relevant soviet "to obtain work and to stop a parasitic existence" shall be punished by imprisonment for no more than one year or by correctional tasks for the same term. A second conviction is punished by imprisonment for no more than two years.

(f) Gambling.—Gambling itself is not covered by the Code. However, Article 226 provides that keeping gambling dens shall be a crime punishable by imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years "with or without banishment." (Banishment is the removal of a convicted person from his place of residence, together with additional prohibitions against his living in certain areas. Article 26). Article 210 also deals, in part, with gambling, and provides for a maximum of five years' imprisonment for drawing minors into this activity.

(g) Prostitution.—Prostitution itself is not covered by the Code. Three separate articles, however, deal with certain aspects of prostitution. Article 210 provides for a maximum of five years' deprivation of freedom for drawing minors into prostitution. Article 226 provides for a maximum of five years' deprivation of freedom, with or without banishment, for keeping a den of debauchery. Article 115 provides for a maximum of three years' deprivation of freedom or a maximum of one year's correctional tasks for knowingly infecting another person with venereal disease.

Question (18):

Firearms provisions.—Section 1811 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code finds its cousin in the RSFSR Code in Article 17 ("Complicity"). In the terminology of the RSFSR Criminal Code, a person who supplies a weapon for committing a crime is an "accessory," and he is punishable in accordance with the degree and character of his participation in the crime rather than in accordance with a specific provision narrowly concerned with "supplying firearms."

Section 1812's prohibition is covered in the RSFSR's Code's Article 218 ("Illegally carrying, keeping, making, or supplying arms or explosives"). Supplying such firearm or explosive without an appropriate permit is punishable by deprivation of freedom not exceeding two years, or by lesser penalties. Slightly reduced penalties are applied as well for supplying daggers, Finnish daggers, or any other cutting weapon without an appropriate permit. (There are special limited exceptions.)

Section 1814's prohibition would be included in, but not completely exhausted by, the coverage of Article 216 ("Violation of rules of safety in enterprises or shops where there is danger of explosion"). Penalty is dependent on resulting effects, but even where there are no injuries, a penalty as severe as one year's deprivation of freedom is provided. Since the means of producion are owned by the state, these industrial buildings are "federal" in some sense. Possessing an explosive device in a "federal government building" as provided in Section 1814 is not explicitly covered in the Code but would be presumably subsumed in the actual coverage of Article 217 ("Violation of rules for keeping, utilizing, registering, or transporting explosives and radioactive materials"). Penalties are rather similar to those provided in Article 216.

Question (19):

Capital punishment is mandatory only for attempted homicide of a policeman or people's guard, and even then only under aggravating circumstances (Article 191–2). A representative sampling of crimes in which the death penalty may be applied, in extreme circumstances, includes, but is not limited to: treason (Act 64), espionage (65), a terrorist act against the representative of a foreign state for the purpose of provoking war or international complications (67), organization of armed bands for the purpose of attacking state or social institutions or enterprises or individual persons (77), speculation in currency or securities as a form of business or on a large scale (88), intentional homicide under aggravating circumstances (102), rape (117).

Separate hearings for sentencing are not held in the RSFSR. However, as previously mentioned, separate hearings are held to determine the defendant's status as an "especially dangerous recidivist" and such a determination can be very important in deciding whether to impose the death penalty.

The death penalty is said to be "an exceptional measure. . . until its complete abolition." (Article 23).

Capital punishment is executed by shooting.

Persons under eighteen and women pregnant at the time of the commission of a crime or at the time of sentencing or at the moment set for execution may not be executed. (Article 23).

Question (20):

Neither the RSFSR Criminal Code nor Code of Criminal Procedure contains provisions as detailed as those of the proposed Federal Criminal Code on the subject of multiple prosecutions and trials. Hence, very little can be offered that is useful for comparison and contrast in this field.

Some of these considerations have already been presented in the responses to Questions (9)(r) and (11).

SUMMARY

Some of the more interesting aspects of the RSFSR Criminal Code are:

(a) Arrangement of chapters within the Special Part to correspond to the seriousness with which society views crimes of that type, as explained in the response to Question (1).

(b) Extension of the defenses for use of force to include prevention of harm to other citizens and to the rights of other citizens including persons not related to the defendant, as explained in the response to Question (7).

(c) Where appropriate, the release of a convicted person on probation, not to police or probation officers, but to the supervision of a social organization, as explained in the response to Question (9) (a) (b) (c).

(d) The provision of relief from criminal responsibility when, "as a result of a change in the situation, the act committed by the guilty person has lost its socially dangerous character or the person has ceased to be socially dangerous," as mentioned in the response to Question (9) (a) (b) (c).

(e) Restriction of the maximum sentence to twenty years, except for the death penalty, as explained in the response to Question (9)(d).

(f) Provisions relating to publication of convictions, as explained in the response to Question (9) (j) (k).

(g) Listing "mitigating" and "aggravating" circumstances to be used in consideration of sentencing, as explained in the response to Question (9) (p) (q).

(h) Provisions concerning fines and the ways that an indigent may pay such a fine, together with provisions prohibiting the court from making fine and imprisonment in any sense substitutes for each other, as explained in response to Question (9) (s) (t) (u) (v).

(i) The explicit provision making the intentional infection of another person with veneral disease a crime with a severe punishment, as explained in response to Question (17) (g).

(j) The imposition of severe penalties on improper transmission or possession of firearms without appropriate permit, and parallel provisions that extend even to cover "daggers. . . or any other cutting weapon without appropriate permit," as explained in response to Question (18).

Some other provisions of the RSFSR Criminal Code that deserve comment are:

(k) Defamation and insult (Articles 130, 131) are punishable crimes.

(l) Criminal penalties are imposed for "failure to render aid which is necessary and is clearly required immediately to a person in danger of death, if such aid could knowingly be rendered by the guilty person without serious danger to himself or to other persons. . ." (Article 127.)

(m) Article 57 of the RSFSR Criminal Code provides that under certain circumstances convicted persons may have the notation of the conviction expunged from official records. The chief criterion for the application of this article is the passage of a given period of time following completion of the term of punishment, during which the convicted person does not commit a new crime.

(n) Military criminal law is integrated into the Criminal Code. Military tribunals are permanent courts located in the various military districts and staffed by professional military judges. Servicemen who commit crimes of any kind are subject to their jurisdiction. In addition, the RSFSR Criminal Code contains in Chapter XII of the Special Part a list of specific military crimes, with the applicable punishments. A convicted serviceman may have his case reviewed by the Supreme Court of the USSR, which exercises general supervision over all courts, including military tribunals. Equally important, the specific provisions of military criminal law contained in Chapter XII of the Special Part of the RSFSR Criminal Code (and in corresponding chapters of the criminal codes of the 14 other union republics) must be applied in the light of the provisions of the General Part of the Code. Thus there is a complete integration of Soviet military criminal law into the general body of Soviet criminal law.

UNIVERSITY OF OTTAWA,
Ottawa, Ontario, Canada, February 29, 1972.

Mr. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MCCLELLAN: Thank you for the copy of the hearings of the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Part I.

Following your invitation of February 3 and my letter of February 8, 1972 I enclose herewith short remarks on the aims of criminal procedure as seen by the undersigned (search for truth and protection of the suspect).

Insofar as your questionnaire is concerned, I am unable to give you a detailed reply, but you will find enclosed some remarks.

Hoping that you will find the whole of some use, and thanking you for your invitation, I remain,

Yours sincerely,

L. KOS-RABCEWICZ-ZUBKOWSKI.

REMARKS BY L. KOS-RABCEWICZ-ZUBKOWSKI ON THE QUESTIONNAIRE OF THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES

(1) It is suggested that Part D could be added, dealing with enforcement of sentences. Several legislations (Portugal, Italy, France) provide for a judicial control of the enforcement of sentences, and vest these powers in the person of a special judge called an enforcing magistrate (in French: judge de l'application de peines). (See also under No. 9).

(2) Consecutive numbering of sections is suggested.

(6) There is a valid theory that a person who loses control of himself by intoxication, and in such a state commits an offence, should not be excused, as it is a so-called actio libera in causa. That means that such a person should foresee the possible consequences of his intoxication. Forced intoxication, however, is always a valid defence.

(8) Generally speaking, a classification for purposes of sentencing is as follows:

(a) Petty Offences (in French "contraventions"). This category tends to be considered as illicit, but not criminal.

(b) Medium Offences (in French "délits"). The commission of such offences does not involve the loss of civil rights. However, it is sanctioned by a punishment, including imprisonment.

(c) Felonies (in French "crimes"). This category comprises serious offences and most often includes offences committed from base motives, and with the aim of achieving illicit gain.

(9) Reasons in writing for sentences imposed are generally required, especially for the purposes of appeal. It is submitted that the very idea of the rehabilitation of a convict presupposes the possibility of such a rehabilitation. Human personality is not rigid but subject to change. It is impossible to foresee exactly in advance when and what changes will occur in the dynamic personality of the convicted offender. Therefore it is essential to assure a flexibility of sanctions and/or measures applied by the court. This is achieved by changes of probation orders, by parole, remission etc. All such modifications of sentences should be applied by the court, and preferably after a hearing of interested parties, including the offender or his attorney.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE TO SERVE THE SEARCH OF TRUTH AND TO PROTECT THE SUSPECT

1. The aim of criminal trial: search for truth and protection of the suspect

(A) The importance of the search for truth in criminal proceedings is universally recognised.

Recently, an international symposium, under the auspices of the International Association of Penal Law, examined the scientific methods of search of truth (at Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire).

(B) Present practice as to preliminary inquiry does not assure the best preparation of evidence for a trial aiming at the discovery of truth.

The evidence submitted to the court at the trial may be incomplete:

(a) There is no time for the attorney for prosecution and for the attorney for defence to evaluate the depositions of witnesses and to decide as to additional evidence;

(b) Even if an attorney manages to: (i) question, (ii) make notes, and (iii) think at the same time what should still be done in the light of the testimony heard in court, (1) he may not be in a position to call additional witnesses needed in consequence of information revealed in testimony of the witnesses heard in court, and (2) to find out, in a pre-trial interview, what such additional witnesses can contribute to the evidence already heard. (3) The presiding judge is reduced to reception of evidence as submitted; in the best case obvious omissions are corrected by the presiding judge by way of his questioning of the witnesses.

2. The aim of the preliminary inquiry: the search of truth and (a) committal for trial, or (b) acquittal

(A) It is submitted that a better preparation of trial may be achieved by hearing at the preliminary inquiry of all available evidence.

(B) The judge presiding at preliminary inquiry shall receive the evidence submitted by the prosecution and defence.

(C) The judge presiding at preliminary inquiry shall question the witnesses submitted by the prosecution and defence if he deems it useful for search of truth.

(D) The judge presiding at preliminary inquiry shall have the right to summon witnesses on his own initiative.

(E) The evidence received at the preliminary inquiry shall be transcribed and available to the parties at least one (two) weeks before the trial (or tape recordings should be available).

(F) Only such evidence shall be submitted at the trial: (i) which was submitted at the preliminary inquiry; or (ii) which, notwithstanding the diligence of the parties was discovered at or after the preliminary inquiry, or (iii) which is indicated by the judge who presided at the preliminary inquiry.

(G) In cases scheduled for trial before a judge without a jury, if all parties waive their rights for a trial and the presiding judge considers it in the interest of justice, the judge shall render his judgment after the closing of evidence in the preliminary inquiry.

(H) Before the beginning of the preliminary inquiry the defendant shall be informed that the judge may appoint a counsel or request that a counsel be appointed by the Legal Aid.

(I) If the preliminary inquiry does not lead to the committal for trial the defendant shall be acquitted (elimination of double jeopardy).

Reasons.—The suggested procedural reform tries to incorporate in to the adversary system some of the advantages of the inquisitorial system, while asserting also the rights of the accused who shall have his traditional "day in court" at his trial.

This reform does not require the accused to be a compellable witness.

While starting from an adversary system, these suggestions follow to a certain extent (a) the English practice, and (b) the Swiss Canton of Geneva legislation.

The latter provides, on request of a party, for an adversary type preliminary investigation aiming at: (1) the search of truth, and (2) the protection of the suspect.

The Geneva procedure is characterized by the rights of the parties: (A) to be present at all acts of inquiry; (B) to summon witnesses; (C) to question witnesses; (D) to have access to all witnesses and other evidence; (E) to request additional inquires and opinions of experts.

The duty of the investigating judge to inform the defendant that he may appoint a counsel or request that a counsel be appointed is also provided by the French penal procedure (art. 114, alinea 3 of the French code of penal procedure) and art. 243 (4) of the German code of penal procedure.

3. Type of evidence:

It is suggested that all types of evidence, including hearsay evidence, shall be admitted (at the preliminary inquiry and at the trial). However, the weight of the evidence shall be left to the appreciation of the court.

4. The accused and the evidence: (i) minimum suggestions

(A) It is suggested that the principle that the accused is not a compellable witness should be retained.

(B) The plea of guilty should not be, as such, binding for the court. Notwithstanding the plea of guilty, the judge presiding at appearance may order a preliminary inquiry if he belives that the plea of guilty is not an absolute proof in the given case.

(ii) Possibilities to be considered

(C) The accused shall not be a witness (even if he wants to testify).

(D) The accused shall be informed that he may either offer explanations or abstain from offering explanations. Such explanations shall be offered at the commencement of preliminary inquiry and/or trial. When offering explanations the accused shall not be under oath. As such explanations do not constitute a testimony the accused shall not be cross-questioned.

Reasons.—Even in present major European inquisitorial systems the accused is not a compellable witness. In fact, he is not a witness at all. Even his admission of guilt does not, per se, eliminate the need to submit evidence by the prosecution.

However, the accused may offer explanations or declarations. The judge must inform the accused that he is free to abstain from making any declarations (e.g. Articles 114 alinea 1 and 170 of the French code of penal procedure; also compare section 545(1) Canadian Criminal Code: "you are not bound to say anything . . ."). In practice, in most cases, the accused make declarations.

This practice can be compared to a detailed plea. Such a detailed plea exists in civil jurisdiction in the form of a writen plea of the defendant (e.g. in the Quebec code of civil procedure).

The general assembly of the United Nations adopted on December 16, 1966 by 106 votes to none the covenant on civil and political rights (the United Nations and Human Rights, 1968, U.S. Sales No. E67 129, p. 85). The said covenant provides in article 14(3)(g) that persons accused of criminal offences should not be forced to testify against them or to admit their guilt.

5. Trial

(A) The transcript of the evidence received at the reliminary inquiry shall be available to the parties and to the judge presiding at the trial.

(B) The judge presiding at the trial shall have the right to question witnesses, although the main questioning and cross-questioning shall be conducted by the counsel.

(C) Perhaps the judge presiding at the trial should have also the right to summon additional witnesses.

6. Private Claimant ("partie civile")

(A) Private claimant seeking indemnification of damages caused by the offence, shall be admitted as a party to criminal proceedings (preliminary investigation and trial).

(B) Perhaps the private claimant should be a party but not a witness (as in Europe) but this does not appear to be essential.

Reasons.—Compare: section 628 of the Canadian Criminal Code provides that: "A court that convicts an accused of an indictable offence may, upon the application of a person aggrieved, at the time sentence is imposed, order the accused to pay to that person an amount by way of satisfaction or compensation for loss of or damage to property suffered by the applicant as a result of the commission of the offence of which the accused is convicted". Section 630 of the Canadian Criminal Code provides for restitution of "any property obtained by the commission of the offence". The economy of trial militates in favour of settling of the issue of indemnification of the victim in one(criminal) trial, instead of repeating the same evidence in the civil court.

Should the assessment of the amount (quantum) of damages be complicated it could be done during an additional part of the criminal trial, following the conviction, in an adversary way.

European legislations provide for the party status for private claimants. Such a party has the advantage of submitting the evidence both as to liability and the quantum of damages, the latter being often dealt with marginally by the prosecuting attorney.

UNIVERSITY OF DETROIT SCHOOL OF LAW,
Detroit, Mich., February 10, 1972.

MR. ROBERT H. JOOST,
Assistant Counsel, U.S. Senate, Committee on the Judiciary, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedure, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. JOOST: Unquestionably, the crime situation in the United States is worse than bad. It is sad that in the wealthiest country in the world which justifiably boasts of its great tradition of liberty and fraternity, citizens are afraid to walk on the streets of their towns and to leave their homes uninhabited when they go on vacation. The situation became so disgusting that some Americans left their country in order to settle elsewhere. Many others avoid living in towns. Just last week, a gifted prospect for a teaching position at our law school decided to decline our offer, stating that she liked the faculty and the University, but was reluctant to work in a community where her security would be impaired. Foreigners visiting the United States, foreign diplomats and members of the U.N. Secretariat are dismayed by the robberies and muggings they are subjected to, and foreign tourists prefer to visit other countries. The sight of downtown Detroit is dismal and discouraging: in the daytime, a policeman must be placed in every room of commercial establishments—a phenomenon unseen in any other country of the world. In the night time, the streets are deserted. In New York, a policeman must patrol every subway. In many places, exact fare is required in public transportation and service stations in late hours.

Among the problems that the United States has to solve, crime is the most important. It should be attacked on many fronts. Its causes are various, and there is no single answer to the questions it presents. Some of the most important factors which contribute to the skyrocketing rate of crimes in recent years are the breakdown of family life, the disrespect of authority and legal rules, the undermining of moral values, the tolerance of violence in the American mind, the incredible trend towards permissiveness, the drug abuse, and extremely poor TV programs and movies. All these factors are a national concern, exceeding the boundaries of legal considerations. However, some other causes are strictly connected with the law: obsolete procedure, unworkable rules of evidence, highly exaggerated emphasis on due process in utter disregard of substantial truth, an antiquated jury system, lax law enforcement, obstacles laid to police action, helplessness against threats to witnesses, leniency of the judges, frequent inexcusable mistakes of the prosecution, a poor prison system and lack of control over possession of dangerous weapons.

On the other hand, some of the other reasons cited sometimes as contributing to the high rate of crimes in the United States cannot be considered as real factors. In particular, the purported difficulty in finding employment and the poverty of some segments of the population should not be considered as vital. The situation on both points is much worse in most of the countries in the world, where, however, the crime situation is much better than in the United States. Many artificial legal rules and the lack of any desire on the part of the judges to protect the interests of society rather than to furnish dozens of technical obstacles to the administration of justice, technicalities and legal excuses to the criminals result in an ever growing dissatisfaction of the citizens with our legal system and its enforcement, the disrespect for the law and lawyers, and the establishment of groups of "vigilantes" as a more efficient means of self-defense than the entrusting of public security to the authorities. Frankly, the situation here is so bad that it calls for drastic measures. There were countries where, in order to stop crimes, cruel methods of punishment were devised, such as cutting the hands of thieves off. The result was that in some countries law breaking was practically eliminated. While such a crude approach could not be advocated today, it indicates that one of the important ways of fighting crime is deterrence by a fear of severe punishment. Unfortunately, in the United States only a small percentage of the offenders are ever caught; still less are indicted, and a very insignificant number are found guilty and punished. The risk of the criminal is not great: he knows that his chances of escaping from the hands of the law are good, and the possibilities of being sentenced to a serious prison term are small.

Instead of devising means to render the criminals insulated from the society which they destroy, instead of attempting to show to the offenders that the nation's patience has been abused too long and that every crime will be punished, the courts and some scholars continue on the path of an interpretation of the Constitution never dreamed of by the Founding Fathers. They construct beautiful abstract principles which may be very idealistic and which possibly could be applied in a society where crime is a rarity, but which are absolutely unworkable in the United States of today.

The due process clause is an excellent provision devised to protect the citizen against the arbitrariness of the government. However, its construction should be reasonable and appropriate to the conditions of the society in which it is in force. The way the courts (and, in particular, the Supreme Court) extended its scope renders a great disservice to the nation. This clause, along with some other constitutional provisions (such as the "bill of attainder" clause) was intended primarily to apply to political offenders rather than to comomn criminals. It was greatly justified in the light of the XVIII century practice in some European countries where the king could imprison anyone he wanted for an indefinite period of time without giving any reasons and without the necessity of instituting any judical proceedings. He could delegate his authority to others (the French "letters de cachet" may serve as an outstanding example).

In many dozens of opinions, the courts laid down their own rules on "due process", absolutely unwarranted by the Constitution. Connected with the rules of evidence as understood by the American judiciary, they frequently defy common sense. If evidence was unlawfully obtained, it will not be admitted in court. In case it was, conviction may be reversed even if there is other good evidence supporting the verdict. And the over-restrictive understanding of the reasonable suspicion rules out good and relevant evidence! The very fact that a search produced such evidence is an indication that there were valid grounds for suspecting criminal activity. Unfortunately, the courts prefer to "punish" the police for nonabidance by the rules they arbitrarily devised than to render a service to the general public.

It was said that the admission of unlawfully obtained evidence is a rule protecting the citizens. There is a clear fallacy in this argument. First, a law abiding citizen does not object to a search. As far as I am concerned, I would welcome a search of my person or car, even without any judicial warrant. I have nothing to be afraid of and I would be glad to know that the police are trying to detect crime for the good of society. However, assuming that some other persons may object, the way to remedy the situation is by no means to exclude the "unlawfully obtained" evidence. The purpose of the judicial process should be to elicit the truth, not to suppress it as it is constantly being done. The criminal trial should not be a game between two equal parties to be won by the one who knows the artificial rules better. The tendency to make the job as difficult as possible to the prosecutor is deplorable.

In order to prevent unreasonable searches and seizures, the disciplinary control over the police and sanctions against those who proceed with unwarranted action should be applied upon the request of the aggrieved citizens. Probably, it would not be a strong weapon in some cases because the supervisory police organs may be unwilling to take the proper steps. Another, much more efficient device is the assurance of a cause of action against the offending police officer to the prospective plaintiffs. Possibly, the best approach is to grant recovery to those persons whose search did not result in finding any evidence and was unlawful. Thus, the police could act on their own risk. Another possibility is to permit recovery even if the search did produce evidence although it was contrary to technical rules. Such a cause of action is quite sufficient to deter the police from failing to abide by the rules of conduct and to protect the citizens against arbitrary action.

On the other hand, in no case should the courts hush up the truth by excluding relevant evidence. The American system of excluding unlawfully obtained evidence is unique—it is contrary not only to the situation in civil law countries, but also in common law countries such as England or Australia.

And nobody may say that in Switzerland, France, Germany or England the administration of justice is not fair enough to the accused. On the contrary, these countries gained a reputation of having excellent legal systems. Nobody can say that in England, the defendants have no decent trials, even though there is no "due process" clause in that country. Maybe it is better not to have such a clause, because then it cannot be misinterpreted.

What we really need, in the United States, is a revolution in the way of thinking of the judges and lawyers, rather than in changing substantive rules of the law. Of course, they may be improved, but even a perfectly written text will not do if it is misinterpreted and misapplied. The judicial and legal profession in this country must awaken, must become dedicated to the eradication of crime and protection of society before progress will be achieved. Inefficient administration of justice, shocking leniency towards the criminals, encourage law breaking and undermine society. Unfortunately, young generations of lawyers, educated in the spirit of what is sometimes inacurately called the "extreme liberalism" of the Supreme Court, being repeatedly told that this is the essence of freedom and democracy, do not realize that the American system is an oddity which renders the life of the citizens ever more miserable and which has nothing to do with civil rights. They do not know that the situation may be and is different in other Western countries. In some fields, American law gained respect and influenced developments in foreign legal systems. This is the case, in particular, with anti-trust legislation. On the other hand, American criminal law puts the United States in disrepute and is frequently cited as an example which should not be followed. In the "Atlantic Charter", the leaders of the Allies solemnly proclaimed that one of their goals in winning the war was to provide freedom from fear to humanity. Unfortunately, the greatest country in the world is unable to secure freedom from fear to its citizens, and it seems that its courts are unwilling to do so.

One of the most important purposes of the criminal law system is to render the criminals harmless; to punish them and—if at all possible—to reform them. But the courts utterly disregard their duties. They make every possible effort to render the prosecution and conviction as difficult as possible. Instead of serving the community which entrusted them with a most important function, they purport to serve some fictitious abstract ideas frequently termed as "constitutional rights." Inability to convict or excessive leniency in sentencing encourages the criminals to become ever bolder, to become more dangerous to law abiding citizens, to apply their experience to a more skillful perpetration of their deeds and evading the arm of the law. The deplorable tendency to impose light penalties on drug pushers is disastrous to the society which they undermine, frequencly destroying the lives of our youngsters and turning them into criminals willing to commit any breach of the law in order to get money to satisfy their needs arising from drug addiction. Especially severe treatment should be extended to organized crime. Unfortunately, big syndicate bosses either escape punishment or get light sentences. The courts show no deep desire to eliminate them from the American scene. Besides, they may afford to retain skillful lawyers knowing all legal technicalities and possibilities of motions and delays. On the other hand, a substantial possibility of being convicted would be an important deterrent preventing criminals from carrying out their activities.

The change in the judicial atmosphere and constitutional interpretation is a condition without which progress cannot be expected. Personally, I have some ideas about a few rules of substantive and procedural law which, however, have only secondary importance. I will mention a few without much elaboration. By "American", I mean the federal and/or state system.

Sentences should be meted out for definite periods of time. This is the uniform European approach which works better than the American system of indefinite sentences.

I would retain the death penalty, to be applied sparingly, even though many European and American lawyers would disagree with me. It seems to me that there are extreme cases of hardened criminals who are absolutely incorrigible, whose crimes are so odious and revolting that the perpetrator should be completely eliminated, once and for all, from the society which he destroys. Such persons just were not created to live in our world. Life imprisonment presents dangers that sooner or later they will escape and continue their activities and possibilities of exerting bad influence and terror on other prisoners. Besides, it is questionable whether it is actually "charitable" to let a person "rot in prison" for the rest of his life.

The grand jury should be eliminated and replaced by investigating judges. This is the uniform European system which works much better. A body of laymen is incapable of dealing with the problem of whether the suspect may be successfully prosecuted, as the American experience clearly establishes. The fact finding by the jurors during the trial is a quite sufficient—frequently even exaggerated—participation of men from the community in judicial proceedings. Endeavors to put the United States in line with the rest of the world, even at the expense of constitutional amendment, should be initiated as soon as possible. In England grand juries were abolished in 1933.

Peremptory challenges in jury selection should be strictly limited to a small number of persons. Even in other common law countries, the whole process takes just a few hours (e.g., at most half a day in Australia). The American spectacle where this simple step may take weeks, at the expense of tax payers, waste of time and delay in the administration of justice, is scandalous in the public opinion of foreign nations.

There is no reason for having twelve persons on the jury. In some states, this number has been decreased. By all means, this trend should be followed. There is no reason to think that there is magic in the number of twelve. Six persons can do the job well enough. There would be less time wasted, less possibility for a mistrial, less public money expended and less possibility of bribing a juror.

Jury verdicts should be reached by a qualified majority rather than by unanimity. This is the rule even in England which is the cradle of the jury system. The Louisiana reform should be held constitutional and followed. The stubbornness, stupidity or bribing of one juror prevented the reaching of verdicts in more than one case. In many states of the Union, a qualified majority is sufficient in civil cases.

Appeals should be permitted both to defendants and to the prosecution. In some respects, both parties are treated equally, but on the problem of appeals, the usual American rule is to give preferential treatment of the accused. In Europe, the prosecutor may appeal both from the dismissal of the case and from the imposition of a sentence considered by him to be too lenient.

Judicial delays should be eliminated. Short periods of time should be set for motions and appeals, and they should be taken care of with all possible sped. The lapse of many years from commencing of an action until the determination of the case by the highest court, as it happens in the United States, is undesirable, frustrating, impeding the administration of justice and unparalleled in other civilized countries.

In cases of juveniles, they should be treated in accordance with the rules applicable to their age bracket at the time of the commission of the crime rather than of the trial.

Some other foreign approaches should be accepted in the United States—or just previous American rules reinstated. Third degree police methods should be eliminated by all possible means, but voluntary confessions should be admitted as relevant evidence whether they were made after consultation with a lawyer or not. The duty of the police is to prevent crime, arrest the suspects and collect evidence against them. In no other country of the world are the police under a duty to act as lawyers of the suspects as they are in the United States where they have to teach the law to the suspects by instructing them about their right to keep silent, to decline answering questions and making confessions before retaining a lawyer. The reason sometimes given for this obligation is that it provides the same opportunities to the poor as are available to the rich. There is an obvious fallacy in this reasoning. The artificial rules of evidence are well known to skilled lawyers specializing in defending wealthy organized crime bosses who are in a financial position to retain them. Therefore, primarily they protect the rich criminal rather than the poor. But even assuming that this is not so, crime should be fought against on every level, by whomsoever it may be perpetrated. The law should not provide a possible way out to one criminal only because another one is able to do so. If one law violator has a car and drives away from the scene of the crime, it is not a reason to require the police to furnish a car to another suspect so that he may have the same chance of escaping as the wealthier one.

In Europe, the essential duty of the judge is to find the truth, and the whole judicial process is geared in this direction. Witnesses are not limited to answering questions put by the attorneys of the parties. When called on the witness stand and sworn, they are told by the judge to say everything they know about the case. Their free narration is uninterrupted unless they engage in irrelevant statements. After they finish, the judge himself asks questions before permitting examination and cross-examination by the parties. Persons who testify are witnesses of the court itself rather than of the parties, and therefore there is no problem of impeaching "the own" witness of a party and similar ideas. Again, the experts are selected primarily from among a panel of names of well qualified persons which is kept in every judicial district. The shocking sight of "battle of experts" presented by the two parties is eliminated.

One important impediment in the providing of the prosecutor's case is the fear of the witnesses to testify against a criminal who may take a vengeance, either personally or by his famliy or friends. How many cases were lost because of a refusal to testify, or of a sudden "loss of memory" of the witnesses! The device of anonymous witnesses, with masked faces, is resorted to in extremely rare cases in the United States. It should be applied in hundreds of trials.

The emphasis on cross-examination is much exaggerated. In Europe, if evidence is relevant, it is admitted. If no cross-examination is possible, its weight may be questionable, but it is not excluded. In the American trials, how much excellent evidence is not admitted on the ground of an extensive view on what a hearsay is! A typical example is a treatise by a famous physician. The adversary is always free to introduce evidence to the contrary, but it is against common sense to exclude observations of a well known authority on some disease just because he cannot personally appear in court. Happily, there is a trend against this extreme approach in the United States, but many other aspects of the unfortunate hearsay rule are still permitted to obscure the issues at trial.

While I would not advocate the abolishment of the privilege against self-incrimination, I strongly favor that it be interpreted reasonably. Its natural meaning should cover oral statements. It should never be applied to such evidence as blood tests or written records. Again, the concept of double jeopardy should be given a narrow construction.

The obstacles put on the path of the prosecution lead to devices whose propriety is questionable. Unable to get a conviction in any other way, the prosecutor enters into "plea bargaining" with the suspect or guarantees freedom from prosecution in exchange for a testimony against other suspects.

It is also difficult to see the wisdom of the rule requiring the state to furnish a lawyer to the indigent accused, and providing for lawyers in juvenile cases. Traditionally, the lawyer was a person who helped the court by facilitating the judge to elicit all aspects of the case and pointing out the arguments available to his client. Today, lawyers sometimes endeavor to obscure the truth and twist the law around so as to make conviction impossible. In simple criminal cases, in juvenile delinquency problems, there is no reason for the defendants to have lawyers. Unless difficult problems are presented and the help of an attorney is desirable, the court should handle the case all by itself. The recent impositon of the obligation to provide lawyers to all defendants at public expense is unwarranted, and with many other American rules, imposes an additional financial burden on the community.

The situation got out of hand in the United States. The citizens feel insecure, frustrated, and have no confidence in the ability of the authorities to protect them. While a strict arms control should be effective everywhere, self-defense, and defense of others as well as property should be freely permitted and encouraged. A few decisions imposing liability on good faith defenders are shocking. Permission to carry a concealed weapon should be given to reliable citizens for use in cases of emergency.

A few other points should be made. First, some jurists say that the exclusionary rules of evidence are necessary in the United States because of the poor quality of the police. There is more than one fallacy in such a statement.

Of course, the quality of the police should be upgraded as much as possible. Undeniably, much may be done, in this respect. Certainly, there are some rude, dishonest, corrupt and incompetent policemen. But it does not follow that the society should be punished for their shortcomings. It is natural that in an imperfect society there are imperfect policemen, physicians, lawyers and politicians. We may be proud that at least one of the American law enforcement agencies—the F.B.I.—merits fame all around the world for its efficiency and integrity. As to the American police, with all their shortcomings, I would be inclined to state that they are no worse than in other countries, trying to maintain law and order and to protect the law abiding citizens. An interesting experience was initiated by Indiana University for its law students: accompanying policemen on their rounds and routine work. The devotion and courage of many of them was an eye-opener to many future lawyers.

Again, prison reform is badly overdue in the United States. It appears certain that one of the most important goals of confinement of criminals, their reform, is hardly ever achieved. But it does not follow that it is preferable not to lock them up and to permit them to continue their life of crime. Will they learn still worse things from fellow prisoners? Possibly yes, in some instances. But even if this may happen, it does not mean that they should be let free. Naturally, all efforts should be made to establish different categories of inmates, to protect some of them against the others, and to stop the possibility of exposing slight law violators to the influence of hardened criminals. As to robbers and muggers, what else may they learn from the fellow inmates? Persons who endanger the life of the citizens, beat and injure them in order to satisfy their desire to get easy money (which sometimes brings them just a few pennies) may hardly learn worse things.

What are the classes which are hit hardest because of the crime rate? Certainly not the millionaires who usually live out of town and are driven with the escort of a driver. The crimes are directed particularly against the poor man, living from his modest wages in an old neighborhood—frequently, a person belonging to a minority group. The average robber would not hesitate to take away the money from an old or crippled person, a blind man walking with the help of a white cane or a newspaper boy, as everyday reports indicate.

It is easy to say that there should be more judges and more police. However, this will not solve the problems. Besides, I am not sure that such steps would necessarily be advisable. I would agree with respect to the judges, along with the recommendation that they spend more hours in the courtroom. More police in some neighborhoods would enhance the security of the population. But how far do we have to go? Did we reach the stage at which it is necessary to place a policeman in every block, at every corner, in every apartment building, in front of every home?

All possible means should be used in order to curb the crimes and destroy the organized law breaking groups. A few well established myths among the American jurists should be eliminated. First, that wire-tapping is inherently unfair and should be used only in exceptional cases. As a matter of fact, it is an efficient device, frequently providing important data to law enforcement authorities, and it should be freely resorted to. Second, the idea of "entrapment" by the police, preventing conviction, should be discarded, on the pattern of foreign countries. A person willing to commit a crime in front of an undercover agent should be considered as guilty as if he were acting in other circumstances. Third, the idea that the defendant may be prejudiced by an unfavorable atmosphere in the community where he committed the crime should be either discarded or at least substantially limited. A recent Indianapolis trial in a "torture murder" case resulted in the conviction of the defendant. However, a new trial was granted on the ground of possible prejudice of the community. The evidence was clear and the facts were not denied. A second trial was held in another community and the result was the same. How much delay, waste of judicial energy in overcrowded courts and waste of the taxpayers' money! In a few other cases, no trial was held at all because of an alleged impossibility to find unbiased jurors! What may be expected from the community in the case of an odious crime? General sympathy for the brutal murderer?

For good reasons, England is considered as the most conservative country in the world. But the English knew how to reform their law in the right direction when the need arose. Why are we so reluctant to see straight? Why should the American legal profession close its eyes to reality; perpetrate the errors, and even expand the "protection" of the law breakers at the expense of the general public? Is it because the Constitution is sacrosanct? First of all, with due respect to the Constitution, it is a document which should serve the people, not vice-versa. If it should prove to be detrimental to the best interests of the nation, it should be amended forthwith. But the so-called "constitutional rights" of the accused have little to do with the mandates of this remarkable basic law. They are a pure creation of abstract minds which for the purported "fairness" in the court are willing to substitute anarchy for necessary restraints and control over anti-social elements of the people.

I hope that we reached the bottom, and that future developments will go in the right direction.

Very sincerely yours,

W. J. WAGNER,
Professor of Law.

Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Law and Procedures, Committee on the Judiciary, U. S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: This is in reply to your letter of April 27, 1972, in which you invited me to testify or submit a statement for the record on Section 208 and Chapters 11 and 12 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code drafted by the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws.

In accordance with your invitation, I submit the following statement:

I. Sec. 208. Extraterritorial Jurisdiction: Your Committee may wish to consider two suggestions in relation to Section 208.

First, in subsection (h), I suggest that the word "territorial" be inserted before the word "jurisdiction". The insertion would help to clarify what I take to be the intention of your Committee, and would avoid possible ambiguities arising from the scope of the word "jurisdiction". Suppose, for example, that the criminal code of Japan were made applicable by its terms to all offenses committed by Japanese nationals anywhere in the universe. Under such a posture of Japanese criminal law, if a Japanese should assault a national of the United States in Antarctica, the act of the Japanese would constitute a criminal offense under Japanese law and subject him to prosecution by Japanese authorities if he should be apprehended. His offense, while committed outside the territory of Japan, would thus be within "the jurisdiction" of Japan as defined by Japanese law under the assumption of this hypothetical case. It would follow that the offense would not be "outside the jurisdiction of any nation' and therefore would not be punishable under subsection (h), unless the term "jurisdiction" in subsection (h) were interpreted to mean "territorial jurisdiction". The possible confusion can be obviated by making clear that subsection (h) is intended to apply only to offenses committed "outside the territorial jurisdiction of any nation".

Second, your Committee may wish to consider strengthening subsection (f) by an additional provision. A federal public servant or a member of his household residing abroad (or a person accompanying the military forces of the United States abroad) who commits an offense might seek to avoid punishment by remaining outside the United States after the expiration of the term of office (or the term of military service). In such a case, the offender would be beyond the reach of the process of American courts; and he might be in fact also free from prosecution by any other government either because of the terms of a status of forces agreement or other treaty or because such other government might be uninterested in prosecuting. To meet such a possible difficulty, your Committee may wish to consider a suggestion which, as I am informed, was made by the Department of Defense in another context. At a Hearing on the Operation of Article VII, NATO Status of Forces Treaty before a Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Armed Services, 91st Cong., 2d Sess., 7–8 (1970), I am informed that the Department of Defense recommended that the American military abroad be authorized to arrest civilians accompanying the military forces of the United States who may commit an offense abroad. Whatever reason Congress may have had for not adopting the recommended measure of the Department of Defense on that occasion, your Committee may wish to consider a comparable step in connection with subsection (f) of Section 208. Such a step would involve supplementing subsection

(f) by a provision authorizing the American military (or other U.S. public officers abroad) to arrest a federal public servant, a member of his household, or a person accompanying the military forces of the United States who commits an offense in the contemplation of subsection (f) and to return such offender promptly to the United States for trial in a federal court. Manifestly, such a power of arrest could be exercised only when it is authorized by a status of forces agreement or some other treaty with the nation in the territory of which the offense took place. Such a provision would appear to be constitutional so long as the actual prosecution in each case is conducted in a federal court in accordance with the established constitutional procedures.

II. Chapter 12, Sec. 1204: As Section 1204 now reads, it seems to me to contain obscurities that should be clarified. Take, for example, the effect of Section 1204 on 22 USC §287c(b), referred to in clause (c) of subsection (2) of Section 1204. At present, 22 USC §287c(b) provides a penalty for any violation of its provisions by imprisonment up to ten years and by a fine up to $10,000. Sec. 1204 provides that any person who violates 22 USC §287c(b) "with intent to conceal a transaction from a government agency . . . or with knowledge that his unlawful conduct substantially obstructs, impairs or perverts the administration of the statute . . ." shall be guilty of a Class C felony. Under Section 3201 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code, a Class C felony may be punished by imprisonment for no more than seven years. Thus, it would appear to follow that the term of permissible imprisonment under 22 USC §287c(b) would be reduced by Section 1204 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code from a maximum of ten years to a maximum of seven years if the offense is committed "with intent to conceal a transaction from a government agency . . . or with knowledge that his unlawful conduct substantially obstructs, impairs or perverts the administration of the statute . . ." Suppose, however, that a person should violate 22 USC §287c(b) without such an intent "to conceal a transaction", etc. and without "knowledge that his unlawful conduct substantially obstructs", etc. What then? Section 1204 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code is silent on the point. In consequence, if Section 1204 and 22 USC §287c(b) are read together and applied literally, a court might well conclude that the original ten year maximum imprisonment of 22 USC §287c(b) still applies, absent the "intent to conceal", etc. and absent the "knowledge that his unlawful conduct substantially obstructs", etc. It appears to me, therefore, that Section 1204 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code requires an additional provision to make clear what the effect will be of a violation of any of the statutes listed in subsection (2) when the person committing the violation does so without any "intent to conceal a transaction", etc. and without any "knowledge that his unlawful conduct substantially obstructs", etc.,

I hope that these comments may be helpful.

Sincerely yours,

MILTON KATZ.

TRIBUNAL DE GRANDE INSTANCE DE PARIS,
Paris, France, March 11, 1972.

Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I received on March 8 your kind letter of March 3, 1972. Thank you for showing interest in comparative law and for sending me your questionnaire.

Unfortunately the deadline for the answers being March 17 it is out of my capacity to make available to your committee any valuable material on the French penal law. Although I limited myself to the first three questions, I realize that my answers on these questions are incomplete or inadequate.

Should your committee still be interested in receiving information at a later date, would you please let me know. I could more easily work at leisure on the questionnaire during the summer, when our courts are out of sessions.

My late husband was American and until a recent date, and for five happy years, I lived with him in the United States. I have retained close ties with your country, was back there last summer and will probably return in 1973 to spend my summer vacation there. Yet my command of English was never too good, so that I feel more at ease to answer the questionnaire in French.

With kindest regards,

Sincerely yours,

GENEVIEVE SUTTON.

ANSWER TO QUESTION 1

Le droit pénal français a été codifié sous le Premier Empire dans deux codes, qui depuis, et récemment encore, ont été à diverses reprises complétés et rénovés sans toutefois qu'on ait procédé à une révision complète de ces codifications. Leur structure est donc ancienne, et nombre de lois postérieures à la codification d'origine n'ont pas été incorporées dans ces codes. (N.B. droit pénal = penal law, loi = statute).

Le "Code pénal" date de 1810, le "Code de procédure pénale" date de 1808. C'est le Code pénal qui serait l'équivalent de votre Penal Code. Il comporte 477 articles (sections), répartis en "dispositions préliminaires", et troit Livres. Il contient:

1° la partie générale du droit pénal, c'est à dire les règles générales relatives à l'infraction (offense), au délinquant, à la peine. Cette partie générale, est contenue dans les "dispositions préliminaires", le Livre I et le Livre II, est la plus courte (74 articles). Une des bases du droit pénal général est la classification des infractions en trois catégories en fonction des peines qui leur sont applicables: les "crimes", punissables de peines criminelles; les "délits", punissables de peines correctionnelles; les "contraventions", punissables de peines de police.

2° la partie spéciale du droit pénal: definition de chacune des infractions et énoncé des peines applicables à chacune d'elles. Ceci fait l'objet du Livre III et du Livre IV et va de l'article 75 à l'article 477.

Tout ce qui concerne la procédure pénale (y compris les règles concernant les preuves), l'organisation des juridictions (courts) et leur compétence (jurisdiction), les voies de recours contre les décisions de ces juridictions et l'exécution des sentences est l'objet du Code de procédure pénale (801 articles).

Votre projet de code (proposed code) contient des dispositions qui en France ne feraient pas partie du Code pénal mais du Code de procédure pénale: ainsi vos chapitres 2, 7 et presque toutes les dispositions des chapitres 31, 32, 33 et 34 seraient en France contenues dans le Code de procédure pénale.

En ce qui concerne notre Code pénal, les "articles" en sont beaucoup plus brefs que vos sections. Le style du code est très condensé, les définitions rentrent rarement dans les détails. Ainsi l'article 2 concernant la tentative (attempt) définit celle-ci en moins de cinq lignes, la légitime défense (self defense) est traitée en deux articles (art. 328 et 328), totalisant dix lignes. Il en résulte que le Code laisse une grande marge à l'interprétation judiciare. L'unification du droit pénal sur tout le territoire français ne tient pas seulement à l'unité de la loi applicable mais en outre à l'unification qu'assure la Cour de Cassation: cette cour suprême, par le contrôle qu'elle exerce sur les décisions des juridictions de premier degré et des cours d'appel vérifie que l'application, par ces juridictions, de la loi pénale est bien conforme au texte de la loi et aux intentions du législateur. La jurisprudence des tribunaux (premier degré), des cours d'appel et de la Cour de Cassation évolue, naturellement, au cours des âges, mais de façon harmonieuse, grâce surtout au rôle de la Cour de Cassation.

Votre soin de faire un code extrêmement minutineux et détaillé démontre de votre part un très légitime souci d'assurer le strict respect du principe de la "légalité", mais l'on peut se demander si votre code laissera suffisamment de marge d'interprétation aux tribunaux (courts) pour permettre l'evolution du droit pénal en fonction de l'évolution des idées et des moeurs, et si le Congrès n'aura pas sans cesse à modifier les textes du Code.

ANSWER TO QUESTION 2

La structure de votre projet de code est moderne et très pratique, analogue au système que nous adoptons pour nos bibliothèques (libraries—système décimal, Dewey).

En raison de son ancienneté la structuration de notre Code pénal est beaucoup moins commode. Les matières n'y sont pas toujours présentées dans un ordre logique, et, surtout, la numération des articles y est faite sans laisser de numéros en blanc à la fin des chapitres et des paragraphes, permettant l'insertion ultérieure, à leur place logique, de dispositions nouvelles. C'est pourquoi, lorsqu'il veut compléter un article du Code par un article nouveau traitant du même sujet, le législateur répète le mêmo numéro en y ajoutant un chiffre distinguant le nouvel article de celui qui le précède. Par exemple, à l'article 334 définissant et réprimant le proxénétisme on a, en 1946, ajouté un article numéroté 334–1 visant une forme aggravée de proxénétisme.

Votre système de numérotation me paraît excellent, et, puisque votre projet de code tend à être exhautif et que, pour faire évoluer le droit en fonction de l'évolution de la société, le Congrés sera, j'imagine, appelé fréquemment à ajouter des dispositions nouvelles, je ne crois pas que vous ayez laissé trop de "blancs".

Answer to Question 3

Il n'y a pas dans le Code pénal français de dispositions générales sur la faute, élément moral de l'infraction, ni de définitions des différents degrés de faute. Cependant, en étudiant la définition de chacune des infractions spécifiquement visées par le Code, on découvre qu'il existe, du point de vue du degré de la faute (élément moral) requise pour que l'infraction soit constituée, diverses sortes d'infractions :

A.—infractions non intentionnelles, constituées alors même qu'il n'y a pas eu intention de causer un dommage :

(1) infractions dites "matérielles" : ce sont la plupart des contraventions, par exemple les contraventions aux règles concernant la circulation routière (traffic offenses). Cependant même en de tels cas l'infraction n'est constituée que s'il y a eu au moins volonté de commettre le fait matériel incriminé ; l'infraction n'existerait pas, il n'y aurait ni incrimination ni poursuites possibles, si la volonté était absente par suite de la démence (insanity) ou de la contrainte (duress).

Charge de la preuve : en de telles infractions la volonté (de commettre le fait matériel) est présumée. A celui qui invoque l'absence de volonté d'en faire la preuve.

(2) infractions par "imprudence" : Pour que l'infraction soit constituée il faut qu'il y ait eu non seulement la volonté de commettre le fait matériel mais en outre imprudence à avoir agi ainsi. Cependant le dommage lui-même n'a été ni voulu, ni même. Exemples : —le délit de blessures involontaires (negligent assault) —le délit d'homicide involontaire (reckless manslaughter, negligent homicide).

Les articles du Code pénal prévoyant ces délits visent "la maladresse, l'imprudence, l'inattention, la négligence ou l'inobservation des règlements", aucun de ces mots n'étant défini. Il s'agit, en résumé, de faits d'homicide ou de blessures commis par imprudence, que l'expansion industrielle et le développement de l'automobile ont évidemment multipliés.[1]

Charge de la preuve : c'est à l'autorité de poursuite (prosecution) de prouver la faute d'imprudence commise par l'auteur du fait matériel dommageable.

B.—infractions intentionnelles.

(1) Tous les "crimes" et la très grande majorité des "délits" nécessitent pour être constitutés qu'il y ait en chez l'auteur une intention coupable, c'est-à-dire une intention d'atteindre un certain résultat dommageable spécifique à l'infraction. Voici des exemples :

Délit de coups et blessures volontaires (willful assault) : il faut qu'il y ait eu intention de blesser.

Délit de vol : il faut que la soustraction (élément matériel) de la chose d'autrui ait été commise "frauduleusement". Le Code ne définit pas le mot "frauduleusement". Selon la jurisprudence, "frauduleusement" signifie que l'auteur de la soustraction savait que la chose ne lui appartenait pas et qu'il l'a prise sans que le propriétaire de la chose y consente.

Crime de meurtre (2d degree murder) : homicide commis dans l'intention de tuer.

(2) Il peut y avoir un degré plus élevé d'intention coupable : la préméditation. Exemple : le crime d'assassinat (1st degree murder).

---

Charge de la preuve: pour toutes les infractions intentionnelles, c'est évidemment à l'autorité de poursuite de prouver l'existence de l'intention coupable spécifique à l'infraction poursuivie.

LE PROJET DE CODE PÉNAL FÉDERAL DES ESTATS-UNIS

(Par Geneviève Sutton, Juge au Tribunal de grande instance de Paris)

Le 8 novembre 1966 le Congrès vota le principe d'une révision fondamentale du droit pénal fédéral et confia à une commission, qui devait être spécialement constituée à cet effet, le soin de lui soumettre un projet législatif dans le délai de trois années.

La commission devait comprendre trois members, dont un président, nommés par le président des Etats-Unis, trois sénateurs désignés par le président du Sénat, trois membres de la Chambre des représentants choisis par le président de cette Chambre, et trois juges fédéraux, dont un de cour d'appel et deux d'une juridiction de première instance, nommés par le ministre de la Justice. L'acte du Congrés disposait qu'aucune des trois premières caatéparti politique . . . . louable souci de ménager un certain pluralisme de tendances qui, effectivement, allait inspirer les travaux de la commission et dont le texte du projet porte en divers endroits la marque.

Par ailleurs, la composition de la commission allait offrir l'avantage d'associer étroitement législateurs et praticiens du droit. Les six parlementaires choisis par le Congrès furent des membres des Commissions judiciaires de leurs Chambres respectives. Les trois juristes que nomma le président Johnson étaient des avocats en exercise ; celui d'entre eux qui fut désigné pour présider la commission, M. Edmund G. Brown, s'était acquis une juste réputation de compétence dans les fonctions successives de procureur du District de San Francisco, de procureur général de la Californie, puis de gouverneur de cet Etat. Le reste de la commission fut, on l'a dit, composé de juges en fonction. Encore faut-il préciser que l'acte législatif de 1966 mettait à sa disposition des crédits suffisants pour qu'elle puisse s'adjoindre à titre permanent le concours d'un rapporteur général-directeur des travaux, aidé d'un corps d'assistants de recherche et d'un secrétariat administratif, et pouvant faire appel aux conseils de juristes éminents, dont des universitaires. La commission se choisit en la personne de M. Louis B. Schwartz, professeur à l'Université de Pennsylvanie, un rapporteur et directeur particulièrement qualifié. Ajoutons enfin que la commission devait s'assurer la collaboration d'un comité consultatif officiel de quinze membres, lequel fut également composé de praticiens et théoriciens du droit, dont l'honorable Tom C. Clark, président, juge honoraire de la Cour suprême des Etats-Unis, et le doyen Louis H. Pollak, de l'Ecole de droit de Yale.

Cependant, quelles que fussent l'importance et la haute qualité des concours dont elle disposait, la commission se voyait impartir une mission si vaste qu'elle dut, en cours de travaux, en restreindre la portée, éliminant notamment de son propos la réforme de la procédure pénale. Et encore lui fallut-il faire proroger d'une année, jusqu'au 8 novembre 1970, le délai fixé par le Congrès pour mener à bien l'œuvre entreprise.

C'est donc dans le courant de l'été 1970 que parut finalement le projet de code, fruit de quatre années de travail intensif. Sa publication fut accompagnée de celle de deux gros volumes de working papers, rendant compte des nombreuses recherches, études et consultations effectuées. La commission toutefois ne considéra pas alors son texte comme définitif : il s'agissait d'un "avant-projet" dont elle addressa des milliers d'exemplaires aux parlementaires, juges féderaux, représentants du ministre public, members des barreaux, professeurs de droit, etc., en vue de susciter leurs avis. Aussi chaque article du texte publié en 1970 comporte-t-il, à sa suite, un précieux commentaire du professeur Schwartz destiné à éclairer le lecteur. En outre, sur plusieurs points controversés, au sujet desquels la commission reste partagée, le texte propose plusieurs solutions de rechange. C'est finalement le 7 janvier 1971 qu'aprés l'avoir modifié sur plusieurs points, la commission saisit officiellement de son projet le président et la Congrès [1].

A plus d'un titre le texte proposé est source d'intéressantes réflexions pour le lecteur français. Il exprime bien le puissant courant de codification qui, depuis peu, tend à bouleverser le visage traditionnel du droit pénal américain. Par ailleurs, au regard de nos habitudes centralisatrices et de notre conception d'un droit unitaire, nous y trouvons l'occasion de mieux cerner, dans une nation encore très décentralisée, le rôle du pouvoir fédéral et de sa législation . . . rôle en principe exceptionnel mais qui tend à le devenir de moins en moins, sous la pression d'une évolution apparemment irréversible, quelque regret qu'en aient les tenants nostalgiques de la primauté des States' Rights. A d'autres égards encore, l'histoire récente, on les préoccupations sociales de l'heure— qui ne sont pas toujours propres aux Estats-Unis—sont inscrites on filigrane on les sent présentes, par exemple, au travers des développements consacrés aux épineux problèmes de la réglementation des armes à feu ou de la lutte contre les stupéfiants.

Dans leurs avant-propos et commentaire général, le président Brown et le professeur Schwartz soulignent l'intérêt historique du project présenté: c'est la première tentative du pouvior fédéral de fondre en un ensemble logiquement norganisé et exhaustif un droit pénal jusqu'à présent "cahotique", résultant de statuts multiples et souvent contradictoires. Les dernières codifications, pures compilations de textes, dont certaines formulations remontent au Moyen Age, ne présentent ni classement des infractions— additionées sans ordre, si ce n'est alphabétique—, ni classement des peines. Elles ne contiennent aucune disposition d'ensemble des règles du droit pénal général et comportent même en la matière d'importantes lacunes, touchant par exemple aux questions de la légitime défense, de l'aliénation mentale, du cumul des infractions et des peines, négligées par le législateur et dont la solution est laissée au hazard des constructions divergentes des Cours d'appel.

Le projet, à l'instar du Model Penal Code élaboré il y a une dizaine d'années par l'American Law Institute, dont il s'inspire sur plus d'un point, et de codes récemment promulgués dans quelques rares Etats, forme au contraire un tout solidement charpenté et logiquement construit.[1] Innovation dans le domaine du droit fédéral, il pourra aussi, comme le souhaitent ses auteurs, fournir un modèle aux législateurs des Etats.

Il s'agit d'un code tripartite. La Partie A, groupant les chapitres 1er à 7, est consacrée au droit pénal général, dans lequel est du reste inclus un chapitre fondamental concernant la compétence fédéral; la Partie B, des chapitres 10 à 18, contient tout le droit pénal spécial; la Partie C, des chapitres 30 à 36, traite des peines.

Chaque chapitre est subdivisé en articles dits sections. Le code en contient quelque quatre cent soixante, alors que le premier article, qui relève du chapitre 1er port le numéro 101 et que le dernier est l'article 3605 (relevant du chapitre 36). C'est dire que la présentation est entièrement fondée sur le système du "classement décimal" qui permet de grouper, sous la même décimale, tous les articles traitant de mitières voisines, tout en laissant subsister des l'articulation inteerne de toutes les matières traitées. On a l'impression que, de dispositions législatives nouvelles.

Cette forme rationnelle ne fait qu'exprimer la rigueur qui a présidé à l'articulation interne de toutes les matières traitées. On a l'impression que, résolument hostiles à l'incohérence du droit pénal actuel, les auteurs ont poussé jusqu'à l'extréme le souci de l'organisation. Un exemple parmi d'autres: au chapitre 3 sur de "fondement de la responsabilité pénal", l'article 302, long d'une soixantaine de lignes, énumère et explicite les quatre degrés possibles de fautes pouvant constituer l'elément moral de l'infraction: intentionally, knowingly, recklessly, negligently. Chacun de ces degrés étant complètement défini d'advance, on saura ensuite à quoi s'en tenir en retrouvant l'un ou l'autre de ces termes lors de l'examen de chaque infraction spécifique. Ainsi, au chapitre 16 des "attentats contre les personnes", peut-on aisément différencier le manslaughter (art. 1602), homicide commis recklessly, du murder (art. 1601), où la mort aé té causée intentionally ou knowingly, et du simple negligent homicide (art. 1603).

Nul besoin non plus d'énoncer pour chacune des canduites incriminées les peines encourues: le législateur se contente d'indiquer la catégorie d'infractions dont elle relève. Le murder, par exemple, est une felony de classe A, le manslaughter une felony de classe B, le negligent homicide une felony de classe C. Dès le premier chapitre du code nous présentée une classification générale des infractions, complétée par une classification détaillée contenue au chapitre 30 concernant les peines en général. Cette dernière classification présente une répartition graduée des infractions en six catégories dont chacune comporte sa mesure de peine applicable. Il suffira donc de savoir de quelle catégorie delève telle infraction spécifique pour connaître les peines encourues.[1]

Tout aussi évident que ce soin d'organisation logique est le souci des auteurs d'être exhaustif. On pourra difficilement leur reprocher un silence ou une obscurite de la loi. Les définitions terminologiques aboundent.[2] Les dispositions de droit pénal général et la plupart de celles qui traitent des incriminations specifiques frappent par l'ampleur de leurs développements.

Ainsi la légitime défense, qui fait son entrée dans le droit écrit, est-elle aboundamment réglementée en cinq articles totalisant plus de cent soixante lignes (art. 603 à 607) . . . on songe au laconisme des articles 328 et 329 du code français! De même des conditions de la contrainte exclusive de responsabilité (art. 611, duress) et la tentative. Celle-ci, qualifiée d'infraction "générale", est toujours punissable. Venant en tête de la Partie B (droit pénal spécial), elle fait l'object d'un long article 1001, où se trouvent minutieusement définis le commencement d'exécution et le désistement volontaire.

Même attention des auteurs à décrire aussi complètement que possible le comportement constitutif de chaque infraction, ainsi que ses circonstances aggra-vantes. Indépendamment du vol avec violences (robbery, art. 1721), on a "fondu", dit-on, en quelques articles (art. 1731 et s.), sous la qualification unique de theft, une douzaine de textes disparates qui réprimaient divers modes d'appropriation frauduleuse de la chose d'autrui (vol, recel, abus de confiance, grivèlerie, extorsion de fonds, chantage), mais en fait le code consacre à cette infraction rénovée plus de deux cents lignes dont la majeure partie consiste en des définitions terminologiques. Les cinq degrés de gravité de ce theft—qui vont du crime grave de felony classes B à la simple infraction à peine punie et dicteron les peines s'imposant aux juges [1]—sont strictement définis en fonction, notamment, de la valeur de la chose indûment approprié.

[1] Le code prévoit trois catégories de felonies (A, B, C) qui, s'agissant par exemple de l'emprisonment, comportent respectivement des termes légaux de huit à trente ans (classe A), six à quinze ans (classe B), cinq à sept ans (classe C), deux catégories de misdemeanors dont l'une (classe A) peut être sanctionnée par un emprisonnement d'un an au maximum et l'autre (classe B) par un emprisonnement ne pouvant excéder trente jours. Ces cinq catégories sont dénommés crimes. Il en existe une sixième, dite des infractions (purement réglementaires), exclusive de toute peine d'emprisonnement.

En somme, il se dégage l'impression d'ensemble qu'en matière d'incrimination on a voulu réduire au minimum la part de l'imprévu . . . et de l'imagination. Le principe de la légalité y trouve, semble-t-il, sa consécration absolue. Mais quel sera dès lors le rôle de la jurisprudence dans l'évolution du droit pénal?

Pour les auteurs, une des grandes innovations de leur projet tient en un changement fondamental de perspective quant au mode de définition de la compétence fédérale. On sait que celle-ci est en principe une compétence d'exception, chacun des Etats gardant sur son territoire le pouvoir souverain d'assurer l'ordre tel qu'il l'entend, au moyen d'un droit pénal qui ne relève que de son propre législateur, de ses seuls juges et de sa police particulière.

Dès l'origin· il est vrai, certaines infractions affectant la vie de la nation comme telle relevaient exclusivement du domaine fédéral. Ainsi de la trahison, et des délits fiscaux et douaniers. S'il est vrai que ce domaine réservé demeure à l'heure actuelle relativement restreint, par contre sous la pression de l'histoire économique, politique et sociale, le pouvoir fédéral s'est progressivement intéressé, en s'attribuant une compétence concurrente de celle des Etats, à la répression des délits aussi communs que le vol, les attentats aux mœurs, etc. La base légale de cette immixtion de l'Etat fédéral dans des questions relevant normalement des autorités locales était le pouvoir propre au Congrès de légiférer en matière de relations postales, commerce inter-Etats et sur certains impôts. La raison profonde en était le besoin croissant, à mesure que se développaient les moyens de communication et que la criminalité prenait des dimensions nationales, d'assurer à la répression une plus grande efficacité. Il en résulta, dès la fin du XIX^e^ siècle et plus encore au XX^e^ siècle, une accumulation de textes votés par le Congrès, créant—à partir d'infractions de droit commun échappant jusqu'alors à la compétence fédérale—des incriminations fédérales dont le seul élément qui fût défini était le critère fondant la compétence nouvelle, par exemple l'utilisation de la poste (service fédéral) dans la réalisation d'une escroquerie. C'est dire qu'en fonction d'un critère externe, un même comportement criminel pouvait se trouver sanctionné par des textes législatifs divers, plus ou moins répressifs, votés à des années d'intervalle, ajoutant l'un après l'autre un nouveau cas d'intervention et créant, ce faisant, une nuvelle infraction fédérale.

Ainsi—mais selon un mode incohérent—le pouvoir fédéral est-il devenu l'auxiliaire des Etats dans la lutte contre la délinquance. Ce rôle du pouvoir fédéral a posé aux auteurs du code deux ordres de problèmes.

D'abord un problème de méthode, mais touchant le fond. Il convient de ne plus traiter le critère de l'intervention du pouvoir fédéral comme un élément intrinsèque de l'infraction mais de définir au contraire celle-ci en termes spécifiques du comportement incriminé, comme le ferait le code d'un Etat normalement compétent pour la réprimer, puis d'indiquer, chaque fois que l'infraction n'est de la compétence exclusive du pouvoir fédéral, le ou les cas où celui-ci devient compétent pour en connaître.

Le code continent donc—c'est l'objet de sa Partie B, la plus abondante—des dispositions de droit pénal spécial où se trouve définie chacune des multiples infractions retenues par les auteurs: quelques-unes sont toujours et uniquement de la compétence fédérale (crimes contre la sûreté de l'Etat, infractions fiscales et douanières, etc.), les autres, très nombreuses, ne le sont qu'à titre exceptionnel.

Au préalable dans la Partie A, générale, les auteurs énumèrent à l'article 201—de a jusqu'à l—les douze cas où le pouvoir fédéral peut se trouver compétent pour connaître d'une infraction normalement hors de son atteinte.

On se trouve donc devant deux sortes d'incriminations: d'une part celles qui emportent la compétence plénière de la justice fédérale—à leur égard aucune mention spéciale n'est indiquée à la suite de leur définition spécifique—, d'autre part celles, beaucoup plus nombreuses, qui ne pourront être poursuivies par le pouvoir fédéral que dans les cas expressément visés pour chacune par référence à l'article 201. Ainsi est-il prévu à propos du murder que celui-ci entraîne compétence fédérale dans les cas, a, b, c et l de l'article 201, c'est-à-dire lorsqu'il a été commis sur un territoire appartenant à l'Etat fédéral, ou au cours ou à la suite immédiate d'un infraction relevant de la juridiction fédéral, ou lorsque la victime en a été le président des Etats-Unis, le vice-président, un membre du Cabinet ou de la Cour suprême ou un fonctionnaire fédéral agissant dans le cadre de ses fonctions,[1] ou encore lorsqu'il s'agit d'un meurtre commis dans des circonstances de piraterie.

A la réflexion on s'aperçoit que la presque totalité des incriminations possibles et imaginables en droit moderne sont prévues par le code et ne peuvent donc, à un titre ou à un autre, constituer une infraction fédérale. Il en sera toujours ainsi lorsque l'une de ces infractions a été commise sur un des territoires fédéraux, mais ceux-ci l'exception. D'autres critères spécifiés à l'article 201 contribueront, eux, à élargir considérablement le domaine du pouvoir fédéral, en particulier le critère b, visé à l'occasion d'un très grand nombre d'infractions et qui autorise l'intervention des autorités fédérales dès lors que les faits incriminés ont été commis au cours de la réalisation d'une infraction elle-même fédérale. Une telle extension présente, dans le contexte socio-politique actuel, un intérêt évident. C'est ainsi qu'à propos, par exemple, du délit fédéral d'entrave au libre exercice des civil rights (droits à la protection desquels Washington attache du prix), les autorités fédérales pourront se saisir d'affaires de meurtres ou de violences commis pour entraver l'exercice de ces droits au lieu que la répression en soit laissée comme à présent au gré des pouvoirs locaux.

Cependant les auteurs ont conscience des risques que présenterait une extension inconsidérée de la compétence fédérale : poussée à l'extrême elle compromettrait gravement la souveraineté des Etats, ébranlant le fondement même du régime. Comment donc restreindre aux seules circonstances où elle s'avère indispensable l'intervention du pouvoir fédéral ? . . . tel était le second problème à résoudre. Il ne suffisait pas de dresser une liste limitative des cas d'intervention (art. 201), puis d'indiquer pour chaque infraction dans lequel ou lesquels de ces cas elle pourrait être de la compétence fédérale. Celle-ci ne devrait être mise en œuvre que si, en fait, il y va de l'intérêt national. Il n'en est pas forcément ainsi, alors même que se présente l'un des cas de l'article 201. Que, par exemple, dans une affaire de vol de voiture, le véhicule ait franchi la frontière d'un Etat n'implique pas en soi la nécessité de l'intervention du pouvoir fédéral. Aussi—réserve faite des quelques infractions emportant compétence plénière et de toute infraction quelconque commise sur un territoire appartenant à l'Etat fédéral—chacun des cinquante Etats particuliers demeure-t-il en principe compétent à l'égard de l'une ou l'autre des multiples infractions visées par le Code fédéral du moment que les faits ont été commis sur son territoire et que sa propre législation les incrimine.

On est donc le plus souvent en présence d'une compétence concurrente du pouvoir fédéral et des Etats. En cas de conflit, lequel des souverains tranchera ? La suprématie du pouvoir fédéral est, pour la première fois, erigée en principe : l'article 207 reconnait formellement à ses autorités le pouvoir discrétionnaire de poursuivre ou de ne pas poursuivre l'infraction, selon qu'elles estiment qu'un "important intérêt national" est ou non en cause. Le texte spécifie qu'un tel intérêt existe notamment lorsque la délinquance apparemment localisée dans ses effets semble être en relation avec des activités criminelles organisées au delà frontières de l'Etat, ou que l'intervention fédérale est nécessaire à la protection de droits garantis par la Constitution (civil rights), ou que les pouvoirs locaux sont corrompus au point que l'application de la loi pénale en est compromise.

La concurrence des juridictions pose encore le problème de l'autorité, sur l'une, de la chose jugée par l'autre. Jusqu'à présent, en cas d'acquittement ou de condamnation par une cour fédérale du chef d'une infraction poursuivie d'abord devant elle, des poursuites ultérieures demeuraient possibles dans la plupart des Etats, à la discrétion du ministère public local : la règle non bis in idem s'imposera désormais à tous les Etats dans le cas d'une saisine antérieure de la juridiction fédérale. En corollaire, une condamnation ou un acquittement prononcés par la cour d'un Etat fait-elle obstacle à des poursuites ultérieures par les autorités fédérales ? En principe oui, à moins que le ministre fédédal de la Justice n'atteste que l'intérêt de la nation se trouverait gravement lésé par l'application de la régle non bis in idem. Cette particularité, issue d'une jurisprudence récente, consacre expressément encore la primauté de la compétence fédérale. En matière de droit pénal, comme en d'autres domaines, le centre de gravité semble bien se déplacer des Etats à l'Etat fédéral.

D'autres signes des temps se font jour à travers les dispositions du projet de code, en particulier dans sa Partie B consacrée au droit pénal spécial.

Dans une civilisation caractérisée par un extrême développement technique, de ses propres découvertes. La vigilance dans l'usage des choses s'imporant plus que jamais, le législateur est conduit à prévenir des compor tements virtuellement dangereux par la création d'incriminations nouvelles, telles le reckless endangerment (art. 1613), qui est le fait d'exposer autrui à la mort ou à un dommage corporel grave par un mépris téméraire du risque. Pour que soit réalisée l'infraction, il suffit que le danger existe, alors même qu'aucun dommage n'en est résulté. D'après le commentaire de l'article 1613, le comportement reproché peut recouvrir des actes aussi divers quel a conduite d'une automobile, le fonctionnement d'un barrage ou le maniement d'engins nucléaires. Dans un même ordre de préoccupations sera également punissable, sous le terme générique de release of destructive forces, le fait d'avoir causé volontairement un risque de catastrophe par explosion, incendie, inondation, avalanche, effondrement d'édifices, dissémination de produits toxiques, radioactifs ou bactériologiques alors même que la catastrophe ne s'est pas produite (art. 1704, al. 2).

Certains aspects problématiques de l'Amérique contemporaine ont particulièrement préoccupé les auteurs du projet.

En matière de moeurs, l'évolution des idées, l'extrême diffusion des mass media et l'influence de la publicité tendant à favoriser la plus grande licence que réprouve pourtant une fraction de l'opinion. La ligne de partage est délicate à tracer entre les conduites dont le jugement ne devrait relever que de la conscience individuelle et celles que les pouvoirs publics se doivent de réprimer. Si les auteurs n'hésitent pas à abandonner l'incrimination de plusieurs infractions anciennes, telles l'adultère et quelques attentats à la pudeur encore punissables dans certains Etats, leur embarras par contre ets évident en matière de ce que nous appelons "l'outrage aux bonnes mœurs": diffusion d'écrits, images ou représentations "obcènes". Ils savent qu'il n'existe pas à ce sujet de consensus général et qu'en outre une répression trop rigoureuse risquerait de porter atteinte à la liberté d'expression garantie par la Constitution. L'article 1851, qui définit l'infraction, s'inspire de disposition législatives existantes dans les limites de la "constitutionnalité" qu'en a tracées la Cour suprême et tend à bien circonscrire le champ de l'incrimination. Il semble cependant que la commission n'ait pas été unanime, certains souhaitant restreindre devantage encore le champ de la répression, du moins par le pouvoir fédéral. Des propositions de rechange sont présentées qui, au lieu de l'article 1851, ne sanctionneraient la diffusion d'écrits ou images obscènes que lorsque le réceptionnaire est un mineur de seize ans ou une personne non consentante.[1]

Autre sujet de préoccupation, l'usage toujours croissant de stupéfiants, qui finit par atteindre des milieux très divers et prend le caractère d'un fléau national. Les lois fédérales actuellement applicables sont complexes, incohérentes et ne réservent aux juridictions fédérales qu'une compétence d'execption. Parce qu'il est indispensable d'assurer sur tout le territoire une protection uniforme et efficace contre un danger dont l'exploitation a des dimensions nationales, le code attribuera à la justice fédérale compétence plénière à l'égard de toutes les infractions en matière de stupéfiants. Une telle extension du pouvoir fédéral trouve un fondement juridique dans le droit du Congrès de légiférer en matiere de commerce. La sévérité de la répression dépendra évidemment de la nociviteé du produit en cause, les substances dangereuses étant réparties, par des réglementaires, en trois catégories: produits toxiques très dangereux, produits dont l'abus peut être dangereux, produits pharmacentiques à usage réglementé. Le code montre en outre le souci de bien distinguer entre différentes sortes de comportements: simple détention, achat pour usage personnel, trafic d'habitude, les rigueurs de la loi étant réservées à ceux qui font commerce de la faiblesse d'autrui. Aussi les incriminations des articles 1822 à 1827 sont-elles très nuancées.[2]

[1] D'après le Mémorandum de M. Schwartz il apparaît que le projet définitif écarte, à son regret, ces propositions subsidiaires pour s'en tenir à l'incrimination assez large de l'article 1851.

Quant au phénomène de la violence, s'il n'est past nouveau, il a pris récemment les devants de la scène nationale et pose, entre autres problèmes, celui d'une réglementation plus rigoureuse et plus efficace des armes à feu. La liberté de les acheter, de les détenir et de les transporter n'est pas le moindre sujet d'étonnement du Français aux Etats-Unis. Jusqu'à une époque récente, seul était soumis à régmentation, par le pouvoir fédéral et une minorité d'Etats, le négoce des armesgle, sous lo forme notamment de licenses accordées aux commercants. Cette réglementation n'assurait, semble-t-il, aucum conerole réel de la détention des armes. En 1968, à la suite d'une série d'assassinats tragiques—on garde en mémoire ceux du pasteur King et du sénateur Robert Kennedy—il parut urgent de limiter radicalement, sud tout le territoire de la nation, le commerce et la détention des armes. Une réforme en ce sens fut proposée par le Gouvernement du président Johnson, mais ne trouva pas de majorité favorable au Congrés. Celui-ci se contenta, par deux textes successivement votés en 1968, d'un contrôle encore très partiel.

Quelle est la position des auteurs du code? Sur ce point aussi le texte révèle leur embarras. A titre principal on présente, sous les articles 1811 à 1814, des dispositions reprenant essentiellement la législation féderale déjà en vigueur, y compris la plus récente, de 1968: principe d'interdiction de la détention par des particuliers des armes les plus dangereuses (mitraillettes, bombes, etc.); obligation de déclaration s'imposant aux fabricants et négociants des armes à feu de toutes catégories, chaque arme devant être en outre numérotée et tout transfert déclaré; interdiction à certaines personnes (inculpés et condamnés, déficients mentaux, toxicomanes, etc.) d'acheter ou de détenir une arme; réglementation du commerce entre les Etats (afin d'éviter que des armes ne soient aisément introduites dans un Etat où leur vente est strictement réglementée, à partir d'un Etat où elle ne l'est pas). A l'égard des infractions à ces dispositions, la justice fédérale n'aura pas compétence plénière, ce n'est que dans certains cas (parmi ceux prévus à l'article 201, déjà mentionné) qu'elle pourra s'en saisir. Par conséquent, en une matière où la sécurité de tous est pourtant en jeu, l'Etat fédéral demeurera le simple auxiliaire de chaque Etat local auquel sera laissé le soin d'assurer sa police. Il est probable que la commission a hésité à aller au delà de ce que le Congrès avait accepté en 1968.

Cependant, outre les dispositions prévues aux articles 1811 à 1814, qui en définitive paraissent timides, le code offre, au choix, trois autres solutions visant à restreindre ou même interdire sur tout le territoire la détention de toutes armes à feu, quelles qu'elles soient. Ces propositions ne sont faites qu'à titre subsidiaire: sans doute n'ont-elles pas obtenu l'adhésion unanime ni même majoritaire des membres de la commission, ou ne s'est-on fait que peu d'illusions sur leur chances d'être adoptées par le Congrés.

Les dispositions réprimant l'émeute (riot) portent aussi la marque de l'actualité (art. 1801 à 1804). Elles s'inspirent principalement, en les harmonisant, de textes très récents dont l'un d'eux, de 1968, a pour la première fois autorisé l'intervention du pouvoir fédéral sur les territoires des Etats en vue d'y rétablir l'ordre. Les auteurs du code ont tenu à définir très précisément ce qu'il faut entendre par émeute, ou attroupement séditieux, et à doser autant que possible la répression en fonction des responsabilités individuelles engagées.[1] Ils soustraient expressément aux poursuites la simple présence sur les lieux de l'attroupement, remarquant qu'elle peut être le fait du hassard ou d'un désir de manifestation pacifique, et ne sanctionnent que modérément, sous la qualification de misdemeanor classe B, la participation au désordre si le délinquant n'a pas fait usage d'une arme. Le refus d'obtempérer, notamment à un ordre de dispersion, devient une infraction, mais elle est mineure et le texte prévoit à son sujet le principe de l'immunité des journalistes ou autres reporters. Ces deux incriminations n'emportent que très exceptionellement la compétence fédérale. Plus sévèrement punies sont la provocation à l'émeute (misdemeanor classe A) et surtout la fourniture d'armes aux participants (felony classe C), qui autorisent aussi plus largement l'intervention du pouvoir fédéral. Cependant, même à leur sujet, on retrouve le souci des auteurs de laisser aux Etats la responsabilité première de maintenir l'ordre sur leurs territoires. Ainsi, s'agissant de la provocation à l'émeute, lorsque la compétence fédérale est motivée par le fait que l'attroupement a été organisé en utilisant des moyens de communication entre Etats ou a comporté le passage de personnes d'un Etat à l'autre, encore faudra-t-il, pour permettre son intervention que le ministre de la Justice atteste qu'il y va de l'intérêt national parce que l'émeute a rassemblé au moins cent personnes et a trouvé d'importants appuis hors de l'Etat où elle s'est produite. Si le code n'attribue donc au pouvoir fédéral qu'une compétence subsidiaire de celle des autorités locales, du moins offre-t-il—c'est le voeu exprès de ses auteurs—le modèle d'une législation moderne, cohérente et nuancée, dont pourraient s'inspirer les parlements des Etats.

[2] Le trafic des substances de la première catégorie sera, par exemple, une felony classe B, alors que l'acht pour usage personnel de la marijuana, substance de in deuxiéme catégorie et dont la nocivité est très discutée aux Etats-Unis, ne constituera qu'une contravention mineure (infraction, non passible d'emprisonnement).

Un dernier trait, capital, de l'histoire politique intérieure des Etats-Unis retient encore l'attention. Il s'agit du mouvement en faveur des civil rights dont la consécration juridique est le fruit des efforts résolument déployés, depuis une quinzaine d'années, par la justice fédérale et le Congrès pour mettre un terme à la discrimination raciale.

En réalité il y a déjà un siécle que le Congrès a prévu la répression des atteintes aux libertés democratiques. Deux textes out été votés à cette fin dès les lendemains de la Guerre de Sécession. L'un d'eux incrimine la "coalition en vue d'intimider un citoyen ou de lui faire tort dans l'exercice d'un droit garanti par la Constitution et les lois fédérales", l'autre, le fait de "priver quelqu'un sous le prétexte de la légalité, d'un droit garanti par la Constitution et les lois fédérales". Mais dans la pratique, et pour des raisons plus ou moins juridiques, ces textes no furent qu'exceptionnellement appliqués. A une époque encore récente les cours fédérales reculaient devant leur formulation tout à la fois restrictive et vague (que fallait-il entendre par droits garantis par la Constitution et les lois fédérales?).

Le premier succès législatif du mouvement en faveur de l'égalité raciale fut le vote par le Congrès, en 1957, d'un premier Civil Rights Act, suivi de plusieurs autres échelonnés jusqu'en 1965. Ces différents textes, au contraire de ceux du siècle dernier, précisaient les droits fondamentaux dont le Congrès entendait protéger l'exercice: non seulement les droits électoraux, quels qu'ils soient, mais aussi ceux à l'égalité dans l'accès à l'emploi, au logement, à l'école, aux lieux ouverts au public, etc. Mais ils ne prévoyaient guère d'autres sanctions que civiles ou administratives. Cepedant, grâce à leur formulation spécifique des divers civil rights, ils ont offert aux juges fédéraux l'occasion de redonner vie aux deux vieux textes centenaires qui, eux, avaient été assortis de sanctions pénales.[1] Par sa jurisprudence novatirce, la Cour suprême a finalement incité le Congrès à compléter son oeuvre législative par des dispositions pénales visant à protéger de façon précise et efficace l'exercice des civil rights les plus variés. Ainsi fut voté, après deux ans de débats au Congrès, le Civil Rights Act de 1968.

C'est principalement de cette législation de 1968 que s'inspire le projet de code. Aux termes de l'article 1511 est coupable toute personne qui fait tort à une autre ou l'intimide à l'occasion de l'exercise de l'un quelconque des droits électoraux ainsi que de ses droits à être juré dans une cour fédérale ou à bénéficier d'un service fédérale (d'assistance, de prêt, etc.). Seront également passibles de poursuites les intimidations ou torts motivés par des "raisons de race, de couleur, de religion ou d'origine nationale", à l'occasion de l'exercise de droits très divers, énumérés à l'article 1512: droit de fréquenter l'école publique de son choix, de profiter de n'importe lequel des services ou activités dispensés par les administrations locales, d'être juré dans les tribunaux, d'avoir libre accès aux hôtels, restaurants, stations-service, salles de spectacle ou tous autres établissements ouverts au public, de solliciter un emploi ou d'adhérer à un syndicat professionnel, d'acheter, vendre ou occuper le logement de son choix, d'utiliser librement les transports en commun. Sont en outre réprimés les torts ou intimidations faits à ceux qui aident autrui à bénéficier des droits ainsi protégés, ou à ceux qui s'opposent, par la parole ou la manifestation pacifique, à la violation de ces droits.

Le projet de code ne prévoit que des sanctions relativement modérées à l'encontre de ces diverses infractions (misdemeanors classe A), mais il est à noter qu'elles sont toujours de la compétence fédérale et l'on sait que, par application de l'article 201–b, les autorité fédérales pourront désormais se saisir, en outre, de tous crimes de violences commis à leur occasion.[1]

La Partie C relative aux peines retient peut-être moins l'attention du lecteur français. Elle offre pourtant l'intérêt de simplifier le système pénal en vigueur et, en outre, de consacrer nettement, par plusieurs dispositions nouvelles, la tendance moderne à l'individualisation et au traitement.

Observons d'abord que les auteurs écartent en principe la peine de mort et l'emprisonnement à vie. Si leur projet est adopté par le Congrès, le droit fédéral se rangera donc parmi les législations abolitionnistes des Etats-Unis.[2]

Les seules peines désormais applicables sont la probation, l'amende et l'emprisonnement temporaire, lequel ne pourra jamais excéder trente ans. Ces peines sont indifféremment encourues, à titre principal, quelle que soit la catégorie de felony ou de misdemeanor dont relève l'infraction. Seule varie, en fonction de la catégorie, la mesure de la peine. Les crimes même les plus graves (felonies classe A) peuvent donc en principe n'être sanctionnés que par une amende.

La probation—mesure de traitement par excellence—se généralise : non seulement elle est désormais applicable à toute infraction, si sérieuse soit-elle, mais encore le code recommande-t-il d'en faire un large usage, en posant le principe que la "cour ne doit infliger l'emprisonnement que si elle l'estime nécessaire à la protection de la société", pour des raisons que spécifie le texte. L'actuelle disparité des sentences judiciaires en matière de peines, extrêmement variables d'une cour fédérale à l'autre, est soulignée par les auteurs.[1] Aussi formulent-ils, à titre indicatif, une liste de critères pouvant inspirer aux juges la décision de probation ainsi que les conditions dont ils pourront utilement l'assortir. Signalons à ce sujet une nouveauté : la faculté d'ordonner, dans le cadre de la probation, de courtes incarcérations à subir aux moments (nuits ou week-end, par exemple) que la cour estimera appropriés. Par contre la durée de la probation—qu'à présent le juge peut très librement fixer jurqu'à da réduire à un jour—s'imposera désormais à lui (un an pour les infractions, deux pour les misdemeanors, trois pour les felonies), mais une fois le condamné mis à l'épreuve la cour pourra évidemment mettre fin à la probation avant l'échéance du terme légal.

En ce qui concerne l'amende, le code attribue aux cours un assez large pouvoir discrétionnaire : dans la limite d'un maximum légal (qui varie selon la catégorie dont deléve l'infraction ou, éventuellement, le gain réalisé ou le dommage causé à la victime), le juge peut en fixer librement le taux, les modalités de paiement, avec la seule obligation, expressément édictée par le texte, de tenir compte des ressources due condamné. Il ne pourra par contre déterminer d'avance la durée de l'incarcération qu'entrainerait le défaut de paiement. Par la suite, pour tenir compte de circonstances nouvelles, le juge pourra réajuster l'amende primitivement infligée, en la réduisant, en modifiant les délais de paiement impartis, en allant même jusqu'à la supprimer.

Une des perspectives nouvelles, à vrai dire étonnante, élargit encore le champ de l'individualisation judiciaire : la faculté qui sera donnée aux cours de pro-

[1] Voir, supra, p. 356.

[2] Le dernier chapitre du code est cependant consacré à ces mesures extrêmes pour le cas où la commission, encore indécise lors de la publication de son projet, n'adopterait pas finalement une position abolitionniste. L'éventuel maintien de la peine de mort n'est envisagé qu'à titre très exceptionnel, avec un champ d'application considérablement restreint par rapport au droit fédéral en vigueur. Encore pourra-t-on toujours lui substituer l'emprisonnement à vie. Innovation de procédue : le choix entre l'une ou l'autre de ces peines devra faire l'objet d'une audience spéciale réunissant la cour et le jury. C'est ce dernier qui en décidera, après considération de toutes sortes de circonstances atténuantes et aggravantes dont le projet dresse la liste. Si le jury ne parvient pas à un verdict unanime, la cour ne pourra prononcer que l'emprisonnement à vie. En tout état de cause l'emprisonnement à vie n'est prévu qu'à titre de substitut de la peine de mort.

noncer—par décision très motivée et à condition que la condamnation ne soit pas prononcée pour felony de classe A ou B — l'élargissement pur et simple du pas prononcée pour felony de classe A ou B—l'élargissement pur et simple du amende.

En matière d'emprisonnement par contre, du moins par rapport au système fédéral actuel, lequel est analogue à celui de plusieurs Etats, le projet semble restreindre nettement les pouvoirs de la cour, jusqu'alors assez larges dans le domaine des longues peines. Dans les limites des minimum et maximum légaux, la cour se contentera de prononcer un maximum et n'aura plus, sauf cas exceptionnellement graves, la liberté de fixer un minimum avant lequel la parole (libération conditionnelle) ne saurait être accordée: désormais celle-ci pourra toujours, en principe, intervenir dès l'expiration de la première année d'incarcération.

Le code énonce la règle de l'indétermination de la sentence d'emprisonnement pour felony, mais il ne s'agit que d'une indétermination postjudiciaire, obtenue par le jeu de la parole entièrement laissée à la discrétion des boards of parole (commissions administratives). La seule limite imposée au pouvoir de ces commissions est que tout emprisonnement comporte une portion légale, dite parole component, qui devra être obligatoirement subie sous le régime de la parole. Plus grave la catégorie de felony dont relève l'infraction sanctionnée, plus longue la durée de parole component, car se sont les individus dont la délinquance s'est révélée la plus dangereuse qui doivent être plus longtemps soumis à des mesures de contrôle et d'assistance avant leur libération définitive.

Les marges délimitées par les minima et maxima légaux sont, il est vrai, assez larges, du moins en ce qui concerne les plus graves des felonies (huit à trente ans pour la classe A, six à quinze ans pour la classe B, cinq à sept ans pour la classe C). Cependant la cour ne pourra infliger de peines supérieures à ces minima que par décision très précisément motivée. Bien plus, des peines excédant vingt ans en cas de felony classe A et sept ans en cas de felony classe B ne pourront être prononcées qu'à l'encontre de délinquants reconnus dangereux pour la société (tels les "grans" récidivistes, les professionels du crime, ou les délinquants atteints d'anomalies mentales graves). La très longue incarcération ne peut en effet servir au reclassement et doit être réservée à ceux qu'il convient de mettre hors d'état de nuire.[1]

Quant à l'emprisonnement pour misdemeanor, les dispositions nouvelles le concernant reflètent la défaveur croissante des pénologue à l'égard des peines de courte ou moyenne durée, qui ne sont guère plus exemplaires que de très brèves incarcérations et ne peuvent assurer aucune fonction éducative. Les infractions relevant de la classe B ne pourront entraîner plus de trente jours d'emprisonnement, celles de la classe A—à moins de certaines récidives—ne devront pas être sanctionnées par des peines supérieures à une année, ou mieux, propose M. Schwartz, six ou même trois mois.[1]

Notons encore, pour en terminer avec les peines, une disposition très novatrice qui abuotirait à pallier l'absence, dans la législation fédérale comme à notre connaissance dans l'ensemble du droit pénal américain, de ce vieux moyen d'individualisation judiciaire que constitue chez nous "l'octrol des circonstrances atténuante". La cour pourra désormais, par une décision très précisément motivée, tenir compte des circonstances de l'infraction et de la personnalité du délinquant pour appliquer à une incrimination relevant de telle catégorie d'infractions les sanctions applicables à la catégorie immédiatement inférieure.

Dans l'ensemble, réserve faite de la parole dont le contrôle reste hors de la compétence des cours, le code fait donc une assez large place à l'individualisation de la répression par l'autorité judiciaire, à laquelle sont du reste donnés, préalablement à la décision sur la peine, certains moyens d'investigation de la personnalité. Mais en définitive la réforme la plus hardie nous parait être la faculté dont le juge disposera dans la plupart des cas de choisir à son gré entre des mesures aussi diverses que l'amende, la probation ou la peine privative de liberté.

[1] La durée, très réduite, de trois mois à toutefois été exclue du projet définitif soumis au Congrès.

[1] Ajoutons que le cumul des peines étant désormais strictement réglementé, on ne trouvera plus, du moins dans les pénitenciers fédéraux, de détenus purgeant d'étranges sentences de cent ans et plus d'emprisonnement.

[ANSWERS TO QUESTIONNAIRE]

Answer to Question 1:

The French penal laws were codified under the First Empire in two codes which have since then, and again recently, been complemented and renewed several times, but no complete revision of these codifications has been made. Their structure is therefore old and a number of statutes subsequent to the original codification have not been incorporated into these codes. (P.S.: droit pénal—penal law; loi—statute.)

The "Code Pénal" [Penal Code] dates from 1810; the "Code de procédure pénale" [Code of Criminal Procedure] dates from 1808. The Code Pénal would be equivalent to your Penal [Criminal] Code. It includes 477 articles (sections), divided into "dispositions préliminaires" [preliminary provisions], and three Books. It contains:

(1) The general part of penal law, i.e., the general rules relative to offense, offender, and penalty. This general part, which is contained in the "preliminary provisions" and Books I and II is the shortest (74 articles). One of the bases of general penal law is the classification of the offenses into three categories according to the penalties that are applicable to them: "crimes" punishable by criminal penalties; "délits" [misdemeanors] punishable by five days' to five years' imprisonment; "contraventions" [petty offenses] punishable by short-term imprisonment [if "simple", 1–5 days in prison] or a small fine.

(2) The special [specific] part of penal law: definition of each of the offenses plus penalties applicable to each of them. This is the subject of Book III and Book IV [sic] ranging from article 75 to article 477.

Everything that concerns penal procedure (including the rules concerning proof [and/or evidence]), organization of the juridictions (courts)* and their compétence (jurisdiction), means of redress against the decisions of these courts and the enforcement of the sentences, is the subject of the Code of Penal Procedure (801 articles).

Your proposed code [draft code—EBP] contains provisions that in France would not form a part of the Penal Code, but of the Code of Penal Procedure: thus, your sections 2, 7, and almost all provisions contained in chapters 31, 32, 33, and 34, would in France be contained in the Code of Penal Procedure.

As concerns our Penal Code, its "articles" are much shorter than your sections. The style of the code is very condensed; the definitions rarely go into detail. Thus, "article", 2 concerning "tentative" (attempt), defines this in less than five lines, "légitime défense" (self-defense) is dealt with in two "articles" (arts. 328 and 329) totalling ten lines. As a result, the Code leaves a wide margin to legal interpretation. The unification of penal law throughout the French territory derives not only from the unity of applicable law, but beyond that from the unification that the "Cour de Cassation" [Supreme Court of Appeal] ensures: this supreme court verifies, because of the control that it exercises over the decisions of the "jurisdictions de premier degré [courts of first instance] and of the "cours d'appel" [courts of appeal], that the application of penal law by these courts is well in compliance with the text of the law and with the legislator's intent. The body of laws set forth by the courts (premier degré) [of first instance], of the Courts of Appeal and of the Supreme Court of Appeal naturally has developed in time, but harmoniously thanks, especially, to the role of the Supreme Court of Appeal.

Your concern for making an extremely minute and detailed code shows a very legitimate solicitude on your part for ensuring strict respect for the principle of "legality", but one may wonder whether your code will leave the tribu- naux (courts) [the Bench] sufficient margin for interpretation to permit the development of penal law according to the development of ideas and mores, and whether the Congress will not have to modify the texts of the Code incessantly.

Answer to Question 2:

The organization of your draft code is modern and very practical, analogous to the system that we adopt for our libraries (libraries—Dewey decimal system).

By virtue of its age, the organization of our Penal Code is much less convenient. The subjects in it are not always presented in logical order and the articles in it are numbered without leaving blank numbers [spaces for extra numbers] at the end of chapters and paragraphs for subsequent insertion, at their logical place, of new provisions. That is why the [French] legislator, when he wants to complement an article of the Code by a new article dealing with the same subject, repeats the same number by adding to it a digit distinguishing the new article from the one preceding it. For example, to article 334 defining and suppressing procuring, an article numbered 334—1, relating to an aggravated form of procuring, was added in 1946.

Your numbering system seems to me excellent and, since your draft code tends to be exhaustive and since, in order to have the law develop according to the development of society, I imagine the Congress will frequently be required to add new provisions, I do not think you have left too many "blanks".

Answer to Question 3:

There are no general provisions in the French Penal Code on fault—the moral component of the offense—nor definitions of the different degrees of fault. However, by studying the definition of each of the specific offenses of the Code, one discovers that, from the point of view of the degree of the fault (moral component) required for the offense to be constituted various kinds of offenses:

A.—Unintentional Offenses, which are offenses even when there has been no intention to cause an injury:

(1)—So-called "material" offenses: these are the bulk of the contraventions [misdemeanors], for example, violations of the traffic rules (traffic offenses). However, even in those cases it is an offense only if there has been at least an intention to commit the material act as charged: the offense would not exist, neither crimination [indictment?] nor prosecution being possible, if the intention were lacking due to "démence" (insanity) or "contrainte" (duress).

Burden of proof: In such offenses the intention (of committing the material act) is presumed. [It is up] to the one who invokes the lack of intention to prove it.

(2)—Offenses by "imprudence" [negligence]: For the offense to be established, there must have been not only the intention to commit the material act, but, in addition, negligence in having so acted. However, the injury itself has been neither intentional nor even anticipated.

Examples:

—le délit de blessures involontaires (negligent assault),

—le délit d'homicide involontaire (reckless manslaughter—negligent homicide).

The articles of the [French] Penal Code providing for these offenses refer to "la maladresse, l'imprudence, l'inattention, la négligence ou l'inobservation des règlements" [blunder, imprudence or negligence, neglect, or non-observance of the rules], none of these words being defined. They are, in sum, acts of homicide or of injuries committed by imprudence [negligence] multiplied, obviously, by industrial expansion and the development of automobile [traffic].

Burden of proof: It is up to the prosecution to prove negligence committed by the author of the "material" injurious act.

B.—Intentional Offenses:

(1) All "crimes' and the great majority of "délits" [offenses or misdemeanors] necessitate, for being constituted, that the author had a culpable inten-

P.S. The Penal Code does not recognize different degrees of negligence. In fact, in the suppression of "homicides involuntaires" or "blessures [injuries] involontaires", the courts, in order to determine the penalty that they impose, take into account the degree of negligence that has caused the injury.

tion; i.e., an intention to achieve a certain tangible result that is specific to the offense. Here are some examples:

—le délit de coups et blessures volontaires (willful assault): there must have been intention to injure another;

—le délit de vol [theft]: the taking away of property of others must have been committed "frauduleusement" [literally: fraudulently—in bad faith?]. The Code does not define the word "frauduleusement". According to [French] jurisprudence, "fraudulently" means that the author of the theft knew that the property did not belong to him and that he took it without the owner's consent.

—le crime de meurtre [second degree murder]: homicide committed with the intention to kill.

(2) There may be a higher degree of culpable [sic—criminal?] intent: premeditation.

Example: le crime d'assassinat (first degree murder).

Burden of proof: For all intentional offenses, it is obviously up to the prosecution to prove the existence of the culpable [sic—criminal] intent that is specific to the prosecuted offense.

ETUDES ET VARIETES [SECTION OF THE REVUE]

Draft of a Federal Criminal Code of the United States

(By Geneviève Sutton, Judge, Tribunal de grande instance, Paris)

On November 8, 1966, the U.S. Congress initiated a revision in depth of the federal criminal laws by entrusting a commission, which was to be specially constituted to that effect, with the responsibility of submitting a legislative proposal to it within a period of three years.

The commission was to comprise three members: a chairman appointed by the President of the United States, three senators designated by the President of the Senate, three members of the House of Representatives chosen by the Speaker of the House, and three federal judges, one from the Court of Appeal, and two trial judges, nominated by the Attorney-General. The Act of Congress provided that none of the first three categories could include more than two members belonging to the same political party . . . , a commendable concern for injecting a certain variety of opinions which, in effect, was going to inspire the work of the commission and which the text of the proposal reflects in several places.

Moreover, the composition of the commission was going to present the advantage of closely associating legislators and practicing lawyers. The six Members chosen by Congress were members of the Judiciary Committees of their respective Houses. The three jurists appointed by President Johnson were practicing lawyers. Mr. Edmund C. Brown, who was designated as chairman of the commission, had made a reputation of competence for himself in his successive offices of District Attorney for the District of San Francisco, Attorney General for the State of California, and governor of that State. The rest of the commission was, as said before, composed of office-holding judges. It should also be stated that the act of 1966 made available to it sufficient appropriations for engaging the services of a full-time staff director, supported by a body of research assistants and an administrative secretariat, and for calling on the advice of eminent jurists, some of them university professors. The commission selected in the person of Mr. Louis B. Schwartz, professor at the University of Pennsylvania, a particularly well qualified director. Let us add, finally, that the commission was to ensure for itself the collaboration of an official 15-member advisory committee, which was likewise composed of practicing lawyers and legal theorists, such as the Honorable Tom C. Clark, chairman, former Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, and Dean Louis H. Pollak of the Yale Law School.

However, regardless of the importance and high quality of the assistance at its disposal, the commission found itself invested with such a vast mission that it had to narrow down the scope of its work by eliminating from its proposal the reform of criminal procedure. And it again had to have the deadline set by Congress for completing the job it had undertaken extended another year, i.e., until November 8, 1970.

So it was that the draft code, the fruit of four years of intensive work, finally appeared in the course of the summer of 1970. Its publication was accompanied by the simultaneous publication of two big volumes of Working Papers, accounting for numerous pieces of research, studies, and consultations that had been effected. The commission, however, did not yet regard its text as final: It was a "study draft" of which it addressed thousands of copies to members of congress, Federal judges, representatives of the Attorney General, members of the Bars, law professors, etc., with a view to obtaining their opinion. Moreover, each section of the text published in 1970 was accompanied by pertinent comments by Professor Schwartz intended to enlighten the reader. Furthermore, the text proposed, on several controversial points on which the commission was divided, several substitute solutions. Finally, on January 7, 1971, after having modified the text on several points, the commission officially submitted its proposal to the President and the Congress.[1]

On more than one title the proposed text is a source of interesting reflections for the French reader. It well expresses the powerful forces underlying the desire for codification which have recently changed the traditional look of American criminal law. Furthermore, with regard to our centralizing habits and our conception of a unitarian law, we find here an opportunity to discern, in a still rather decentralized nation, the role of the Federal government and of its legislation . . . , a role which in principle is exceptional, but which tends to become so less and less under the pressure of an apparently irreversible evolution, whatever regrets the nostalgic supporters of the preeminence of States Rights may have about it. In still other regards, recent developments or the social problems of the hour—which are not peculiar to the United States—are not fully spelled out: but one feels that they are present, for example, through explanatory sections devoted to the thorny problems of the regulation of firearms or the fight against narcotics.

Chairman Brown and Professor Schwartz underlined in their study draft and general comments the historic significance of the project: It is the first attempt of the Federal Government to blend into a logically organized and exhaustive whole a criminal law, that is presently "chaotic" as a result of multiple and often contradictory statutes. The latest codifications, pure compilations of texts, with certain formulations going back to the Middle-Ages, present neither a classification of offenses—lumped together haphazardly, though in alphabetical order—nor a classification of penalties. They contain no overall disposition of the rules of general penal law and imply missing links even touching, for example, on such important questions as legitimate defense, mental disease or defect, cumulation of offenses and penalties—questions that have been neglected by the legislator, their solution being left to the hazard of the divergent constructions of the courts of appeal.

The proposal, after the pattern of the Model Penal Code elaborated some dozen years ago by the American Law Institute, from which it is derived on more than one point, and of codes recently promulgated in some few states, forms, on the contrary, a well-knit and logically constructed whole.[2]
An innovation in the field of federal law, it can also, as its authors wish, furnish a model for state legislators.

The code has three parts. Part A, comprising Chapters 1 to 7, is devoted to general criminal law, in which also a fundamental chapter concerning federal criminal jurisdiction is included; Part B, Chapters 10 to 18, contains all of the special penal laws [specific offenses]; Part C, Chapters 30 to 36, deals with penalities [the sentencing system].

Each chapter is subdivided into articles, or so-called sections. The code contains some 460 of these, with the first section, which belongs to Chapter I, being numbered as 101 and the last section as 3605 (belonging to Chapter 36). This means to say, the presentation is wholly based on the "decimal classification" system, grouping under the same decimal all sections dealing with related subjects, while leaving gaps in the enumeration, which gaps will facilitate subsequent insertion at their logical place of new legislative provisions.

This rational procedure can best express the exactness that has been applied to the internal organization of all subjects dealt with. One has the impression that the authors, decidedly hostile to the incoherence of the present criminal law, have gone all out in their concern for organization. Just one example, among others: In Chapter 3 on the "basis of criminal liability", section 302 enumerates and explains in some sixty lines the four possible degrees of culpability that can constitute the moral component of the offense: "intentionally, knowingly, recklessly, negligently". Each of these degrees being fully defined in advance, one then knows how to find one or the other of these terms by examining each specific offense. Thus, in Chapter 16, "offenses involving danger to the person", one can easily differentiate among manslaughter (sec. 1602), homicide committed recklessly, murder (sec. 1601), or death caused intentionally or knowingly, and simple negligent homicide (sec. 1603).

There is no need to state the penalties incurred for each of the kinds of conduct of which a person is accused: The legislator is satisfied with indicating the category of offenses to which it [the penalty] belongs. Murder, for example, is a class A felony; manslaughter a class B felony; negligent homicide, a class C felony. As of the first chapter of the Code, a general classification of offenses is presented to us, complemented by a detailed classification concerning penalties in general, which is contained in Chapter 30. This latter breakdown presents a graduated classification of offenses into six categories, each of which shows the applicable size of the penalty. It will, therefore, suffice to know to which category a specific offense belongs in order to know the penalties incurred.[3]

As evident as this concern for logical organization is also the authors' concern for being exhaustive. They can hardly be charged with a silence or an obscurity of the law. Terminological definitions abound.[4] The provisions of general penal law and most of those that deal with specific charges are impressive by the fullness of their expositions.

Self-defense, too, which is making its entrance into written law, is abundantly regulated in five sections totalling more than 160 lines (sections 603 to 607) . . . we think of the brevity of Arts. 328 and 329 of the French Code! The same applies to the conditions of duress excluding criminal liability (sec. 611 [i.e., 610], duress) and or [criminal] attempt. This is qualified as a "general" offense and is always punishable. Discussed first in Part B (special penal law [specific offenses]), it is the subject of a long section, 1001, in which the beginnings of the attempt and the voluntary renunciation [of criminal intent] are thoroughly defined.

The same attention has been given by the authors to describing as fully as possible the behavior constituting each offense, as well as its aggravating circumstances. Except for robbery (sec. 1721), one has consolidated into a few sections (sec. 1731 et seq.), under the heading of theft, a dozen disparate texts that did away with various modes of fraudulent [illegal] appropriation of the property of others (theft [of property], receiving and concealing, abuse of confidence, cheating hotels and restaurants [theft of services], extortion of funds, blackmail); in fact the code devotes to this renewed offense more than two hundred lines the greater part of which consisting of terminological definitions. The five degrees of gravity of this theft—which range from the serious crime of class B felony barely punished simple infraction and which will dictate the penalties being forced on the judges[5]—are strictly defined according to the value of the unduly appropriated property.

In sum, the impression is obtained that in the matter of culpability the intent was to reduce the role of the unexpected . . . and of the imagination to a minimum. The principle of legality finds in it, it seems, its absolute justification. But what will then be the role of jurisprudence in the development of criminal law?

For the authors, one of the great innovations of their proposal rests in a fundamental change of approach to defining federal jurisdiction. We know that

[3] The code provides for three categories of felonies (A, B, C) which, if it is, for example, a matter of imprisonment, involves terms from eight to 30 years (class A), six to 15 years (class B), five to seven years (class C), two categories of misdemeanors, one of which (class A) may be punished by imprisonment of a maximum of one year, and the other (class B) by imprisonment not to exceed 30 days. These five categories are called crimes. There is a sixth category of so-called infractions (purely regulatory), exclusive of any prison penalty.

[4] They go so far as to specify, for example, what must be understood by "reasonably", "human being", "bodily injury", etc.

[5] See footnote 3.

this is in principle a special jurisdiction, each of the states preserving on their territory the sovereign power to maintain order, as it understands it, by means of a penal law that depends only on its own legislator, its own judges, and its own police force.

From the outset, it is true, certain offenses affecting the life of the nation as such fell exclusively within the federal domain, such as treason, tax evasion, and customs violations. Though it is true that this reserved field is at present relatively small, under the pressure of the economic, political, and social change, on the other hand, the federal government is progressively interested by claiming a jurisdiction concurrent with that of the states, in the suppression of offenses as common as theft, criminal assault, etc. The legal basis for this interference of the federal government in questions falling normally into the competence of the local authorities was the power belonging to Congress to legislate in postal matters, interstate commerce, and certain taxes. The underlying reason was the growing need, as the means of communication were developing and crime was attaining nationwide proportions, to make the suppression of offenses more efficacious. The result of it was—as of the end of the 19th Century and even more so in the 20th Century—an accumulation of texts passed by Congress creating—starting with offenses of common law up to then not coming under federal jurisdiction—federal offenses the only element of which that was defined was the criterion establishing federal jurisdiction when, for example, the use of the mails (federal service) was involved in obtaining something under false pretenses; i.e., according to an external criterion, the same criminal behavior could be subjected to punishment under various more, or less, suppressive legislative provisions passed years apart, adding, one after another, a new case of intervention and creating by so doing a new federal offense.

Thus, but in an incoherent manner—the federal government has become the auxiliary of the states in the fight against crime. This role of the federal power has presented the authors of the code with two sets of problems.

First, a problem of method, but a touchy one. It is advisable no longer to treat the criterion of intervention of the federal power as an intrinsic element of the offense, but to define it in specific terms of the behavior [with which the defendant is] charged, as the code of state normally having jurisdiction to suppress it would do, then to indicate each time the offense does not come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal power, the case or cases in which the government does have jurisdiction to take cognizance of it or them.

The code contains therefore—this is the object of its Part B, which is the most detailed part—provisions of special penal law in which each of the multiple infractions retained by the authors are defined: some come at all times and solely under federal jurisdiction (crimes against the security of the state, tax and customs violations, etc.), the others, which are very numerous, are so only by way of exception.

In Part A (general) the authors list first of all in section 201—from "a" to "l"—twelve cases in which the federal government may find itself competent to deal with an offense that is normally out of its reach.

We are dealing, therefore, with two categories of offenses: on the one hand, those that involve the plenary jurisdiction of the federal courts, no special particulars are indicated in regard to them following their specific definition —on the other hand, those, which are much more numerous, that can be prosecuted by the federal government only in the cases expressly referred to in section 201. Thus, apropos of murder, federal jurisdiction exists in cases a, b, c, and l of section 201, i.e., when it has been committed on a territory belonging to the federal government, or in the course, or as an immediate result, of an offense coming under federal jurisdiction, or when the victim of it has been the President of the United States, the Vice President, a member of the Cabinet or of the Supreme Court, or a federal public servant engaged in the performance of his duties, or when it is a murder committed under circumstances amounting to piracy.[6]

On further consideration one realizes that almost all of the possible and imaginable offenses in modern law are provided for by the Code and cannot, therefore, for one reason or another, constitute a per se federal offense. It will be operative when one of these offenses has been committed on one of the Federal territories, but these are the exception. Other criteria specified in section 201 will contribute to enlarging the domain of the federal government considerably, in particular, criterion b, aimed at a large number of infractions, which authorizes the intervention of the federal authorities when the acts charged have been committed in the course of carrying out an offense which in itself is a federal offense. Such an extension presents, in the present social and political context, an obvious interest. Thus, for example, apropos of the federal offense of impeding the free exercise of civil rights (on the protection of which Washington sets high value), the federal authorities can take cognizance of cases of murder or violence committed in order to impede the exercise of these rights instead of their suppression being left, as at present, to the discretion of the local authorities.

The authors, however, are aware of the risks that an inconsiderate extension of federal jurisdiction would present: Pushed to the extreme, it would gravely comprise the sovereignty of the states, and shake the structure of government to its very foundations. How then to limit the intervention of the federal government to circumstances in which it proves to be indispensable? . . . that was the second problem to be resolved. It was not sufficient to make up a restrictive list of cases of intervention (section 201) and then to indicate for each offense under which circumstances it might come under federal jurisdiction. This intervention should be brought into play only if, in fact, it is within the national interest. It is not necessarily so even if one of the cases set out in section 201 comes up. If, for example, in a case involving the theft of a car, the vehicle has crossed a state line, this does not in itself imply the necessity of intervention by the federal government. Also—except for some offenses implying plenary jurisdiction and for any offense committed on territory belonging to the federal government—each of the individual 50 states continues, in principle, to have jurisdiction with regard to one or another of the multiple offenses aimed at by the federal code as of the moment the acts have been committed on its territory and are punishable under its own legislation.

We are therefore most often faced with a concurrent jurisdiction of the federal government and that of the states. In case of conflict, which of the sovereign powers will settle it? The supremacy of the federal power is, for the first time established in principle: Section 207 formally grants its authorities discretionary power to prosecute or not to prosecute the offense unless [?blanked out] they hold that an "important national interest" is or is not involved. The text specifies that such an interest exists especially when the crime [?blanked out] apparently limited in its impact seems to be associated with organized criminal activities extending beyond state lines, and when federal intervention is necessary for the protection of rights guaranteed by the Constitution (civil rights), or when the local powers are corrupted [sic] to the point that the enforcement of criminal law is thereby prejudiced [sic].

The concurrence of jurisdictions also poses the problem of authority [. . . blanked out] of the case judged by the other. Up to the present, in case of acquittal or of [blurred] conviction by a federal court for an offense prosecuted before it, subsequent prosecution would, in most of the states be left [?blurred] to the discretion of the local prosecutor: The rule of protection against double jeopardy will from now on be imposed on all the states in the event of a prior [? blurred] of the federal jurisdiction [courts ?]. In corollary, will a conviction of an acquittal pronounced by the state court stand in the way of later prosecution by the federal authorities? In principle, yes unless the Attorney General certifies that the national interest would be gravely impaired by enforcement of the double jeopardy rule. This peculiarity, which has come out of recent jurisprudence, expressly confirms the preeminence of federal jurisdiction. In criminal law, as in other fields, the center of gravity seems to be shifted from the states to the federal government.

Other signs of the times come to light through the provisions of the draft code, in particular in its Part B which is devoted to specific offenses.

In a civilization characterized by extreme technological development, man who ventures to escape the command of his own discoveries is exposed to new dangers. As vigilance in the use of things is becoming more imperative than ever, the legislator is led to avert virtually dangerous behavior by the creation of new offenses such as reckless endangerment (section 1613), which is the act of exposing others to death or to serious bodily injury by a reckless contempt for the risk that is involved. For the offense to be carried out, it is sufficient that the danger exists, even though no injury has resulted. According to the comment to section 1613, the behavior taken exception to may cover acts as diverse as driving an automobile, the operation of a dam, or the handling of nuclear contrivances [sic]. Also punishable in this connection will be, under the generic term of release of destructive forces, the fact of having willfully caused a risk of catastrophe by explosion, fire, flood, avalanche, collapse of buildings, release of poison, radioactive material, bacteria, although no catastrophic results (section 1704, par. 2).

Certain problematic aspects of modern America have worried the authors of the draft particularly.

With regard to morals, the development of ideas, the extreme diffusiveness of the mass media, and the influence of publicity tend to favor the greatest license, which is rejected, however, by a segment of public opinion. The dividing line between forms of conduct whose judgment should depend only on individual conscience and those that the public authorities ought to suppress is difficult to trace. Though the authors do not hesitate to abandon the crimination of several former offenses, such as adultery and some forms of indecent assault [exposure], which are still punishable in certain states, their embarrassment is evident, however, on the matter of what we call "outrage aux bonnes moeurs" [public act of indecency]: the dissemination of "obscene" written materials, images, or shows. They know that there is no general consensus on this subject and that, moreover, too rigorous a suppression would risk infringing upon the freedom of expression which is guaranteed by the Constitution. Section 1851, which defines the offense, is derived from existing legislative provisions within the limits of "constitutionality" set by the Supreme Court, and tends to circumscribe properly the area of culpability. It seems, however, that the Commission has not been unanimous, that some wanting to restrict even further the field of their suppression, at least by the federal government. Proposals for redrafting section 1851 were submitted under which the dissemination of obscene written materials or images would be sanctioned only when the recipient is a minor of 16 [or under] or a non-consenting person [a person not chosing to be so exposed].[7]

Another subject of concern is the ever growing use of drugs, which is affecting very diverse groups and is assuming the character of a nationwide scourge. The federal laws that are applicable now are complex, incoherent, and reserve only an incidental jurisdiction for the federal jurisdictions [courts]. Because it is indispensable to assure on the entire territory a uniform and effective protection against a danger whose exploitation has nationwide dimensions, the code will confer plenary jurisdiction on the federal government with regard to all narcotics offenses. Such an extension of the federal powers finds a legal foundation in the right of Congress to legislate in matters of commerce. The severity of the suppression will obviously depend on the noxiousness of the product involved, the dangerous substances being divided, by the regulatory law, into three categories: very dangerous toxic products, products whose abuse may be dangerous, and pharmaceutical products for restricted use. The code shows, moreover, the concern for distinguishing properly among different kinds of behavior: simple possession, purchase for personal use, trafficking for profit, the rigors of the law being reserved for those who prey on the weakness of others. The degrees of culpability set out in sections 1822–1827 also are particularized.[8]

[7] From Mr. Schwartz's Memorandum it appeared that the final draft discards, to his regret, these proposals for substitution and sticks to the rather broad culpability set out in section 1851.

[8] The traffic in substances of the first category would, for example, be a Class B felony, while the purchase of marihuana for personal use, a second category substance whose harmfulness is widely debated in the United States, would constitute only a minor infraction (not punishable by imprisonment).

Through the phenomenon of violence is nothing new, it has recently dominated the national scene and poses, among other problems, that of a stricter and more effective regulation of firearms. The ease with which one can buy, possess, and transport them amazes the Frenchman in the United States. Up to quite recently, the firearms business was only subject to regulation by the federal government and a few states, in the form, especially, of licenses granted to dealers. This regulation does not seem to assure any real control of possession of firearms. In 1968, as a result of a series of tragic assassinations —we remember those of the Reverend King and of Senator Robert Kennedy— it seemed urgent to restrict the selling and possession of weapons on a nationwide basis. A reform to that effect was proposed by the Johnson administration, but found no majority in Congress in favor of it. Congress was content, by two acts passed successively in 1968, with providing for rather limited control.

What is the position of the authors of the code? On this point, too, the text reveals their embarrassment. They present provisions, principally those in sections 1811 to 1814, based esentially on Federal legislation already in force, including the most recent acts of 1968: prohibition of possession by private individuals of the most dangerous weapons (machine-guns, bombs, etc.); producers of and dealers in all categories of firearms having to report all transactions and each firearm having to be numbered and each transfer having to be declared; certain persons (charged and convicted, mentally deficient, drug addicts, etc.) being prohibited from buying or possessing a firearm; interstate commerce being regulated (in order to present easy introduction of weapons into a State in which their sale is strictly regulated from a state where it is not). With regard to the offenses under these provisions, the federal government has no plenary jurisdiction, it can only take cognizance of certain cases (as set out in section 201, mentioned above). Therefore, in a matter involving the security of all, the federal government will simply be the auxiliary of each state government, which will retain its own law enforcement. It is likely that the Commisson hesitated to go beyond what Congress had approved in 1968.

However, besides the provisions set out in sections 1811 to 1814, which seem definitely timid, the code offers a choice of three other solutions aimed at restraining or even prohibiting on a nationwide basis the possession of other firearms, whatever they may be. These are only minor proposals: They have no doubt obtained neither unanimous nor even majority consent by the members of the Commission, and one has no illusions on their chances of receiving congressional approval.

The provisions for suppressing riots also bear the stamp of reality (sections 1801 to 1804). By harmonizing them, they are derived in the main from very recent laws, one of which, dating from 1968, for the first time authorized the intervention of the federal government on the territories of the states with a view to restoring order there. The authors of the code were bent on defining very precisely what is to be understood by riot, or "attroupement séditieux", and on assessing responsibility as closely as possible according to individual participation.[9] They exclude from prosecution expressly the mere presence on the scene of the riot, noting that this presence may be due to chance or to a desire for peaceful demonstration, punishing only lightly, as Class B misdemeanor, participation in the disorder if the offender has not used a weapon. The refusal to obey, especially, an order to disperse, becomes an offense, but it is a minor offense, and the text provides on this subject for immunity to journalists or other reporters. These two offenses came only in very exceptional cases under federal jurisdiction. More severely punished are incitement to riot (Class A misdemeanor), and especially the supplying of arms to participants (Class C felony), which entail a more ample intervention of the federal government. However, even in this respect, we find the concern of the authors to leave to the states the primary responsibility for maintaining order within their territories. Thus, in inciting to riot, the federal government is brought in if the riot was organized by the use of interstate means of communications, or has involved the crossing of state lines by persons; but it will also be necessary, for federal intervention, for the Attorney General to certify that the national interest is at stake because the riot involves at least 100 persons and has found substantial support [sic] outside the state in which it occurred. If the code grants the federal power only a jurisdiction subsidiary to that of the local authorities, at least it offers—this is the express wish of its authors—the model for a modern, coherent, and well balanced legislation, to serve as a pattern for the state legislatures.

[9] The commenters note that recent events demonstrate that "petty" participants should be dealt with only lightly and according to summary procedures; it is also necessary, in maintaining order by the police force, avoid excesses that are likely to "cause an explosion" [of indignation] and to disaffect local opinion.

A last, but major feature of the internal political history of the United States is worth noting. It is the civil rights movement whose legal justification is the fruit of 15 years of determined efforts by the federal courts and Congress to put an end to racial discrimination.

In reality, Congress has provided for suppression of the impairment of the democratic freedoms. Two laws had been passed to that end since the War of Secession. One of them calls "coalition with a view to intimidating a citizen or to wrong him in the exercise of a right guaranteed by the Constitution and the federal laws" a crime; the other, the fact of "depriving anyone, under the pretext of legality, of a right guaranteed by the Constitution and the federal laws." But in practice, and on more or less legal grounds, these texts were applied only by way of exception. At an even more recent date the Federal courts recoiled from both their restrictive and vague formulation (what should be understood by rights guaranteed by the Constitution and the federal laws?).

The first legislative success of the movement for racial equality was the adoption by Congress in 1957 of the first Civl Rights Act, followed by several others spread out over the years up to 1965. These different laws contrary to those of the past century, specified the fundamental rights whose exercise Congress intended to protect not only as the rights to vote, whatever they may be, but also as the right to equality in applying for or enjoying employment, access to housing, to schools, to facilities open to the public, etc. But they provided more or less for civil and administrative penalties alone. However, thanks to the specific formulation of the various civil rights, they offered the federal judges an opportunity to revive two hundred-year old texts which had been coupled with penalties.[10]

Through its innovative jurisprudence, the Supreme Court finally spurred Congress to completion of its legislative work by providing criminal standards aimed at protecting precisely and effectively the exercise of the most varied civil rights. Thus, after two years of debate in Congress, the Civil Rights Act of 1968 was passed.

This legislation of 1968 serves mainly as the model on which the draft code is patterned. Under the provisions of section 1511, any person is guilty [of a Class A misdemeanor] who wrongs or intimidates another in exercising any of the voting rights, as well as of his rights to serve as a juror in any Federal court, or to benefit from a Federal service (of assistance, loan, etc.). Likewise subject to prosecution will be intimidation or wrongs motivated by "reasons of race, color, religion or national origin", in exercising various rights itemized in section 1512: the right to attend the public school of his choice, to benefit by any of the services or activities provided by the local administrations [sic], to serve as a juror in the courts, to have free access to the hotels, restaurants, service stations, motion picture houses, or any other establishments open to the public, to apply for employment, or to belong to a trade association, to buy, sell, or occupy the dwelling of his choice, to use common carriers without restraint. It is also an offense to wrong or intimidate those who help others to enjoy rights so protected, or those who oppose, by verbal expression or by peaceful demonstration, the violation of these rights.

[10] None [? . . blurred] of the most decisive interpretations dated from 1966 (Price case). As a result of the murder three years earlier of three civil rights movement militants in Mississippi, the Supreme Court upheld the intervention of the federal government in cases of deprivation of individual rights protected by a federal law.

The draft code provides only relatively light penalties for these various offenses (Class A misdemeanors), but it is to be noted that they always come under federal jurisdiction, and we know that, pursuant to section 201–b, the federal authorities can from now on take cognizance of all crimes of violence over which federal jurisdiction exists.[11]

Part C, relative to sentencing may be less interesting to the French reader. It offers, however, the advantage of simplifying the penal system now in force and, moreover, of introducing several new provisions reflecting the modern trend toward individualization and treatment.

Let us observe, first of all, that the authors discard the death penalty and life imprisonment on principle. If their draft is adopted by Congress, federal law will fall in with the abolitionist laws of the United States.[12]

The only penalties applicable from now on are probation, fine, and temporary imprisonment that can never exceed thirty years. These penalties are incurred in the main indifferent of what the felony or misdemeanor category may be into which the offense falls. Only the severity of the penalty varies according to category. Even the most serious crimes (Class A felonies) can, on principle, be punished by a fine only.

Probation—a treatment method par excellence—is generalized: Not only is it from now on applicable to any offense, however serious it may be, but the Code also recommends making broad use of it by posing the principle that "the court shall impose a sentence of imprisonment only if it deems it necessary for the protection of society" [sic], on grounds that are specified in the text. The present sentencing disparities in regard to penalties that are apt to vary extremely from one federal court to another, is underlined by the authors.[13]

They also formulate, by way of indication, a list of criteria that may prompt the judges to rule in favor of probation, as well as the conditions with which they can be usefully associated. On this subject, let us point out a novelty: the power to order, within the scope of probation, short prison terms to be served at times (nights or weekends, for example) that the court deems appropriate. On the other hand, the duration of probation—which at present the judge can fix very liberally up to reducing it to one day—will from now on be incumbent on him (one year for infractions, two years for misdemeanors, three years for felonies); but once a probationer [something mission . . . so warrants by his conduct?], the court can obviously terminate the probation before his time is up.

With regard to fines, the Code confers on the courts rather broad discretionary powers: The judge may, within the limits of a legal maximum (which varies according to the category into which the offense falls or, possibly, the [pecuniary] gain derived from or the [economic] loss caused to the victim), may set the rates, the methods of payment, with the single obligation, expressly states in the text, that the defendant's resources be taken into account. He cannot, on the other hand, determine the duration of the prison term that nonpayment would entail. As a result, in order to take new circumstances into account, the judge can readjust the originally imposed fine by reducing it, by modifying the [amount of each] installment, or even by suppressing it.

One of the new, truly amazing features further broadens the field of juridi-

[11] See supra, p. 356.

[12] The last Chapter of the Code is, however, devoted to these extreme measures in case the Commission, which was still undecided at the time of publication of its draft, would not finally adopt an abolitionist position. The possible upholding of the death penalty is envisaged only by way of exception, with a rather limited area of application as compared with federal law now in force. One can always substitute life imprisonment for the death penalty. A procedural innovation: the choice between one or the other of these penalties will have to be made the object of a special hearing, bringing the court and the jury together. It is the latter that will decide on it, after considering all sorts of mitigating and aggravating circumstances, which are itemized in the draft. If the jury does not reach a unanimous verdict, the court can only pronounce life imprisonment. In any case, life imprisonment is provided for only by way of substitute for the death penalty.

[13] It is one of the reasons why, on the occasion of this reform of the Criminal Code, they propose an important modification in regard to procedure: the court of appeal would from now on have jurisdiction for reforming—in any case, in the sense of mitigation—the sentences of the lower jurisdictions, which is exceptional in the United States.

ciary individualization: the power that is to be given to the courts to pronounce—decision setting forth in detail the reasons therefore and provided that the sentence is not pronounced for a Class A or B felony—a so-called unconditional discharge, without imposing even the slightest fine.

With regard to imprisonment, on the other hand, at least under the present federal system, which is analogous to that of several states, the draft seems to restrict the powers of the court, which have been quite broad in the area of long sentences. Within the limits of minimum and maximum terms, the court will merely pronounce a maximum term and will no longer have, except in exceptionally serious cases, the power to fix a minimum term beyond which parole cannot be granted: from now on a parole can be granted after the first year of the prison sentence has been served.

The Code spells out the rule of an indefinite sentence for a felony, but it is only a post-judiciary indetermination to be reached through the action of the parole being left entirely to the discretion of the Boards of Parole (commissions administratives). The only limit imposed on the power of these boards is that any imprisonment comprises a legal portion, or so-called parole component, which must be served under the parole system. The more serious the felony category under which the sanctioned offense falls, the longer the length of the parole component period; for these are the individuals whose delinquency was found to be of the most dangerous kind and who must be submitted to the longest to control and assistance prior to their final discharge.

The margins set by the minimum and maximum terms, it is true, are quite wide, at least as concerns the gravest felonies (eight to 30 years for Class A, six to 15 years for Class B, five to seven years for Class C). However, the court can impose sentences in excess of these minimum terms only by a decision setting forth in detail the reasons for the action. Furthermore, sentences in excess of 20 years in case of a Class A felony, and seven years in case of a Class B felony, can be pronounced only against criminals recognized as a danger to society (such as dangerous special offenders, professional criminals ["if he committed the felony as part of a pattern of criminal conduct", etc.], or criminals whose mental condition is seriously abnormal). A very long imprisonment cannot, in effect, serve their rehabilitation and must be reserved for those who should be prevented from harming others.[14]

As for imprisonment for misdemeanor, the new provisions for it reflect the growing disfavor of penologists with regard to short or medium term sentences, which are hardly any more exemplary than very brief incarcerations and cannot ensure any educational purpose. Class B misdemeanors cannot be punished by a longer than 30-day term; those falling into Class A—except for certain second offenses—are not to be sanctioned by penalties in excess of one year, or rather, as Mr. Schwartz proposes, six or even three months.[15]

To wind up our discussion of penalties, let us note also a significant innovation, that of "the granting of mitigating circumstances", an old device of judicial individualization. This provision would fill a gap in existing federal legislation as well as, so far as we know, in American criminal law as a whole. The court can from now on, through a decision setting forth in detail the reasons therefor, take into account the circumstances surrounding the offense and of the personality of the defendant, thus placing the offense into such a category the applicable sanction for which are that of the immediately lower one.

On the whole, exept for parole whose control is outside the jurisdiction of the courts, the code provides the Bench with quite a bit of room for individualization of its remedy, authorizing certain methods of investigation of the personality [of the defendant] prior to deciding on the penalty. But definitely the boldest reform seems to us to be the power that the judge will have in most cases of choosing at his discretion among measures as diverse as a fine, probation, or deprivation of freedom.

[14] Let us add that multiple or concurrently running sentences being strictly regulated from now on, we will not find any more, at least in the federal penitentiaries, inmates serving esoteric prison sentences of 100 years or more.

[15] The very brief term of three months has, however, been excluded from the final draft submitted to Congress.

菊田幸一
明治大学

はじめに

死刑制度の存廃を論ずるに際し、世論が死刑を支持しているから、これを廃止するのは時期尚早であるといったことがしばしばいわれる。現に法務省でも刑法全面改正作業の参考資料とする目的で、昭和四二年六月、総理府広報室に依頼して死刑に関する全国的な世論調査を行なっている。その結果は、死刑を存置すべしとする意見が七一%、廃止すべしとする意見が一六%あり、この数字は昭和三一年五月の同じ調査に比べて賛成が二%減少し、反対が六%ふえていると報告されている。(1)そしてこの結果は新聞紙上(たとえば、朝日新聞昭和四二年一〇月一四日朝刊)にも大きく報道され、刑法の全面改正を審議している法制審議会刑事法特別部会の第二小委員会にも重要な資料として提供され、(2)本年二月二、三両日開かれた刑事法特別部会が死刑存続の方針を決定するについても有力な資料とされた。(3)

そこで、総理府の世論調査が公表されたのを機会に第一に、単に新聞紙上の報告のみでなく、(5)報告書そのものを徹底的に分析してみる必要があること、(6)第二に、一般国民に対する「強制なき同調」により死刑の世論が利用されることに対抗するには、死刑制度に対するいわゆる自覚的集団である大学教授、裁判官、刑務官等に直接、死刑についての見解を求めてみる必要があること、第三に、専門家別に見解の相違を出すことによって、一般世論との対比をすることで、死刑制度に対する意識を明確にできるのではないかという仮説のもとに、総理府の行なった同じ質問様式により、アンケートを求めることにした。(8)

しかし、われわれの調査による有効回収数は総計一二八名である。総理府の有効回収数二五〇〇名にははるかに及ばない。したがって、これだけの資料で総理府の世論調査と対比することが可能かどうかについては統計専門家の判断を求めなければならない。(9)しかし、いわゆる自覚的集団であるこれらの各専門家について少なくとも、刑法学者については全員、裁判官については二五名に一人の割合でアンケートを求めたことで一応、第一次報告とすることは許されると思う。(10)むろん、その意味でこの調査はいわばパイロット・リサーチであり、このあと、さらに本格的な調査をしたいとかんがえている。本調査に際し、アンケートに回答をよせられた刑法学者、裁判官、そして刑務官の方がたに感謝の意を表したい。

(5) 朝日新聞(昭和四二年一〇月一四日朝刊)によれば、「七割が死刑反対——世界の大勢と違う結果」との見出しで「……ひとくちにいえば『世論』の七割までが死刑廃止に反対していることがこの調査ではっきりした。欧米諸国の最近の傾向とは逆に、わが国にはなお、死刑存続の意見の根強いことが注目される……」とのべている。はたしてかように単純にいえるかどうかが問題であろう。

(6) 奥村誠・前掲論文は単に同報告書の要旨を紹介したものである。

(7) 筆者がかような仮説を実証しようと意図するにいたったのには木村亀二教授の「法務省の調査の結論として、死刑存置論者の数が七二%あり、昭和三一年の調査の時よりも六%増加したことが、大々的に報ぜられた。存置論者は、さぞ、自己の見解の賛成者が増えたと考えて、喜ろこんだかもしれない。しかし、この調査は全国二億余りの人口中、二十歳以上の男女たった三千人を対象としたにとどまり、しかも、その人々が、どの程度死刑について認識していたか不明である。むしろわたくしは、かねてから、全国の矯正職員、裁判官、検察官、警察職員、刑事専門の弁護士、刑法学者を対象として、年齢の区別、死刑執行の経験があるか、執行に立会ったことがあるか、死刑を言渡したり、求刑した経験があろか否か等を明らかにして調査してみると、はるかに重要で有意義な結論が出るのではないかと考えている……」(法学セミナー、昭和四二年一二月号、毎月の言葉)という提言による。

(8) この調査は明治大学法学部の刑事政策のゼミの諸君に手伝ってもらった(以下単に「ゼミ」とのみ表示する)。調査の概要はつぎのとおりである。

(1) 調査時期　昭和四四年六月一日～六月末日(ただしこの間に大学紛争にまきこまれ集計は夏以降まで遅延した。また刑務官については同年一〇月中旬に行なった)。

(2) 調査対象者　①刑法学者(法学部をもつ全国の大学の刑事法講座担当者全員)、②裁判官(裁判官職員録昭和四四年版より間隔抽出法により採用)、③刑務官(矯正研修所東京支所で研修中の刑務官)

(3) 調査方法　郵送により用紙を発送して回収(ただし、刑務官は直接面接聴取)。

(4) 回収結果

	発送数	有効回収数
刑法学者	一三六	四〇(二九・四%)
裁判官	一三一	五四(四一・二%)
刑務官	面接	三四(一〇〇%)

(9) 総理府の調査が面接聴取であるのに対し、われわれの調査は郵送を主とした点も根本的には対比条件に欠けるとの批判をうけることはもとより承知している。

(10) 検察官、弁護士については、前者は検察官一体の原則により個人の見解を求めるのが困難であろうということ、後者については検察官にアンケートを求めないとすれば集計上客観性をそこなうと判断し除外した。なお、裁判官の中にも、現職裁判官として意見を出せないとする回答が一通あった。今後の調査においては、その他の自覚集団、たとえば、評論家、教育学者等についてもその対象を広めることが望ましいと考えている。

一　死刑の可否

1　現行法の死刑規定に対する態度

死刑の適用をへらす方法の審議の参考として、現行法上、死刑が法定されている罪のうち、殺人、内乱、外患誘致、現住建造物放火および爆発物使用の各罪について、死刑の規定をおくべきか否かについてたずねてい(I―1表参照)。

I―1　現行法における死刑規定の可否

爆発物使用	71	58	40	67	67		16	26	45	19	15		13	13	10	13	18		〃

2　殺人の具体例に対する態度

殺人罪に対する死刑廃止論者は、前述のように総理府の調査では一七%であり、われわれの調査では二七%であった

が、さらに殺人のいくつかの場合について死刑を廃止してよい場合があるかどうかを問うた結果がI—2表である。この設問は、死刑の適用をへらす方法の一つとして、殺人罪についても死刑を法定する重い類型とこれを法定しない軽い類型に分けてはどうかとする議論があるので、その審議の参考のため、さらに殺人の具体例をあげて各場合について死刑の要否をたずねたものである(3)（ただしこの表においては殺人罪一般について死刑を廃止せよという者を除いたため総理府の調査では一七%を除いた八三%、われわれの調査では二七%を除いた七三%についてたずねている。ただし各専門家別ではそれぞれ除外率は異なる）。

総理府およびわれわれの調査とも営利誘拐による殺人、列車転覆による殺人、強姦殺人および警察官殺しの場合には死刑の存置論が圧倒的に多く、死刑廃止を主張する者は少ない。ただ、われわれの調査では、警察官殺しについては、一概にいえないとする者が全体で一七%あり、とくに、裁判官には二四%ある。

親を殺した者については、総理府およびわれわれの両調査ともはっきり死刑廃止を主張する者は少ないが、一概にいえないとする者が総理府の調査で二四%、われわれの調査で一九%ある。この罪についても死刑存置を主張する者は、両調査とも半数あるが、刑法学者は三五%である。設問自体に問題があったように思われる。「死刑にできるようにしておくにしても、単純殺人罪の規定をもうけておくについては賛成であるが、尊属殺については反対である。」（ある裁判官）という意見もあり、かような考えの者は一概にいえないという回答になったため、割合が多くなったとも思われる。

政治的な目的で政府高官を殺した場合については、内乱の場合と同じく、両調査とも存置論は四〇%前後で、半数以下である。「政治犯の処罰は現実には歴史も示すごとく、裁判（司法的）制度になじまないから」とする学者からの意見もあった。

けんかの末の殺人については、両調査とも存廃論いずれも同程度であるが、刑務官は廃止の者が若干多い。しかし、いずれも、一概にいえないとする者がもっとも多く、全体としては廃止に傾いているともみられるが、被害者によって法定刑を差別するという類型化には反対であるという根強い意見のあることは忘れてはなるまい。

1　死刑廃止に関する調査

死刑廃止の賛否は、総理府調査の最重要項目であり（これからの検討は主としてこれを軸として死刑存置論および、廃止論者の対比において記述する）過去二回の調査（昭和三一年、同四二年）で同じ質問文を用いている。すなわち「今の日本で、どんな場合でも死刑を廃止しようという意見にあなたは賛成ですか、反対ですか」というものである。これについては（II—1表参照）、前述したごとく総理府の調査では死刑の廃止には、七割の者が反対で、賛成者は二割弱であり、これは、昭和三一年の調査と比較すると死刑廃止論者は若干減少しているといわれる。これをわれわれの調査についてみると、死刑存置論者は六八%であって、総理府（第二回、昭和三一年）の調査と

II—1　死刑廃止に対する意見

昭和31年（総理府）	65%	18%	17%	100%
昭和42年（総理府）	71	16	13	〃
昭和44年（ゼミ）	68	27	5	〃
うち 刑法学者	45	48	8	〃
うち 裁判官	80	17	4	〃
うち 刑務官	76	21	3	〃

比べると若干存置論者が多い。しかし、逆に廃止論者は二七%であって、過去二回の総理府の調査よりはるかに多い。これは、わからないとする者がわれわれの調査ではきわめて少ないことによる。こうした傾向はわれわれの他の質問についても同じ傾向であって、いわゆる専門家（自覚集団）であるこれらの人たちと一般人との差を示すものといえよう。

これを専門家別にみると、刑法学者は死刑廃止論者（四八%）が、存置論者（四五%）を若干ではあるが上廻ることは注目すべきことである。しかし、裁判官は圧倒的に存置論が多い（八〇%）。刑務官も同じく存置論者が多い（七六%）。裁判官および刑務官が実務家として現実的な考えに傾くであろうことは推察される。しかし単に存置論、廃止論の割合のみでことを論ずることはできないのではないか。その内容の点については以下で論ずることとしよう。刑法学者にとくに廃止論が多かったのはわれわれを力強くさせた。しかし、このような調査には廃止論者の方がより積極的に調査に応じてくれるのではないかという推測もなりたたないわけではない（この意味では総理府の調査―面接法―とわれわれの調査―郵送法―に本質的な相違があるとの批判をうけるかもしれない）。その理由の一つは、たとえば「凶悪な犯罪が起こる原因は、社会にあると思いますか、それとも犯人自身にあると思いますか」という質問に対し、死刑廃止論者は一九名のうち七名（三六・八%）は社会にあると答えているのに対し、存置論者では一八名中二名のみがこのように答えており、「犯人にある」と答えた者は一人もいない。その他の一六名は一概にいえない（八八・八%）と答えている。他方、「凶悪な犯罪を犯しても普通の人間に更生させることができると思うか」という質問に対しても、存置論者の五〇%は、「必ず可能」と答えている。すなわち、死刑の廃止には反対であるが、犯人だけが悪いわけではなく、また更生も可能であるという考えが根底にはあり、こうした調査に当たり、死刑・廃止論のように直接的に結びつかないものがあるのではないか。しかし、いうまでもなく、これは単なる一つの推論をでない。ただ、ここで明白なのは専門家においても死刑存置および廃止のそれぞれの理由が大きく異なるということである。つまり、一般人を対象とした、いわゆる世論調査ではこうした違いはすべて平均化されてしまうわけである。

Ⅱ—4　専門別にみた廃止理由の順位

	総理府	ゼミ	うち 刑法学者	うち 裁判官	うち 刑務官
Ⅰ	㈠	㈤	㈣	㈤	㈡
Ⅱ	㈡	㈠	㈠	㈠㈣	㈣
Ⅲ	㈢	㈡	㈡	㈣	㈢
Ⅳ	㈣	㈣	㈢	㈢	㈠
Ⅴ	㈤	㈢	㈤	㈡	㈤

刑務官は、総理府および刑法学者、裁判官と比較しても若干その理由の傾向に特色がある。すなわち、理由㈡の「たとえ悪質な犯罪者も更生の可能性がある」とするのを第一位にしている点は、刑務官◉存置論者が凶悪な犯罪者は命をもってつぐなうべきだとする理由を第一位にしているのと対照的である。存置論、廃止論者の各人がそれぞれ両極端に分かれる。同時に、刑務官の廃止論者は死刑を廃止してもそのために悪質な犯罪が増加するとは思われないとする理由㈣を第二位にあげている点がめだつ。しかし、いずれも廃止論者の母数が少ない（刑務官三四名中廃止論者は七名にすぎない）ため全体としては刑法学者および裁判官の理由順位の中に同化された。

要するに、存置論、廃止論のいずれにおいても、その理由の重みは多様である。しかし、総理府の調査から明らかなことは、一般人の存置論および廃止論はともに、比較的単純な理由がもっとも多いのに対し、いわゆる各専門家のそれは、存置論者は被害者の感情問題をどう処理するかといった問題、廃止論者は誤判の問題を強調する。したがって、前者につういていえば、被害者の感情問題を何らかの方法で解決することによりかなり死刑廃止に傾くのではないかという点、逆に廃止論者のいう誤判の点は、死刑の存置する以上さけられないものである点にその理由の重みをおくことはできないであろうか。少なくとも、これまでの検討から、死刑制度に直接関心のある専門家の見解にとくに重要視すべきものがあることだけはいえよう。

（3）大学卒は死刑廃止が二九%、存置が六六%であるに対し、中学卒は死刑廃止が一三%、存置が七三%である（総理府・前掲報告書八ページ）。

三　死刑の漸次廃止

1　死刑漸次廃止の調査

死刑を漸次廃止していくことについての回答は、総理府の調査では、即時全面廃止（三%）を含めて、将来は漸次廃止して行くのがよいと答えた者は四〇%である。[1] これは将来も存続させよという意見をもつ者の比率（四五%）に接近している。われわれの調査と比較してみると、Ⅲ—1表に示すごとく、漸次廃止論者は六〇%に近い。この数字は将来も存続とする二八%をはるかに上廻るもので

Ⅲ—1　死刑の漸次廃止

	総理府	ゼミ	うち 刑法学者	うち 裁判官	うち 刑務官
漸次廃止がよい（含即時全面廃止）	40%	59%	85%	57%	32%
将来も存続	45	28	10	26	53
わからない	15	13	5	17	15
計	100	〃	〃	〃	〃

ある。なかんずく、刑法学者のうち八五%までは即時全面廃止（三二・五%）かもしくは、漸次廃止（四五%）である（Ⅲ—2表参照）、裁判官も六割近くまでは漸次廃止論者である。ただ、刑務官は一般世論（総理府調査）より将来も存続とする者が多い。

2　死刑の試験的廃止に関する調査

将来も存続させるとする者は総理府の調査では試験的廃止の賛成と反対が半ばして（それぞれ三九%、三八%）いるのに対し、われわれの調査では存置論者は圧倒的に試験的廃止にも反対している（一四%対七八%）。とくに刑法学者の存置論者は全員が反対している。これは存置の根拠にそれなりの理由があり、その理由から結論づけているため当然こうした傾向となるものといえよう。しかるに一般世論では、理由そのものが確固た

四　死刑の代替刑

死刑をもし廃止した場合、その代わりにどのような刑罰を科すべきかについては、総理府およびわれわれの調査のいずれにおいても終身刑が圧倒的に多い。専門家別にこれをみても有意差はない。仮定の上にたった質問である以上、結果的にこうした割合となるのは当然であろう。また、代替刑はあくまで代替であって、死刑そのものがつねに前提としてある。かような意味での死刑廃止はむしろ死刑存置を前提としている点で真の意味の死刑廃止とはいえず、死刑存置の変形とでもいった方がよいかもしれない。そこに設問自身にも問題があるように思われる。われわれの調査では、したがって、刑法学者のうち「わからない」（含無記入）がかなり多い。無期刑の場合、総理府の調査では一生自由を束縛せよという者（三三%）が、仮釈放を認めよという者（三〇%）を上廻っている（Ⅳ—1表参照）。これに対し、われわれの調査では、前者が一五%であるに対し、六五%は仮釈放を認めようとしている。とくに、刑法学者（八三%）および裁判官（七八%）に多い。終身刑が死刑と比較してどちらが残酷であるかが問題とされており、このことが専門家にはこのような数字となってあらわれたものといえよう。刑務官も同様に仮釈放を認めようとする者が多い（三八%）のであるが、その差はわずかである。これはさきの死刑存置理由と結びつくものといえよう。

論者は仮釈放を認める無期刑を主張しており、終身刑（仮釈放なし）はもとより、有期刑を主張する者も一人もいない。刑法学者も八四%までが仮釈放を認めよとし、終身刑（仮釈放なし）は一人もいない。

死刑存置論者においては、無期を主張する者が総理府の調査で八〇%を占め、われわれの調査でもほぼ同じく七五%を占める。質問の性質上当然といえようが、総理府の調査で死刑存置論者は仮釈放を認めない者（三九%）が仮釈放を認める者（三〇%）より多い結果となったのに対し、われわれの調査では、前者が一八%であるに対し、後者は五三%と逆に仮釈放を認めよとする者が圧倒的に多い。つまり、死刑存置論者も、もし死刑を廃止するとすれば、いわゆる終身刑（仮釈放なし）で代替させることはさけるべきであると考えているとみられる。なかんずく裁判官の存置論者の七二%までがそのように感じていることは重要である。

五　死刑の手続

死刑の言渡しや執行を手続の上でできるだけ厳格にし、なるべく死刑を最少限にとめる方策には種々のものが考えられるが、そのうち、(1)裁判への国民参加（いわゆる陪審制度ないしは参審制度）、(2)死刑言渡しの裁判官全員一致制、および(3)死刑言渡し後の観察期間の設置（いわゆる死刑の執行猶予制）について意見を求めている。

1　裁判への国民参加

死刑を言渡すような事件の裁判には、裁判官のほかに一般の国民を加えることに対しては、総理府およびわれわれの調査において一致して裁判官のみでよい（現行のまま）という者が多い。しかし、われわれの調査の方が裁判官のみを主張する者の割合が六六%と高い割合を示す（V—1表参照）。また裁判官自身も八一%まで現状維持を主張している。

これを死刑存置論者および廃止論者の別にみると、V—2表に示すように、いずれも現状維持が多い。しかし、刑法学者のうち死刑廃止論者は国民を加えよとする者が若干多い（前者の三七%に対し四二%）。しかるに、死刑存置論者は、逆に国民を加えよとする者は一一%であるに対し、裁判官のみとする者は七二%を占める。参審制度そのものに問題があり、わが国の国民性からして反対が多いのは至当である。

2　死刑言渡しの裁判官全員一致制

現在の裁判制度においては、普通、裁判官三人のうち二人が賛成すれば死刑を言渡すことができるようになっているわけであるが、死刑についてはとくに裁判官三人の全員一致がなければ言渡せないようにしてはどうかとの質問に対し、総理府の調査では全員一致（四四%）と多数決（四二%）がほぼ同程度である（V—3表参照）。これに対しわれわれの調査では全員一致にすべきであるとする意見が六五%であり、現行のままでよいとする者は二九%である。とくに、刑法学者および刑務官は七〇%台で全員一致制を支持している。裁判官も全員一致を支持する者が五四%あり、現行維持の三九%より多数を占めることは注目すべきことといえよう（V—3表参照）。裁判官の中には「事実審に限り全員一致とする」という意見の人もあった。

V—3　裁判官全員一致制

	総理府	ゼミ	うち 刑法学者	うち 裁判官	うち 刑務官
全員一致	44%	65%	75%	54%	74%

〃 存置	40	51	50	46	65	50	40	39	46	35

これを死刑存置論者および廃止論者に分けて考察してみると、総理府およびわれわれの調査においていずれも死刑廃止論者が全員一致制を強く支持していることはいわば当然のことといえる。とくにわれわれの調査では死刑廃止論者が全員、現行の多数決制に反対している。一人の人間の生死が多数決によって決定されること自体が十分問題にされるべきものといえよう。この点については死刑存置論者も全員一致支持者が若干でも多いことに注目すべきである。比較的強い死刑存置論をもつ刑務官もその六五%の者が全員一致制を支持し、現行のままでよいとする者は三五%であることは、現実に死刑囚を扱っている刑務官の意見であるだけに問題である。

3 死刑言渡し後の観察期間の設置

V—5 死刑執行の猶予

一定の観察期間をおく	65%	49%	55%	48%	44%
その必要はない	20	27	18	22	47

これを死刑の存置論、廃止論の関係でみると（V—6表参照）、死刑廃止論では総理府およびわれわれの両調査において、いずれも必要だとする者が大部分である。ただし、裁判官で必要とする者は三三%のみであり、一概にいえないとする者が存置論のうちの五六%あった（表示していない）。いずれにしても刑法学者および裁判官の死刑廃止論者に、必要とする意見の多いのは、誤判をさけえないとすることも手伝っていると思われる。

裁判官の死刑存置論者では、五一%が必要を認めているのに対し、不必要とする者は二九%である。このように、とくに裁判官において必要とする者が多い。ただし「手続的な面、法の安定性の面を考えるとむずかしい」とする裁判官の意見もあった。

六 死刑に関する一般的態度

死刑の存廃に関する論評の主たる根拠である㈠重罪人の扱いに対する態度、㈡死刑の一般予防的効果、㈢犯罪の動向、㈣犯罪の原因および㈤犯罪人に対する見方等について、いわゆる死刑存廃の背景をなす意識について質問しているので概括的にまとめておきたい。

1 重罪人の扱いに対する態度

重い犯罪を犯した場合でも、実際にはなるべく死刑にしない方がよいと思うかという問に対して、総理府の調査（VI—1(A)表参照）では「なるべく死刑にしない方がよい」（四二%）、「そうは思わない」（四〇%）とほぼ同程度である。これに対し、われわれの調査では前者が六三%、後者二四%と圧倒的に死刑にしない方がよいとする意見が多い。とりわけ刑法学者に多い（八八%）。しかし、刑務官は一般世論と比べても、そうは思わな

いという者が多く（五〇%）、ここでも特異な結果となっている。

2 死刑の一般予防的効果

これを死刑存置論および廃止論の関係でみると、死刑廃止論者は、われわれの調査では、ふえると思う者は一人もなく一貫している。これに対し、ふえるとは思わないとする者がほとんど九〇%を占める。この点は総理府の調査においても、割合こそ六四%であるが、同じくふえると思わない者が多い。これに対し、死刑存置論者は、総理府の調査でふえると思う者が六三%あり、そうは思わない者

〃 存置	63	37	22	46	38	24	28	22	29	35	28	56	23	19

3 犯罪の動向

4 犯罪の原因

総理府の調査では、凶悪な犯罪の原因はおもに「社会にある」という者（三九%）が「犯人自身にある」とする者（三一%）より若干多いのがめだつ（Ⅵ—4(A)表参照）。われわれの調査ではほとんど差がない。これは、刑法学者は社会にあるとする者が多い（一三%）のに対し、裁判官は犯人自身にあるとみる者が多い（二八%）ところから生じた結果である（刑務官は同程度である）。前者で、「凶悪犯人の人格は多くの場合異常である。異常な犯罪者は死刑の対象者になりえない。したがって、犯罪を起こらしめた社会に責任がある」と添書きしている人もいた。しかし、いずれも「一概にいえない」である。

えない」とする者がかなりの割合を占めている（表示していないが、たとえば、われわれの調査では全体の五九％は一概にいえないとしている）。

5　犯罪人に対する見方

総理府およびわれわれの調査において、凶悪犯人でも更生が「不可能な人もいる」とみる者がいずれも多いのは当然である（Ⅵ—5(A)および(B)参照）。しかし、これを死刑存置および廃止論別にみると、総理府の調査では、死刑廃止論の五割までが「必ず可能」としているのは当然としても、死刑存置論者の三割も「必ず可能」としており、不可能（二八

%）より多いのは注目すべきことである。われわれの調査では、死刑廃止論者でも「必ず可能」（四〇%）、「不可能な人もいる」（三一%）が同程度である。とくに刑法学者は「不可能な人もいる」とするのが四割を占める（精神的に異常な人をさすものと思われる）のに対し、裁判官および刑務官では逆に「必ず可能」とする者が四四%および七一%を占めるのは興味ある結果である。「刑罰によって立返らせることはできないが、他の方法によって立返らせることはできる者もある」とのべている裁判官もあった。

刑法学者で死刑廃止論者は「一概にいえない」とする者が三二%を占め、他の専門家よりもっともこの回答が多い。実務家の死刑廃止論者は信念に近いものがあると解されはしまいか。「経験……生可能な者が相当いる」と……裁判官もあった。

むすび

本稿の冒頭でもふれたごとく、一般の大衆の無知や誤信をバンドワゴン的効果（bandwagon effect）とし、調査した結果を原動力にしながら、さらに新しい世論を捏造し、大衆をこれに追随させることが、仮にあるとするならば、きわめて由々しいことであるとせねばならない。死刑制度についていえば特定の被害者を除き、一般大衆はおおむね無自覚的集団であるといえよう。これまでの検討で、われわれは一般大衆の死刑制度に対する認識が無自覚集団であると断定するに足るものがあることを実証したとかんがえる。かような一般大衆を背景とする世論が死刑制度存……大きな……エイトをもつものと……されることはきわめて危……るといわざるをえな……度に対する世論は、少なくとも……害や関心をもつ意見集団（opinion group）によって形成されねばなるまい。意見集団の一つの方向を見定め、吸いあげることによって死刑廃止へ大衆を導いてゆくのが真の世論といえるのではないであろうか。

これまでの検討から得られた結論の若干を列挙するとつぎのごとくである。

㈠放火および内乱の罪は一般世論（総理府の世論調査をさす、以下同様）および各専門家（われわれの調査をさす。以下同様）ともに廃止論が多い。政府高官殺し、およびけんかによる殺人も同じく廃止論が多い傾向にある。

㈡専門家相互間に死刑廃置、廃止の見解は大きな差がある。これに対し一般世論ではすべて平均化されてしまう。

㈢実務家（裁判官および刑務官）は死刑存置論者でも罪名によっては廃止してもよい罪をあげることが多い。

㈣一般世論では死刑廃止論者で他の質問にも一貫して死刑廃止を主張した者は六%にすぎず、わからないとする者が多いのに対し、専門家では全員が一貫しており、わからないとする者はきわめて少ない。

㈤死刑存置論者の存置理由の第一は、一般世論では死刑の一般予防効果をあげるが、専門家は被害者感情をあげる。

㈥死刑廃止論者の廃止理由の第一は、一般世論は人道的立場をあげるが、専門家は誤判の危険性をあげる。

㈦単純な理由からの一般世論の死刑存置論者は、将来も存続させよとするに対し、専門家の理由は漸次廃止に結びつく。

㈧一般世論では終身刑で一生自由を束縛させよとする者がもっとも多いが、専門家は仮釈放を認める者が圧倒的に多い。

㈨専門家では死刑言渡しは裁判官の全員一致でやるべきであるとする者が圧倒的に多い。一般世論では現状維持と同程度である。

The System of Capital Punishment and Public Opinion

(By Kōichi Kikuta*)

INTRODUCTION

In June 1967, the Japanese Ministry of Justice asked the Public Information Section of the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) to conduct a survey of overall public opinion throughout the country regarding capital punishment, having in mind the objective of using the data thus obtained in the revision of the present penal code.

The results of this survey showed that 71% of the surveyed population favored retention of capital punishment, while 16% were opposed to the retention of capital punishment. The PMO had conducted a similar survey in May 1956. As compared with the results of this 1956 survey, the 1967 survey of the PMO showed a 2% decrease in those favoring abolition of capital punishment and a 6% increase in those favoring maintenance of capital punishment.

The results of the 1967 PMO survey were highlighted in the various media. For example, the morning daily Ashai Shimbun reported on October 14, 1967, that > ...the PMO survey showed a 70% opposition to the abolition of capital punishment, a finding which is contrary to recent trends in the European countries and the United States, where there is increasing sentiment in favor of the abolition of capital punishment. In Japan there still exists deeply rooted opinion supporting retention of capital punishment....

In addition to being well covered by the media, the results of the 1967 PMO survey were submitted to the Second Subcommittee of the Special Committee on Criminal Law of the Legislative Council (part of the Ministry of Justice) for use in its deliberations on overall revision of the present penal code. The results were also used by the Special Committee in formulating its general policy regarding capital punishment.

The various uses of the results of the PMO survey indicate that they are being taken quite seriously. The most pertinent questions are: (1) to what extent should general public opinion be used as a determining factor in any decision with regard to the place of capital punishment in the Japanese legal system; (2) on what bases does the general public establish its position with regard to capital punishment; and (3) how would "expert public opinion" (that is, the opinion of those having knowledge of and experience with capital punishment) compare with "general public opinion?"

In order to provide tentative answers to the second and third of these questions, the Law Department of Meiji University, with the aid of students enrolled in a criminal policy seminar, conducted its own survey of "expert public opinion" from June 1, 1969, to June 30, 1969. A questionnaire almost identical to that used in the PMO survey was mailed to: (1) the entire Japanese population of professors who teach criminal law in a Law Department of a university; and (2) every twenty-fifth judge on the list of judges as of 1969. In addition, interviews were carried out with 34 prison officers who were undertaking a program of study at the Tokyo Branch of the Research and Training Institution for Prison Officials. Of the 136 criminal law professors to whom questionnaires were mailed, 40 (29.4%) responded. Fifty-four replies were received from the 131 judges to whom questionnaires were mailed (41.2%). Thus, a total of 128 experts participated in our survey.

Proper evaluation of the validity of the results of a survey of expert public opinion so conducted would have to be done by statistical experts, one of the major questions being whether or not the population whose views were solicited and the number from whom responses were received are sufficient to constitute a fair sample to be compared with the sample surveyed by the PMO, which consisted of 2,500 persons. Also, the PMO survey was conducted entirely through interviews, while our survey was carried out, in the case of criminal law professors and judges, by mail.

We believe that our survey is so-called pilot research, and we will pursue it further.

CHAPTER I. PRO'S AND CON'S OF THE ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

1. Attitude toward the provisions concerning capital punishment under the present penal code.

The question was asked whether we should retain or abolish the capital punishment prescribed in the present penal code for such crimes as murder, insurrection, inducement of foreign aggression, arson against a dwelling, and the use of explosives. (See Table I–1.)

According to the PMO survey, about 70% supported the existing death penalty imposed on murder and the use of explosives while about 17% favored abolition of capital punishment in the case of murder and the use of explosives. Our survey indicates that 85% of prison officers and 78% of judges were in favor of the existing death penalty in the case of murder.

Generally speaking, our survey showed a high ratio of support for the death penalty in the case of murder (69%), although this ratio was slightly lower than that revealed by the PMO survey (70%).

When one examines the figures for individual professions, one notices a relatively higher percentage of criminal law professors favoring abolition of the death penalty in the case of arson of dwellings (58%) and being the ring leader of an insurrection (58%); in the case of judges, the lowest rate of support for abolishing the death penalty was noted in respect of the use of explosives (19%), while the lowest rate of support from prison officers appeared with respect to being the ring leader of an insurrection (15%) and murder (15%). There is a high rate of support from judges for retention of the death penalty imposed at present for the crimes of murder, inducement of foreign aggression, and use of explosives.

The figures of the PMO survey indicate that 43% favored the existing death penalty for arson of dwellings, while 34% supported abolition of the death penalty in the case of arson of dwellings, and 23% either did not know or were not sure of their position. One can say that there is not great support for the capital punishment now imposed for the crime of arson of dwelling.

II. Attitude toward various types of murder.

As recorded in Table I–1, the PMO survey showed 17% support for the abolition of capital punishment in the case of murder, while our survey revealed 27% support for the abolition of the death sentence in the case of murder. In Table I–2, figures are recorded with respect to general and expert public opinion in the case of various types of murder. The intent of this aspect of the surveys was to provide indications of the degree of support for the imposition of differential sentences (heavy or light) for murders committed in various ways, for various motives, and against various victims.

Both the PMO and our surveys indicated a great deal of support for the death sentence meted out at present for murder of an abducted victim, murder of a rape victim, murder by overturning a train, and murder of an on-duty policeman; there was also a relatively low degree of support for abolition of the death sentence involving these types of murder. However, in the case of murdering an on-duty policeman, our survey indicated that 17% preferred to be included in the "unknown" category.

Both the PMO and our surveys also indicated that relatively few people (7%) favored abolition of the death penalty in the case of parricide, but that 24% (PMO survey) and 19% (our survey) did not know or were not sure of the position they wished to take with respect to capital punishment for parricide, while 52% (PMO survey) and 48% (our survey) went on record as favoring imposition of the death sentence on a parricide. Only 35% of the criminal law professors participating in our survey, however, thought that the crime of parricide definitely warranted the death sentence.

In the case of murder of government officials for political purposes, both surveys indicate that about 40% supported the capital punishment presently imposed. Similarly, in both surveys about 25% felt that capital punishment was warranted in the case of murder during an altercation.

CHAPTER II. ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

1. Survey concerning abolition.

In both the 1956 and 1967 PMO surveys the following question was asked: "Do you support or not support outright abolition of capital punishment?" (See Table II–1.)

According to the 1967 PMO survey, about 70% did not support the outright abolition of capital punishment, while less than 20% indicated support of outright abolition. As compared with the results of the 1956 PMO survey, the 1967 PMO survey shows that those favoring abolition of capital punishment are on the decline. Our survey (1969) shows that 68% support capital punishment a figure which is a little higher (3%) than the comparable figure reported in the 1956 PMO survey.

Our survey also indicates that 27% favored abolition, which is much higher than the figure reported in both the 1967 and the 1956 PMO survey (16% and 18% respectively). The fact that our survey when compared to the 1956 PMO survey showed a higher percentage both opposing and supporting abolition of capital punishment is due to the fact that in our survey a smaller percentage of those reported in our survey fall under the category of "unknown" attitude.

Forty-eight percent of the criminal law scholars in our survey supported abolition of capital punishment, a figure which is slightly higher than the 45% of the criminal law professors who were opposed to outright abolition of the death penalty. On the other hand, 80% of the judges and 76% of the prison officials in our survey supported capital punishment.

See Table II–2 for the following discussion. As stated above, in the 1967 PMO survey 71% indicated opposition to the outright and overall abolition of capital punishment. This 71% was comprised of 28% who thought that capital punishment should be retained only for certain of the crimes to which it presently is applicable and 43% who favored retention of capital punishment for all the crimes to which it now is applicable.

Our survey, however, showed that 34% favored retention of capital punishment only in the case of certain crimes, which is higher than the 28% falling in this category in the 1967 PMO survey. Approaching this category in terms of occupation of the respondent, one finds that 39% of the judges thought that capital punishment should be retained only in the cases of certain crimes. Thus, although about 80% of the judges were opposed to the outright and overall abolition of capital punishment, (see Table II–1) 39% of them supported partial abolition on the basis of the nature of the crime.

Similarly, while 76% of the prison officers were opposed to the outright and overall abolition of capital punishment, 47% of them listed certain crimes for which the presently imposed capital punishment should be abolished. It thus is worthy of note that a high percentage of these two categories of expert practitioners enumerated certain crimes which they thought should be exempt from the death sentence. Only 18% of the criminal law professors listed certain crimes which they felt should be exempt from capital punishment; this low figure must be evaluated, however, in light of the high percentage (around 48%) of criminal law professors who favor the outright and overall abolition of capital punishment.

II. Reasons for Supporting the Present System of Capital Punishment.

The following is a comparison of figures obtained in the PMO survey and our survey in response to statements constituting reasons for supporting the present system of capital punishment. The first figure stated refers to the percentage obtained when one divides the number of persons affirming that the statement is a reason for supporting the present system by the overall number of persons participating in the survey; the second percentage, which is enclosed in parentheses, is obtained by dividing the number of persons affirming that the statement is a reason for supporting the present system by the number of persons participating in the survey who indicated that they in general support the retention of the present system of capital punishment.

1. The number of dangerous offenders may increase if capital punishment is abolished.

PMO—43% (63% of all those indicating support for the present system).
Our survey—33% (48% of all those indicating support for the present system).
Criminal law professors—5% (8% of all those in this profession indicating support for the present system).
Judges—20% (30% of all those in this profession indicating support for the present system).
Prison officers—7% (10% of all those in this profession indicating support for the present system).

2. Felonious criminals should be put to death to atone for their crime.

PMO—43% (62% of all those indicating support for the present system).
Our survey—30% (43% of all those indicating support for the present system).
Criminal law professors—5% (8% of all those in this profession indicating support for the present system).
Judges—16% (24% of all those in this profession indicating support for the present system).
Prison officers—8% (11% of all those in this profession indicating support for the present system).

3. Dangerous offenders, if not put to death, may again commit similar crimes.

PMO—21% (30% of all those indicating support for the present system).
Our survey—10% (15% of all those indicating support for the present system).
Criminal law professors—2% (2% of all those in this profession indicating support for the present system).
Judges—6% (9% of all those in this profession indicating support for the present system).
Prison officers—2% (3% of all those in this profession indicating support for the present system).

4. If the death penalty is abolished, those injured by a felonious crime previously carrying the death penalty will not be satisfied in their desire for vengeance.

PMO—7% (10% of all those indicating support for the present system).
Our survey—20% (30% of all those indicating support for the present system).
Criminal law professors—6% (9% of all those in this profession indicating support for the present system).
Judges—12% (17% of all those in this profession indicating support for the present system).
Prison officers—2% (3% of all those in this profession indicating support for the present system).

5. Other reasons.

PMO—3% (4% of all those indicating support for the present system).
Our survey—6% (9% of all those indicating support for the present system).
Criminal law professors—2% (3% of all those in this profession indicating support for the present system).
Judges—2% (3% of all those in this profession indicating support for the present system).
Prison officers—2% (2% of all those in this profession indicating support for the present system).

In Table II–3, the above statements are ranked in order of their importance as reasons for supporting the present system of capital punishment. It should be noted that criminal law professors ranked statement number four with regard to the feelings of those injured by the felonious crime as the most important reason for support of the retention of capital punishment. Law professors ranked as least important statement number three (the danger of repetition of a felonious crime), which on the PMO survey was ranked as the third most important reason for retention of the present system of capital punishment. Judges also accord less importance to statement number three than was accorded it in the PMO survey. Prison officers gave first rank to statement number two (felonious criminals should atone for their crime), which was ranked second in the PMO survey.

III. Reasons for abolishing capital punishment.

The following statements were offered as expressions of reasons for abolishing capital punishment and were ranked as shown in Table II–4 in order of their importance as reasons for supporting abolition of the death penalty.

1. Killing a human being, even if he is a felonious criminal, is a barbarous act against humanity. No person has the right to kill another person.

PMO—8% (53% of all those indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Our survey—16% (60% of all those indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Criminal law professors—12% (43% of all those in this profession indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Judges—5% (14% of all those in this profession indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Prison officers—0 (0 of all those in this profession indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).

2. It is probable that even the most vicious criminal may be rehabilitated.

PMO—5% (31% of all those indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Our survey—16% (57% of all those indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Criminal law professors—8% (29% of all those in this profession indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Judges—4% (14% of all those in this profession indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Prison officers—4% (14% of all those in this profession indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).

3. The criminal should be given the opportunity to atone for his crime, an opportunity which capital punishment denies him.

PMO—3% (22% of all those indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Our survey—4% (13% of all those indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Criminal law professors—3% (11% of all those in this profession indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Judges—1% (2% of all those in this profession indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Prison officers—0 (0 of all those in this profession indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).

4. Even if capital punishment is abolished, it is unlikely that dangerous crimes will increase; even if capital punishment continues to exist, such crimes will not decrease.

PMO—3% (21% of all those indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Our survey—12% (46% of all those indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Criminal law professors—7% (26% of all those in this profession indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Judges—4% (14% of all those in this profession indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Prison officers—2% (6% of all those in this profession indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).

5. In the case of an error in decision (mistrial) discovered after the person sentenced to capital punishment has been executed, there is no way to rectify the wrong done to him.

PMO—3% (18% of all those indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Our survey—20% (71% of all those indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Criminal law professors—15% (54% of all those in this profession indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Judges—5% (17% of all those in this profession indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).
Prison officers—0 (0 of all those in this profession indicating support for abolition of capital punishment).

In the 1967 PMO survey (also in 1956) statement number 1 (against humanity) is ranked as the most important reason for abolition of capital punishment. It is interesting to note that in our survey first rank is given to statement number 5 (possibility of mistrial) by both criminal law professors and judges.

CHAPTER III. GRADUAL ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

I. General Survey.

For the following discussion, consult Table III–1. The PMO survey revealed 40% (including 3% in favor of immediate and outright abolition) favored gradual abolition, and 45% supported perpetuation of capital punishment. According to our survey, almost 60% were in favor of gradual abolition, a much higher percentage than the 28% who favored continued future existence of the present system. Among criminal lawyers, 85% supported either immediate and outright abolition or gradual abolition.

See Table III–2 for the breakdown of the statistics on gradual abolition in terms of those in general favoring abolition of capital punishment and those in general opposing the abolition of capital punishment. In the PMO survey, among those opposing the abolition of capital punishment, 20% were in favor of gradual abolition, and 44% were in favor of continued existence of capital punishment. Our survey indicated that, among those opposing the abolition of capital punishment, 32% favored gradual abolition, while 25% favored uninterrupted future existence of capital punishment.

II. Abolition of Capital Punishment on a Trial Basis.

In conjunction with the following discussion, consult Table III–3. The PMO survey indicates that 49% favor abolition of capital punishment on a trial basis, while 26% oppose such a step. Our survey shows that 50% oppose abolition on a trial basis, while 31% support this approach. A law professor states that even if capital punishment is abolished on a trial basis, it would be very difficult to establish with any certainty the relationship between the tentative abolition and any observable fluctuation in the amount of crime. Both the PMO and our surveys indicate that those favoring gradual abolition also support abolition on a trial basis. (See Table III–4.)

CHAPTER IV. SUBSTITUTE FOR CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

In connection with the following discussion, consult Table IV–1. With regard to the question of whether other punishment could be substituted for capital punishment, in the PMO survey 74% indicated that life imprisonment or life imprisonment at forced labor could be substituted. This 74% was comprised of 33% who favored restraint of the criminal's freedom for life, 30% who would accord him the possibility of eventual parole, and 11% who could not express their position or could not express it without reservations. Our survey showed that 80% favored life imprisonment (15% for lifetime restraint of freedom, and 65% for according the criminal the possibility of eventual parole). Criminal law professors (63%) and judges (78%) came out especially heavily in favor of the possibility of eventual parole.

See Table IV–2 for figures indicating the degree of support for substitute punishment on the part of those favoring and those opposing the abolition of capital punishment. In the PMO survey, among those favoring the abolition of capital punishment, 38% were in favor of according the convict the possibility of eventual parole. Our survey indicated that, among those favoring the abolition of capital punishment, 84% favored according the prisoner the possibility of eventual parole, while only 3% favored lifetime imprisonment with no possibility of parole.

CHAPTER V. PROCEDURE OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

I. People's participation in trials involving capital punishment.

Many agree that judges alone should participate in a trial involving the sentence of capital punishment, the practice followed at present in the Japanese system. In the PMO survey 50% favored participation by judges alone in such trials, while our survey showed 66% favored this practice. It is interesting to note that 81% of the judges supported sole participation by judges. (See Table V–1.)

Table V–2 breaks down the data given in Table V–1 in terms of those favoring and those opposing capital punishment. It shows that the majority of both groups support capital punishment's being meted out only by judges. Among law professors favoring abolition of capital punishment, 42% support popular participation in trials involving capital punishment, while 37% are in favor of participation by judges alone.

II. Unanimous decision by the judges in meting out capital punishment.

Under the present system agreement of two out of the three participating judges is sufficient to sentence a person to capital punishment. When asked if the unanimous decision of all three judges should be required for the meting out of such punishment, 44% of those participating in the PMO survey answered in the affirmative, while 42% favored the present practice of requiring only a majority decision. (See Table V–3.)

Table V–4 breaks down the statistics on the requirement of unanimous decision by all three judges in terms of those supporting and those opposing abolition of capital punishment. Here it is interesting to note that 95% of the criminal law professors supporting abolition of capital punishment, 100% of the judges supporting abolition of capital punishment, and 99% of prison officers supporting abolition favor capital punishment's being prescribed only upon unanimous decision of the three judges.

III. Establishment of an observation period prior to execution of capital punishment.

At present the convict sentenced to death is executed within six months from the day on which the judgment is rendered. Participants were asked whether or not it would be desirable to establish a period of observation during which the capital criminal could by good behavior lead to his death sentence being reduced to life imprisonment at forced labor. Table V–5 shows overall statistics on responses to this question, while Table V–6 breaks down these figures in terms of those supporting and those opposing abolition of capital punishment.

CHAPTER VI. GENERAL ATTITUDE TOWARD CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

I. Attitude toward handling felons.

See Table VI–1(A) and Table VI–1(B) for statistics on responses given to the statement that the "death penalty is not preferred if possible."

II. General preventive effect of the death penalty.

See Table VI–2(A) and Table VI–2(B) for statistics on responses given to the statement that "if the death penalty is abolished, felonious crimes will increase."

III. Felonious crimes in recent years.

See Table VI–3(A) and Table VI–3(B) for statistics on the participants' estimation of the general trend in the number of felonious crimes in recent years.

IV. Major causes of felonious crimes.

See Table VI–4(A) and Table VI–4(B) for statistics on the participants' position with regard to the question of whether society or the individual criminal is responsible for his criminality. The PMO survey indicates that 39% of the participants think that society is responsible for the individual's criminality, while 31% hold the criminal responsible. Our survey revealed an almost equal division of opinion on this question, with 19% holding society responsible, and 21% holding the criminal responsible. A higher percentage of judges (28%) thought the criminal responsible for his behavior, while 23% of the criminal law professors took the opposite position. Table VI–4(b) analyses the statistics on responses to these opposing attributions of responsibility in terms of those favoring and those opposing abolition of capital punishment.

IV. Rehabilitation of felons.

In both surveys [See Table VI–5(A)] many persons stated that it is not necessarily the case that a felon may be rehabilitated. However, as indicated in Table VI–5(B), 49% of those favoring the abolition of capital punishment in the PMO survey answered that rehabilitation of a felon is always possible, while 31% of those opposing abolition of capital punishment thought that rehabilitation is always possible. Our survey indicated that 40% of those favoring abolition of capital punishment thought rehabilitation always possible, while 31% of those favoring abolition felt that rehabilitation was not necessarily possible.

CHAPTER VII. MISCELLANEOUS

To those listed on the PMO's questionnaire, our survey added one question to be answered by the participating judges; this question was whether or not the participant himself had heard a case involving a decision that the accused should be sentenced to capital punishment. In reply to this question, eleven out of 54 judges (20% or one out of five) answered in the affirmative. All eleven of these judges favored overall retention of capital punishment. Although our data in this respect is too incomplete to support any definitive statement, we suggest tentatively that judges who have imposed capital punishment are mostly in favor of retaining capital punishment.

Another question was directed to prison officers, asking them whether or not they had taken part in an execution. One person favoring retention of capital punishment answered in the affirmative.

CONCLUSIONS

The following are the conclusions reached from this study:

1. There appears to be some support for abolition of capital punishment in the case of the crimes of arson and insurrection according to both the PMO and our surveys. There also is a tendency to support abolition of capital punishment in the case of the crimes of killing government officials for political purposes and murder resulting from altercation.

2. Among the "expert" group surveyed in our poll, there exist divergent views with regard to abolition of capital punishment. Such divergent views do not show up in the PMO survey, where the participant's occupation was not taken into account.

3. Practitioners (judges and prison officials) in the criminal law system, even though they in general terms are opposed to the abolition of capital punishment, suggest that certain crimes should be exempt from capital punishment.

4. In the case of the general public opinion registered in the PMO survey, among those favoring abolition of capital punishment, 6% consistently supported abolition in their responses to all the questions, and large numbers appeared in the "unknown" category. In the case of the expert opinion registered in our survey, there was a great deal of consistency in responses to varied questions, and very few persons opted for the "unknown" category.

5. In the PMO survey prevention of crime was listed as the primary reason for supporting capital punishment, whereas in our survey lack of satisfaction of the injured parties' desire for vengeance should capital punishment be abolished assumed first place among criminal law professors as a reason for supporting capital punishment.

6. In the PMO survey, the inhumanity of killing any person was the primary reason given for support of abolition of capital punishment, while in our survey of expert opinion the possibility of judicial error was viewed as the primary reason for abolishing capital punishment.

7. In the PMO survey those who favored overall retention of capital punishment also tended to support perpetuation in the future of the present system of capital punishment, while experts who favored overall retention of capital punishment tended to support gradual abolition of the death penalty in the future.

8. The PMO survey revealed that many support life imprisonment as an alternative to capital punishment, while expert public opinion in our survey overwhelmingly supported imprisonment with the possibility of eventual parole.

9. The majority of the experts participating in our survey favored the requirement of unanimous decision of the three judges in the meting out of capital punishment, while there was an even division of opinion in this regard in the general public opinion expressed by the PMO survey.

THE MAX-PLANCK-INSTITUTE FOR FOREIGN AND INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW

Foreword

Comparatists have long appreciated the fact that it is not the difference between written law and unwritten law which characterizes the gulf between civil law and common law. Rather, the difference is—and has been since the days of the Roman jurisconsulti—that the civil law has experienced the ordering hand of the scholar, so that it has become organized and systematized, while the common law still retains much of its pragmatic judge-made qualities with a remarkable resistance toward any comprehensive ordering.

It may be surmised that one of the consequences of the civil law's orderliness in the preservation of experience data (codes) is its capacity to be used for strategic planning for the future, whether by the citizen, the public law maker or the social planner. The common law probably does not have that capacity on the same scale, though it is more adapted for rapid, dynamic change, relatively oblivious to effects in the distant future. Certain features of continental and American society would seem to bear out these surmises. In particular, however, the developments in comparative law bear witness to the essential differences in the continental and Anglo-American approach to law, law reform and law planning. Englishmen and Americans had made use of foreign legal experiences only sporadically and usually purely on an ad hoc basis, often almost accidentally. Continentals, on the other hand, went about it in a systematic way, reaching their exploitations of foreign legal experience in a systematic fashion, canvassing whole "systems," surveying these in a gapless fashion, and searching for the experience rules of comparison. Comparative law abroad, thus, became a science which developed its own specialists and institutes at which they worked.

One of the best-known of them is the Max-Planck-Institute of Foreign and International Criminal Law, at the University of Freiburg, Germany, the foremost of its kind in the world. While a visiting professor at that Institute and at the University of Freiburg almost a decade ago, I had the opportunity of acquainting myself with the workings of that Institute, and resolved to create a similar institution in the United States of America. This was established as the Comparative Criminal Law Project of New York University which is proud to admit its lineage as leading back to Freiburg; and Freiburg still remains our model, for much hard work remains to be done before the New York University Project will have reached the stature of its Freiburg progenitor, and before the impact of its research labors can be truly felt in government circles and in law reform generally. Even after the publication of twenty volumes and numerous independent studies, there remain those in American criminal law circles who are ignorant of, or unsympathetic to comparative criminal law. For Germany, and perhaps Europe as a whole, the Freiburg Institute, in its generation of labor, has been successful in creating a more auspicious and receptive attitude very much to the benefit of criminal law reform.

I welcome the opportunity of introducing the splendid report on the Max-Planck-Institute of Foreign and International Criminal Law, by Professor Robert A. Riegert, and express the hope that publication of his article at this time, when the American Bar Association has formed its first Committee on Comparative Criminal Law, will help in creating a receptive attitude among the American Bar toward comparative studies in criminal justice.

GERHARD O. W. MUELLER *

Introduction. The Institute for criminal law in Freiburg, Germany, is the newest of the Max Planck Association's five legal Institutes,[1] having been converted from a former university institute on July 1, 1966. In size it is one of the smaller of the legal Institutes. It is, nonetheless able to look back to a tradition which in some ways rivals that of the older and larger Institutes. It was originally founded in 1938 as a very small institute (called a "Seminar") of the University of Freiburg, and was converted in 1954 into an Institute belonging to and supported by the University of Freiburg, the State of Baden-Württemberg, and the federal government. The University "Seminar" and the later Institute were able to build on a German tradition in comparative criminal law which dates at least from Napoleonic times and which was particularly strong around the turn of the last century.

The work of the Institute is not limited to substantive criminal law in the narrow sense, but includes criminal procedure, post-conviction procedure and execution of sentences, international criminal law in general, extradition law, history of criminal law, philosophy of criminal law and related subjects. The Institute does not ordinarily engage in research in criminology, as there is a university Institute for Criminology in Freiburg, with which it shares one of its buldings.

The major emphasis of the Institute, as well as of previous German studies of foreign criminal law, has been on the comparative aspect, i.e., on reporting and explaining the foreign law and comparing it with the German law, usually with a view toward German law reform. Another major function of the Institute is the giving of legal opinions to courts,

* Professor of Law and Director of the Comparative Criminal Law Project of New York University; President of the American Society of Criminology and Special Consultant on Comparative Criminal Law to the U.S. Senate Subcommittee on Improvements in Judicial Machinery, the Children's Bureau (HEW) and the American Bar Association Committee on Comparative Criminal Law.

[1] The Max Planck Association, originally known as the Kaiser Wilhelm Association, was founded in Berlin in 1911. It is a private organization for the advancement of science, which now receives between 80% and 90% of funds from government sources. It maintains about 50 research Institutes which are divided into three sections: a Biological-Medical Section, a Chemical-Physical-Technical Section, and an Arts and Social Sciences Section. As part of its Arts and Social Sciences Section the Max Planck Association maintains five Institutes for legal studies: The Institute for Foreign Public Law and International Law, established in Berlin in 1924 and now in Heidelberg; the Institute for Foreign and International Private Law established in Berlin in 1926 and now in Hamburg; the Institute for European Legal History, established in Frankfurt in 1964; the Institute for Foreign and International Patent, Copyright, and Unfair Competition Law established in Munich in 1966; and the Institute for Criminal Law in Freiburg.

administrative authorities and private practitioners, usually in instances in which the information is for immediate practical application. A third major function of the Institute is a pedagogical function, the training of young scholars in the methods of comparative criminal law.

On the occasion of the recent conversion of the Institute into a Max-Planck-Institute,[2] the Director stressed three principal areas in which the Institute is working. The first is engagement in comparative studies to serve as a basis for the major reform of criminal procedure planned by the German Parliament.[3] The second is the study of the criminal law of the European Community, and is divided into three parts: (1) the study of the civil penalties which the European Organizations can impose, (2) the study of the law of the member states penalizing acts against the European Organizations, and (3) the study of agreements reached under the auspices of the Council of Europe, particularly the agreements regarding extradition and mutual assistance in criminal matters. The third principal area is a reconsideration of the basic policy underlying the criminal law. The criminal law reforms which have taken place in many countries during the past fifteen years have led the Institute's Director to emphasize the new developments centering around the rehabilitation of the individual.

History. Franz von Liszt gave new emphasis to the already venerable German tradition for the study of foreign criminal law at the end of the last century. In 1888 he began the publication of a series of foreign penal codes in German translation.[4] In the same year he joined a Belgian scholar, Prins, and a Dutch scholar, van Hamel, to found the International Association for Criminal Law and Criminology.[5] In 1894 and 1899 he published two volumes containing a systematic presentation of the non-German criminal law of virtually all the countries of the world, written by leading German and foreign authors.[6] Several years later most of the German criminal law specialists joined together to produce a sixteen-volume work, A Comparative Presentation of German and Non-German Penal Codes.[7]

This background suggests the tradition on which Adolf Schoenke could rely at the time he established his "Seminar" for Foreign and International Criminal Law at the University of Freiburg in 1938. He had previously been employed in the German Ministry of Justice, where part of his duties

[2] Conversion into a Max-Planck-Institute means not only greatly increased financial support for the Institute, but also the opportunity to obtain academic and technical assistance from other Max-Planck-Institutes and from the central administration of the Max Planck Association, e.g., in the planning of a new building for the Freiburg Institute.

[3] So far, the major work of the Institute has been almost exclusively in the field of substantive law.

involved comparative legal studies. He was familiar with the Kaiser-Wilhelm-Institutes for foreign and international private and public law in Berlin and wanted to establish a similar institute for criminal law in Freiburg.

But in 1938 the circumstances were no longer favorable for such a project. A new draft of a penal code had just been completed, and the Ministry of Justice therefore had little interest in extensive studies in comparative criminal law. The intellectual climate in Germany was becoming narrow and national. Schoenke was given 5,000 RM to establish a library, 600 RM for furniture and 1,000 RM per year to cover all his expenses. No provision was made for a typist. The "Seminar" was housed in a single room which it had to share with the University's Seminar for Private International Law.

That Schoenke was able to establish and keep the "Seminar" going under these conditions is a tribute to the best German academic tradition. He managed to secure temporary approval for a part-time secretary, which had to be renewed from time to time. He obtained various special grants from the German Research Foundation, the German Foreign Office, and the German Ministry of Justice. Because of the scarcity of foreign exchange he had to trade law books with Institutes in other countries. By November 1944, when the university was partly destroyed in the war, Schoenke had transferred his library of 5,000 books to a nearby cloister.

In the fall of 1945 Schoenke reopened his "Seminar" and was able to give legal advice on questions regarding the prosecution of Germans before foreign courts in Germany and abroad. The work was carried on in a single war-damaged room. As late as 1947 the seminar still had only one lawyer and one legal intern as assistants, and had to rely to a considerable extent on voluntary help to meet the demands made for its advice.

Schoenke was able to re-establish most of his contacts in foreign countries. The United States, France, Sweden, and Switzerland donated books to the "Seminar" and it was a beneficiary of the McCloy gift of the United States government.

After the founding of the Federal Republic in 1949, the financial position of the "Seminar," which in 1947 had been renamed an "Institute," improved. It began to receive funds from the Federal Ministry of Justice and also received a substantial increase in state funds.

Before Schoenke's untimely death in May 1953, plans had been made to convert the Institute into a foundation belonging to and supported by the university, and the state and federal governments. The conversion, which put the Institute on a sound financial basis, was completed in 1954 under his successor, the present Director of the Max-Planck-Institute, Hans-Heinrich Jescheck.

[8] Hans-Heinrich Jescheck was born in Silesia in 1915. He became an assistant professor in Tübingen in 1949, in Bonn in 1952, and an official of the Ministry of Justice in 1953. In 1954 he was appointed professor of the University of Freiburg and Director of the Institute for Foreign and International Criminal Law. He has been a part-time judge of the Supreme Court for Civil and Criminal Matters of Baden-Württemberg since 1957. It is not uncommon for German professors to be given the "appended" position (Nebenamt) of judge on the Supreme Court of a state. This promotes contact

Under Jescheck German contacts with foreign countries continued to increase. The staff of the Institute as well as its library continued to grow. In 1955 the extensive comparative legal studies, which were used for the purpose of making the new draft of the penal code, were completed. Similar studies were made from 1957 to 1959 with regard to post-conviction procedure and the register of criminal convictions.

The Institute is presently housed in two adjacent large old buildings, which were built as private residences around the turn of the last century. Plans are now being made for a new building, which is expected to be completed in 1971.

Staff and Organization. Professor Jescheck, the Director of the Institute, is its only senior member and the only member to have formal tenure. The Institute has nine Referenten, of whom one is a half-time employee, three assistants, and three part-time members, two judges and a Protestant prison minister.[9] One of the Referenten positions is usually reserved for a foreign scholar who generally remains in the Institute for a period of up to one year.

Most of the Referenten, although young, have considerable experience in comparative criminal law and in the law of the countries with which they are working; typically they will have spent some time studying in these countries. At least two of them had important positions with the Institute while they were still students. Many of them have graded practice examinations for Professor Jescheck, and have worked in the Institute part time while serving as legal interns.

Up till now few Referenten have left the Institute for other positions. Most of the male Referenten (the Institute has four women Referenten) hope to become professors of criminal law. The Director expects that most of them will remain in the Institute five or six years after passing their final (second) bar examinations. The women are expected to be permanent employees.

The Director stresses the difficulty of attempting to do reliable work in more than one foreign language or in more than one group of related legal systems. In choosing personnel for his Institute he emphasizes the importance of teamwork, and therefore pays particular attention to both ability to cooperate with others and proficiency in a foreign language.

The Institute attempts to keep abreast of criminal law developments of about sixty-five countries, with greater or lesser intensity. These are divided into twelve groups of countries, usually having the same language and similar legal systems; these groups are assigned to various members of the Institute.[10] One member is responsible for the problems of international criminal law rather than for a particular group of countries.

The legal staff of the Institute meets about once every two weeks on Thursday afternoons to discuss administrative and legal problems with and the exchange of ideas between the bench and the university. Jeschek participates in court sessions about once every two months.

[9] The minister reports on the execution of prison sentences and on the problems of rehabilitation. The three assistants are paid by the university.

[10] Several of these members have administrative duties as well (personnel administration, new building, the library).

the Director. Although most of the problems are discussed rather freely, the Director has the right to make the final decisions. At each of these sessions one of the members gives a talk on some of the problems in his specialized field of work. The staff of the Institute also includes two librarians, four secretaries, a translator for English who works half-time, a bookkeeper, and a caretaker.

The Institute has an advisory council of fourteen members. Its chairman is a former German undersecretary of justice who is now a judge on the Court of the European Communities in Luxemburg. Its members include the President of the Association Internationale de Droit Pénal, the President of the German Supreme Court for Civil and Criminal Matters, the Directors of the Heidelberg and Hamburg Institutes, and other prominent jurists and government officials.

Activities of the Institute

The activities of the institute fall into the following nine categories: (1) Following the current developments in the criminal law of foreign countries, from newspapers and legal literature (including acquisition of books for the library); (2) legal opinions on specific questions; (3) contact with foreign criminal law specialists through international meetings, exchange of assistants guest professors for comparative seminars and individual lectures; (4) comparative research for the purpose of statutory revision; (5) publication of the foreign part of the German journal of criminal law, the Zeitschrift für die gesamte Strafrechtswissensschaft; (6) publication of the series "The Contemporary Criminal Law of Foreign Countries " (usually written under contract by authors not on the Institute's staff); (7) publication of the series "Foreign Penal Codes in German Translation" (translations are usually made in the Institute); (8) publication of the series "Comparative Research in Criminal Law"; (9) Miscellaneous.[11]

Following the Developments in the Criminal Law of Foreign Countries. The Referenten trace the legal developments in foreign countries by reading legal periodicals, newspapers, statutes and court decisions. The method and intensity vary from country to country. For some countries, e.g., the Soviet Union, which do not have a system for recording their decisions, the Referenten have worked out their own index-card systems.

No attempt is made to keep all Referenten informed of the details of developments in countries outside their special areas. At the bimonthly meetings one Referent usually reports on a development of particular interest in one of the countries in his area. This provides coverage of the most important developments. Some members of the Institute feel that there should be greater exchange of information between the various "national departments" in the Institute.

[11] The relative expenditure of staff time for each is as indicated:

The staff turnover in the Institute is expected to be quite low. As a result, the Director expects that less than 20% of its energy, as compared with 30% for several of the other legal Institutes of the Max-Planck-Association, will be consumed in the training of young scholars. Nonetheless, the training in comparative legal method given by the Institute to young scholars represents one of its most important functions.

Opinions on Specific Legal Questions. The Institute receives a large number of requests for information and legal opinions from German ministries, courts, prosecutors, defense counsel and other German sources, and from abroad. These concern all aspects of foreign and international criminal law and procedure. Often these opinions involve a group project concerned with research in the laws of a number of countries.

Most of the Institute's opinions are charged at the German statutory rate for opinions given to courts, 15 DM per hour. The Director checks the opinions and charges for his time on the same basis as the time of the other members.

Contact with Foreign Criminal Law Specialists through International Meetings, Exchange of Assistants, Guest Professors for Comparative Seminars and Individual Lectures. The Institute had placed great emphasis on maintaining close contact with criminal-law experts in foreign countries and in working with international organizations. As previously stated, every three or four years it sends each Referent to a foreign country usually for six months.[12] The Institute maintains one Referent position for a foreign scholar. Moreover, it usually has between six and twelve foreign scholars resident at the Institute, of whom about two-thirds have German scholarships,[13] and one-third have foreign scholarships.

Comparative law seminars, which are conducted by a foreign professor in cooperation with Professor Jescheck usually using the language of the foreign professor, are now held every summer and are particularly valuable. They are attended by most of the Institute's staff as well as other selected scholars and students.[14]

Comparative Research for the Purposes of Statutory Revision. The revision of statutes in Germany is often preceded by particularly long and thorough studies under the supervision of the appropriate ministry.[15] Extensive comparative studies preparatory to a revision of the German Penal Code and other criminal laws have been made by the Institute at the request of the Ministry of Justice. Part of the work on these studies was done by members of the Institute and part by persons outside the Institute at the request of the Institute.

Prior to completion of the draft of the Penal Code twenty-two comparative studies were made on questions relating to the general part of the Code, and thirty on questions relating to the special part (the individual crimes). In

[13] These usually range appr. from 500 to 1.500 DM per month.

[14] The following professors participated in such seminars in recent summers: Gerhard O. W. Mueller (New York University) 1959; Richard Honig (now living in Princeton, N.J.) 1961 and 1963; Jerome Hall (Indiana University) 1961; Monrad G. Paulsen (Columbia University) 1964; Sanford H. Kadish (Berkeley), 1967. Plans for the next years include A. Rieg (University of Strasbourg) 1968 and Henry Weihofen (University of New Mexico) 1969.

[15] Studies have been under way for a complete revision of the German Penal Code since 1902. Important changes have been made, but the complete revision has as yet not been adopted.

each study reports were made on at least six countries: Austria, England, France, Italy, Switzerland, the United States, and on other national laws if some advantage was to be gained. Comparative summaries of these studies were published in the series Materials for Criminal Law Reform.[16] Copies of the entire study are kept in the Ministry of Justice and in the Institute.

Such studies usually have a substantial effect upon the statute. Fifty of the 484 sections of the Draft Penal Code of 1962 were directly influenced by comparative studies. There is considerable opposition to the draft on the ground, among others, that it emphasizes retribution too much and rehabilitation too little. Professor Jescheck has given a series of lectures comparing the German draft with the situation in Belgium, Greece, Italy, Portugal, and Switzerland, showing that these relatively conservative countries had gone further in the direction of reform than the German Draft.[17]

More recently studies have been made on such subjects as post conviction procedure,[18] the register of criminal convictions,[19] and military law.

Publication of the Foreign Part of the German Journal of Criminal Law. The Institute edits the foreign part of the German Journal of Criminal Law, Zeitschrift für die gesamte Strafrechtswissenschaft, which was founded in 1881 by Franz Liszt and Adolf Dochow. The foreign part[20] is published four times a year and will soon expand its size and format. It contains articles on foreign and comparative law, reports on foreign legislation and judicial developments, an extensive review of the important literature which has appeared in one country during recent years,[21] a regular literature review, and reports of meetings of international criminal law associations with German translations of important resolutions.

Publication of the series, "The Contemporary Criminal Law of Foreign Countries."[22] The purpose of this series is not only to present foreign law, but also to compare it with German law. For this reason authors are chosen who are experts in both German and foreign laws. Volumes of this series are usually not written in the Institute, but may be translated in the Institute. These works consist mainly of a presentation of the basic principles of one particular foreign system, but include some historical background as well and introductions to the jurisprudence of the countries involved.[23]

5,000 volumes and is growing at an annual rate of 5,000 volumes. In addition it subscribes to 532 periodicals.[81] It is the largest criminal law library in Germany and perhaps on the Continent. Additions, however, must still be made, especially to its African, Asian and Latin American collections, and to its holdings of older books containing historical background materials.

A uniform system of classification has been worked out by the Institute for the books of all the countries. In 1962 the Institute discontinued its index card file for articles due to the burdens of its administration. A few of the most important articles are now recorded in the library index as if they were separate books.

The library has in the past been headed by Referenten who add this responsibility to their normal work. The Institute hopes to acquire a full time director for its library soon. Each Referent is responsible for ordering books and periodicals from the countries which are assigned to him; he needs the approval of the Director only when making particularly expensive purchases.

Financial Aspects. The Institute was converted into a Max-Planck-Institute on July 1, 1966. Before the conversion its budget was about 100,000 DM per year of which slightly more than three fourths were costs for personnel. For the next few years the Institute's budget is expected to be about 700,000 DM per year. About two-third of this sum will be expended for salaries and most of the balance for the library. The Institute has also recently received a substantial grant from the Volkswagen Foundation to enlarge its library to a capacity of 200,000 volumes. Funds for the building, which is to be paid for by the Max Planck Association will not come out of the regular budget of the Institute.

Conclusion. With the ever-decreasing size of the world, there is a constant increase of practical problems in criminal law as well as other legal fields which involve the laws of more than one nation. Because of the frequently much underestimated language and cultural difficulties arising from the comparison of different legal systems, these problems can best be dealt with by a number of scholars, each an expert in his field, who work in cooperation. The most efficient way to provide for this cooperation over a substantial period of time is to establish an institution or an institutional framework. These institutions, once established, are also ideally suited for serving another equally or perhaps even more important purpose, that of law reform.

Social experiments relating to basic changes in criminal or other laws often require years of time and involve considerable expense. It is only common sense to attempt to learn as much as possible from the experiments and experiences of others. That such learning has in the past not always proved particularly valuable may well be the result of difficulties in communication. Any institution designed to meet these problems would also be in position to keep the academic community in its own countries informed of the relevant developments in other countries. Even today there exist misunderstandings of foreign legal institutions in a larger degree than is generally realized. This in my view is one reason why comparative research has not yet been able to fulfill its properly assigned tasks. Improvement is likely to come only when a much larger and more concerted attack is made on the problem than is made at present.

The question of how far the particular methods of the Institute in Freiburg are worthy of imitation is one on which legal scholars may reasonably differ. The more important point is that a serious institutionalized effort is being made in the Federal Republic to utilize the experiences of other peoples for the purpose of improving national law. Furthermore, the Germans are realistic and do not expect immediate results, or even results within a period of several years. They realize that social improvement is a long, slow process.

The Freiburg Institute appears to be giving all the help to the German legal system in solving day-to-day criminal law problems involving contacts with non-German law that could reasonably be expected. Progress in basic law reform appears to have been somewhat more limited. This may be due to an overemphasis on a traditionalist-positivist approach, which is by no means limited to Germany. The increased funds recently made available to the Institute, and the increased interest in an interdisciplinary, sociological and psychological approach to criminal law problems both inside and outside of Germany, greatly improve the likelihood that the Freiburg Institute will make truly basic contributions to the development of criminal law in the Federal Republic in the relatively near future.

A Comparative Study of Criminal Insanity: A Plea for the Abolition of the Insanity Defense

(Paul Koota, Brooklyn Law School)

Insanity as a defense to crime is frequently discussed in various contexts, but rarely is it suggested that the defense be totally abolished. The predictable complete opposition to such a suggestion is based upon several universally-known concepts which, although often deemed to be scientific facts forming a permanent part of the law, are merely, at best, theoretical assumptions used by various psychiatrists and psychologists in formulating their theories, or, at worst, value judgments made by individuals in the often-fulfilled hope of depriving others of their freedom.

Most modern theories of abnormal human behavior may be classified as being based either upon the classical medical model of abnormality or upon the behavioral model.[1] The medical model of abnormality postulates the existence of mental illness and mental health, and suggests that the former is an illness in the same sense as any physical illness.[2] It involves a display of symptoms (abnormal behavior) resulting from internal causes (defects of the mind or personality), and hence a cure thereof can only result if treatment is directed to the underlying causes, rather than to the manifestations thereof. An important principle to note is that just as there are qualitative physical differences between physically healthy and ill people, so are there qualitative differences between mentally healthy and ill people. If this is conceeded, it is readily seen that mentally healthy and mentally ill people should be treated differently.

Totally opposed to the classical medical model is the behavioral model which, if not outrightly denying the existence of mental illness or mental health, questions the utility of so postulating.[3] Although the behavioral model recognizes the existence of physical illness, it attacks the existence of mental illness as an analogue thereof. It postulates that all social behavior is learned as a result of the past environmental consequences of an individual's behavior upon him, and that to change a person's behavior one need only change the person's environment (more precisely, the environmental consequences of his responding). This theory postulates that since all social behavior is learned, there are no qualitative differences between 'healthy' and 'sick' individuals, and that although these labels are ostensibly placed upon individuals as a medical diagnosis, they merely reflect the labeller's opinion as to the desirability or appropriateness of the behavior. That is, if an individual labelled another as 'mentally ill,' one could only infer from this statement that the labeller either didn't like this behavior, felt it was out of place in this particular social context, or believed that it was annoying other people. Note, however, that all of these statements describe a person's social deviancy in terms of value judgments, rather than his pathological medical condition in terms of scientific findings. It follows that if the analogy of mental illness is faulty, and that there are no physical differences between mentally healthy and ill individuals, they should be treated similarly.[4]

To demonstrate the differences in application of these theories to real-life situations, consider a man who has murdered his wife by stabbing her 25 times with a carving knife, and then proceeded on to his place of work in his normal fashion. A believer in mental illness would certainly label this man as 'mentally ill,' and would proceed to diagnose the specific 'illness' on the basis of internal personality characteristics (e.g., did the man have a weak ego—was he paranoid—had he been seized by an irresistible impulse). The psychiatrist or phychologist, believing this man to be ill, would suggest that he is qualitatively different from a normal man (i.e., no normal man would kill his wife and then go on with his routine), and hence should be treated differently from a normal man. A behaviorally oriented psychologist,

[4] There are many other basic differences between these two theories regarding classification and terminology, testing and measurement, methods of treatment, and prediction of future behavior, but for the purposes of this work, those differences earlier described are deemed the most relevant.

however, would merely regard the act as a specific response learned by the person, and would look to the environment to discover what behavioral consequences existed to reward the individual for killing his wife (e.g., did the man have a lover—did he have a friend who did the same thing and escaped without punishment). Reasoning that the psychiatrist's diagnosis of illness represented a mere value judgment as to the social desirability of such an act, the behavioral psychologist would not expect this man to be deemed 'abnormal' in an absolute sense, or to be treated any differently, in a qualitative sense, from any other individual, on the basis of this single determination.

At this point, it can be seen that insanity need not be uncritically accepted as a defense to crime. If, as the medical model states, mental illness exists and a mentally ill person should be treated differently from a mentally healthy person, the law should act in accordance, and insanity should be a defense to crime. If, however, as the behavioral model states, mental illness does not exist, and that there is little or no utility in discriminating between a mentally ill person and a mentally healthy person, the law should again act in accordance, and insanity should not be a defense.

It would be futile at this point to argue that one theory is right and that another is wrong, or that one has merit and that another does not. It suffices to point out that the criminal defense of insanity is not an immutable part of the law, but is merely a consequence of a psychological theory which, like all other theories, is based upon certain assumptions which, in turn, are always open to challenge, and may be replaced by more utilitarian or parsimonious assumptions should the need arise. The fact that the majority of the people prefers one view to the other does not make that view the correct one, and hence in no way detracts from the above reasoning. With these ideas in mind, consider now the rules and procedures used throughout the world in employing the criminal defense of insanity.

First, consider the development of the definitions of and tests for criminal insanity in the United States.[5] [6] [7] Like many sections of common law in America, the insanity defense finds its origins in English law. In the earliest times, a madman charged with murder was not acquitted; rather, the court rendered a special verdict that he was mad, and then the king pardoned him.[8] The next doctrine set forth was the so-called "wild beast" test, expounded in Arnold's Case and Hadfield's Case.[9] The Court held here that an individual would not be excused unless first, he was totally deprived of reason, understanding, and memory; and second, he did not know what he was doing any more than would a wild beast. The next major advance was made in 1812 in Parke's Case, in which the Court suggested as a test the ability to discriminate between right and wrong, as used in a general sense.[10]

Then, in 1843, Daniel M'Naghten's Case was decided.[11] The Court held (in an advisory opinion responding to hypothetical questions given to it by the Lords) that in order to acquit an individual on the grounds of insanity, it must be satisfactorily shown that at the time of the deed, the individual was suffering from:

"... such a defect of reason...., as to not know the nature and quality of the act he was doing, or as not to know that what he was doing was wrong." [12]

The Court emphasized that "wrong" here used referred to moral rather than legal wrong, and that so long as an individual was aware that the act was morally wrong, he could be convicted. The Court went on to hold that if an individual committed a criminal act, and was aware at the time that he was breaking the law, he could be punished, even if he had been influenced by an "insane delusion." The Court, paradoxically, was here referring to legal rather than moral wrong, and the conflict in interpretation of "wrong" in this case has generated much discussion.

[5] There are many aspects to the issue of insanity as a defense to crime, some of which are procedural rather than substantive. This work will focus primarily upon two aspects of the law: first various definitions of and tests for insanity; and second, the treatment of an individual who has been acquitted by reason of insanity at the time of the act.

[6] It should be stressed at the outset that whereas 'psychosis,' and 'mental disease' are purely medical terms, 'insanity' is purely a legal term, a hypothetical construct of the court.

[7] This is not really accurate; it would be better to say, 'the definitions of and tests for the existence of a mental condition sufficient to justify exemption from punishment,' since not every jurisdiction (or country, for that matter) adopts the concept of 'insanity' per se. For convenience of writing, however, the all-inclusive term 'insanity' will be used hereinafter.

To this point, the great bulk of law in this field had emanated from the English courts. American courts, however, soon began to make their own law. The first important rule formulated was the so-called "New Hampshire" rule, which stated that an act produced by a mental disease is not a crime.[13] The next step forward was the formulation of the "irresistible impulse" doctrine, stated in the case of Hankins v. State.[14] The Court here held that even if an individual was aware of the nature and consequences of an act and knew that it was wrong, yet if he was compelled by an irresistible impulse to commit the act, the insanity defense would be available to him. In the midst of enlarging the scope of the defense, an Arkansas Court in 1928 eliminated as a possible defense "emotional or moral insanity," holding that the temporary suspension of reason or conscience by passion would not succesfully defend or rebut criminal charges.[15]

In 1954, the Circuit Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia handed down its decision in Durham v. United States.[16] The Court took notice of the previous adoption in its jurisdiction of a 'combination' test (consisting of the M'Naghten rules and the irresistible impulse doctrine) and then declared this test insufficient, holding that the M'Naghten rules were not commensurate with the latest psychological information, and that the irresistible impulse test eliminated defenses based upon a less demonstrative form of insanity. The Court went on to suggest an additional test:

"... an accused is not criminally responsible if his unlawful act was the product of a mental disease or defect." [17]

This test was a considerable departure from earlier tests, in that it now made possible a defense of insanity on the basis of any recognized mental illness, rather than the few included by M'Naghten and Hankins. It is to be noted, however, that the newly formulated Durham rule augmented, rather than supplanted, the earlier doctrines, and furthermore that the rule was not totally original; it had been earlier stated, in a somewhat different form, in the "New Hampshire" rule.

In the next year, the American Law Institute, presenting its Fourth Tentative Draft of the Model Penal Code, suggested a new test for criminal insanity; namely, that:

"A person is not responsible for criminal conduct if at the time of such conduct as a result of mental disease or defect he lacks substantial capacity either to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law." [18]

Moreover,

"The terms 'mental disease or defect' do not include an abnormality manifested only by repeated criminal or otherwise anti-social conduct." [19]

As of the time of this formulation, the drafters noted, 31 states had adopted some form of the M'Naghten rules, 15 states had adopted the previously discussed 'combination' test, while only two jurisdictions (New Hampshire and the District of Columbia) had adopted a 'mental disease' test which, as the Durham Court had explained, was more in tune with current medico-legal knowledge.[20]

In recent years, the ALI test has been deemed to be even more in keeping with the scientific community than has the Durham test. Various jurisdictions have adopted the former, either in a pure form or in a modified form. For example, in 1961, the Circuit Court of Appeals in United States v. Currens adopted the ALI test, omitting the phrase, "to appreciate the criminality of his conduct," on the ground that the phrase placed undue stress upon the mind.[21] [22] The 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals in United States v. Freeman, however, adopted the ALI test in toto, claiming it to be superior to the Durham rule, in that, first, it eliminated the problem of establishing a causal relation between conduct and mental disease; and, second, it provided workable guidelines for a lay jury.[23]

At present, although many jurisdictions undoubtedly adhere to some form of the M'Naghten rules or other earlier formulations, a significant number of jurisdictions is incorporating into its law, either by judicial decision or by statute, some of these later tests of insanity, deemed more modern in theory and more practical in application.

Although much debate and discussion have centered around the definitions of and tests for insanity, an even greater amount of controversy has arisen concerning the proper treatment and handling of an individual after he has been acquitted by reason of insanity. The problem arises from the following common law axioms:

First: in order for a person to be criminally punished by "normal" methods (e.g., fine, imprisonment, or execution), he must have committed a crime.

Second: in order for a person to have committed a crime, he must have performed a criminal act, and have had criminal intent.

Third: in order for a person to have had criminal intent, he must have been sane at the time of the act.[24]

Furthermore, although treatment of the offender within the United States varies to a certain extent from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, certain rules seem to be applied universally.[25] First, an individual, upon acquittal, will almost always be sent to a medically oriented institution for the criminally insane, the avowed objectives of which are to cure the offender of his illness, protect the offender from himself, and protect society from the offender. Second, the offender may be so incarcerated constitutionally, without a hearing as to his present mental condition, so long as there are some means available to him for achieving his release upon the proof of his recovery. Third, most jurisdictions have some provisions for a periodic review of the offender's condition, and if at any time the offender can satisfactorily demonstrate that he has recovered (i.e., that he no longer presents a danger to himself or others), he may be released, either conditionally or unconditionally. In some jurisdictions, however, a certain amount of time must elapse between the original committment and the first review, independent of the actual condition of the offender. Furthermore, the offender will only have a right to a writ of habeas corpus if no other remedy exists; hence, if there is any statutory provision for review and release, he will not be entitled to the writ, regardless of the actual circumstances.

Although the committment procedure outlined above appears to be logical and orderly, many questions and problems concerning the effectiveness of the procedure and the rights (and possible violations thereof) of the offender, have arisen. In a 1960 law review article, Henry Weihofen considers the treatment of such offenders.[26] He suggests that an important issue to resolve concerns the proper emphasis upon therapy as opposed to security in the institutions. He believes that many factors, such as limited training and rapid turnover of attendants, as well as public opinion, provide pressure for an emphasis upon security rather than therapy, and then forcefully argues for a redirection of emphasis toward helping the individuals. Weihofen's second argument is directed toward release procedures. He believes that many hospitals' over-cautious attitudes with regards to the release of offenders is self-defeating, in that hospitals are gradually accumulating large numbers of non-tractable patients (i.e., those who never quality for release). He concludes by suggesting that release procedures be liberalized, and provisions for post-release supervision be made.

[24] It is readily seen, of course, that the previous discussion of definitions and tests relates to this particular axiom; i.e., the definitions and tests are used to establish lack of sanity, which justifies the conclusion of lack of criminal intent.

[26] Weihofen, Institutional Treatment of Persons Acquitted by Reason of Insanity, 38 Texas L. Rev. 849 (1960).

The courts have been no less concerned with the post-acquittal treatment of an insane offender; they, of course, are more properly concerned with striking a proper balance between the protection of society from the offender, and the protection of the offender's own rights. In the case of Ragsdale v. Overholser, the plaintiff brought a habeas corpus proceeding to obtain release from an institution in which he had been incarcerated after acquittal, and claimed that the statute pursuant to which he had been committed was unconstitutional, in that it denied him of his freedom without due process of law.[27] The plaintiff claimed the denial since the statute permitted committment without an affirmative finding of insanity at the time of committment. In holding the statute constitutional, the Court first held that the plaintiff had adequate safeguards at his disposal with which to protect his rights (i.e., the right to sue for a writ of habeas corpus). It next stated that the statute was practical, in that, in view of the fact that some time must elapse between acquittal and determination of the individual's present mental condition, it would be better spent with the offender in prison than at large. The Court held that it was not unfair to require that an offender, who has been absolved from punishment due to insanity at the time of the act, be confined until it has been determined whether or not he has recovered.

Later cases, however, have manifested more concern for the acquitted offender. In Lynch v. Overholser, the Court held that a District of Columbia statute, requiring a court to order committment of any offender acquitted on the grounds of insanity at the time of the act, applied only to an individual who had relied affirmatively upon the defense of insanity, and not to an offender who had all along maintained that he had been sane at the time of the act.[28] Further, the Court in Cameron v. Fisher held that the acquittal of an individual on the grounds of insanity was not tantamount to an adjudication that he was insane, at the time of the act; it merely indicated that, upon all of the evidence, there was a reasonable doubt as to whether or not the offender had had legal capacity to commit the crime.[29]

The above discussion indicates merely a few of the issues which have been raised concerning the post-acquittal treatment of an offender. As will become evident, these and related problems, as well as the more fundamental questions regarding the definitions of and tests for insanity, are by no means limited to the United States, or even to common law jurisdictions.

In Europe, the majority of countries had codified its definitions of and tests for insanity, although these codes often vary greatly in complexity. Some nations have proposed fairly concise and seemingly straightforward definitions and tests. For example, the Austrian Penal Act states that to determine whether or not an act or omission done by an individual is a felony, it must be determined whether or not, among other things, that person was capable or reasoning; if so, he will be held criminally liable for his acts.[30] Furthermore, the Act provides that partial impairment of reasoning ability, reduced intelligence, or partial loss of understanding may be deemed mitigating circumstances in the allocation of punishment.[31] Again, the Norwegian Penal Code states simply that, "An act is not punishable if committed while the perpetrator was insane or unconscious.." and also provides for a partial reduction of punishment, "when the act is committed . . . during temporary strong reduction of consciousness. . . ." [32] Finally, the French Penal Code reads, "If the person charged with the commission of a felony or misdemeanor was then insane. . . ., no offense has been committed." [33] Incidentally, the earlier-mentioned irresistible impulse doctrine is also recognized by French criminal law.[34]

Other nations, however, have formulated more complex tests. The West German Draft Penal Code of 1962, for example, has an elaborate set of criteria for determining which offenders will be excused from punishment; specifically:

"Anybody who at the time of the act is incapable of appreciating the unlawfulness of his act or of acting in accordance with such an appreciation, by reason of a morbid mental or emotional disturbance, a corresponding disturbance of consciousness, or low mentality, acts without guilt." [35]

Here, too, the Code provides for mitigating circumstances based upon the partial or reduced capacity of an individual, with regards to the above criteria.[36] [37]

John Biggs, in a survey of the approaches of several European nations to the insanity defense, discusses some additional tests for insanity employed by these nations.[38] In Denmark, for example, the relevant criterion by which to determine freedom from punishment is the presence or absence of mental disease capable of causing a lack of responsibility. Belgium's tests are similar to those adopted in France, while in Italy the accused will be deemed exempt from liability if a mental aberration has resulted in the individual's lack of understanding or volition. Switzerland, interestingly, has adopted the M'Naghten rules almost literally. The Netherlands, finally, has established a general rule that if the accused is suffering from a grave mental disorder, he will almost always be exempt from punishment.

In turning from definitions of and tests for insanity as a criminal defense to the post-acquittal treatment of offenders, consider first the procedures used by several nations in Western Europe. The 1962 German Draft Penal Code contains lengthy provisions on the subject.[39] Generally, if an individual who has been acquitted due to insanity constitutes a future danger to society, he will be ordered committed either to a medical or nursing institution. The individual will be institutionalized until he no longer presents a danger, at which time he will be released. The court may at any point review the committment, and must do so at specific intervals. The Penal Code of the German Federal Republic contains basically the same provisions, describing some of the rules in greater detail.[40] It is interesting to note that (according to the latter Code) the avowed objectives of post-acquittal treatment are cure and care, and furthermore, that although there are several measures of "safety and rehabilitation" listed (one of which is confinement in a workhouse), only the first (i.e., confinement in an institution for cure and care) is, in practice, generally assigned to an acquitted offender. Finally, the discharge of an allegedly cured offender is always deemed conditional, subject to a variety of conditions subsequent. Tuteur and Venzlaff, commenting upon German post-acquittal treatment, note the presence of strict rules regarding judicial review of an individual's committment, beginning a mere three days after admission, and involving rights of appeal and future review within sixty days thereafter, if the individual so requests.[41] They indicate that the potentially dangerous lack of the writ of habeas corpus may be offset by the favorable procedures outlined above.

Switzerland's post-acquittal treatment, as described by Anton Harder, is predominantly determined by the psychiatrist (as opposed to the courts or other institutions), varies from canton to canton (due to Switzerland's strong tradition of localism), and is often affected by a scarcity of psychiatrists, not only at the institutionalization stage, but also in the initial evaluation stage, in the sense that the probability that an acquitted individual will be institutionalized (rather than merely be placed on probation) will be directly related to the availability of psychiatric evaluation, which in turn will be directly related to the availability of psychiatrists.[42] The available post-acquittal procedures are custodial care, treatment in an institution, and release on probation. Finally, a further problem arises from a lack of hospital facilities, which results in the indiscriminate mixing of criminally and non-criminally insane individuals.

Biggs' article, in distinguishing the Netherlands' post-acquittal treatment from that of Switzerland (whose laws on the subject are almost identical), points to the fact that the determination of the particular method of treatment to be used for the offender in the former nation is largely a function of classification of the offender at the Utrecht Psychiatric Observation Clinic.[43] At the clinic, a specialized team of psychiatrists, psychologists, and social workers classifies the offender as either responsible, partly responsible, or irresponsible, and, then, if a psychopath, as to type. By means of such classification process, it is believed, the best method of post-acquittal treatment can be determined. The basic format of institutionalization and concurrent enforcement of rights discussed with regards to West Germany applies as well to the Netherlands, although perhaps not with such rigorous review provisions.

In the same article, Biggs takes a quick glance at the nations of Italy and Luxembourg.[44] With regards to Italy, he notes that the general standard of determination adopted elsewhere of whether or not an acquitted offender should be institutionalized (i.e., does offender present danger to society) is used here. The viewing of confinement as a security measure, and the periodic review of incarcerated offenders, have also been incorporated into the Italian system. With regards to Luxembourg, Biggs observes that the nation's purpose for having post-acquittal treatment is to rehabilitate rather than punish, and that, to this end, a national governmental committee has been organized to prevent crime, maintain mental health, and promote social welfare.

Consider now the methods of post-acquittal treatment used by the Scandinavian nations. The Norwegian Penal Code provides several safety measures, all of which are theoretically available to a criminally insane individual, some of which involve the standard procedure of committment to an institution, and some of which involve other procedures, such as placing the individual under police supervision or probation, keeping him in custody (of whom is not specified), or placing him in private care.[45] Here, as in West Germany, fairly rigorous procedural rules for the incarceration in, and eventual release from, an institution exist. All decisions which affect incarceration are made by the Public Ministry, supplemented by a physician's opinion. Although an individual's discharge cannot take place until the Ministry's position is known, an individual need not wait longer than three months after an announcement of his alleged recovery. Biggs' article supplements the above information by adding an interesting footnote.[46] Evidently there has been a number of cases in which, although the physicians have found the individual to be insane, the court has proceeded to find the individual sane, thus totally ignoring the testimony of the psychiatric expert.

O. Kinberg, in an article discussing forensic psychiatry in Sweden, describes post-acquittal treatment as being largely determined by such national organizations as the Forensic Psychiatric Clinic of Stockholm, the Central Archive of Criminology, and the Forensic Psychiatric Commission, all of which supply data and manpower used in determining the optimal post-acquittal treatment of a given offender.[47] Despite the availability of such resources, however, the ultimate decision still rests, as in other nations, with the court. The alleged goals of post-acquittal treatment are two-fold: first, to socially rehabilitate the offender; and second, (if the first is not possible) to render the offender harmless. If the offender has a gross disorder, Kinberg suggests, there will be little or no difficulty in having the individual committed to a mental hospital. On the other hand, if the offender, although insane at the time of the act, no longer requires hospitalization, he may be released, and treated as merely an outpatient. Other measures involve the placing of offenders in "security establishments," and the interning of individuals in special mental hospital wards. Kinberg makes one caveat which merits repetition:

". . . they (offenders) often lack such symptoms as are considered signs of mental disease by the man in the street. Therefore, it can be very difficult to get the courts or juries to understand that such persons are sick and belong to the domain of medicine. Although a purely medical treatment is not to be had, they ought, being diseased people, not to be placed in prisons under the direction of non-medical staff. For even where medical treatment is reduced to a kind of vague psychotherapy, it should be applied under medical guidance." [48]

Biggs comments upon Swedish practice, and although reaffirming Kinberg's outline of procedure in substance, points to the existence of several problems, such as the lack of psychiatric manpower, lack of medical sophistication among the general public, and the inability of many psychiatrists to agree on basic diagnoses of mental conditions.[49] Biggs also notes that although the court, in rendering a final decision as to the post-acquittal treatment of the offender, usually has before it the report of the official psychiatrist, it rarely has the psychiatrist himself. In concluding, Biggs reiterates Kinberg's view (as stated in a separate article) that the emphasis of post-acquittal handling of an offender should be upon treatment rather than upon punishment, not only because of 'moral' considerations, but also because the avowed goal of all penal measures (moral and educational rehabilitation) can be so better served.[50]

Biggs, in outlining post-acquittal procedures employed in Denmark, finds many similarities to those employed in Sweden, including the presence of many national institutions providing aid to the courts, such as the Forensic Medicine Council at Copenhagen, and the institution at Herstedvesta for recidivists.[51] Four general post-acquittal procedures are employed (the first three of which are applicable if the offender presents a danger to society, and the last of which is applicable if the offender does not): first, committment to a mental hospital; second, committment to an institution for psychopaths; third, committment to an institution for imbeciles; and fourth, the appointment of a guardian or supervisor. In discussing the Herstedvesta institution, Biggs quotes its director as claiming that 55% of the offenders are returned to society without criminal tendencies. This allegedly high cure rate is deemed partially attributable to the lack of physical restraint in the institution, the lack of enforced therapy, and favorable public support. Marring this picture, however, is the fact that, in many cases, castration of sex offenders is deemed the only cure for deviate sexual behavior.

Finally, consider nations in Eastern Europe. The Turkish Criminal Code, besides providing for authority of the court to determine the type of post-acquittal treatment to be employed, and providing the typical criterion for determining when an offender should be released, requires that when an offender is about to be released, the hospital must submit a report to the court, indicating that the offender has recovered, and further indicating whether or not the individual must be subjected to post-release medical control and examination (not necessarily limited to out-patient treatment) which is the responsibility of the prosecuting attorney.[52] Should this be required, the frequency of such examinations must be stated, and if, after the offender's release, he again becomes sick, he will once again be placed in the institution. Finally, in describing procedures employed in Yugoslavia, Biggs notes that the principle adopted by legal and medical authorities with regards to post-acquittal treatment is that man's behavior is not fixed, but is capable of being changed as a function of environmental changes.[53] Based upon such belief, the goals of post-acquittal treatment are to better the offender and return him to society.

In turning from the nations of Europe to the nations of Asia, consider a few of the definitions of and tests for insanity used by these nations. The Criminal Code Ordinance of Israel requires two conditions precedent in order for a person who has committed a criminal act to be exempted from punishment on the grounds of insanity.[54] First, he must have been, at the time of the act, suffering from a mental disease. Second, he must have been, at the time of the act, incapable of comprehending his own actions as a result of this mental disease. Although this test appears to be an exact copy of the American "New Hampshire" rule, it must be remembered that Israeli law is based upon not only American and English law, but also upon Arabic, French, and Turkish law, and hence that the above test will be interpreted and used under the influence of these non-common law bodies of law.

The Korean Criminal Code states that:

"A person who, due to a mental disorder, is unable to pass rational judgments or to control his will, is not punishable." [55]

[55] The Korean Criminal Code 1953 art. 10(1) (1960).

Besides containing a provision for partial reduction of punishment due to mitigating circumstances based upon deficiency of mental capacity, the Korean Code provides the following interesting provision:

"The provisions of the preceding two Sections shall not apply to criminal conduct of a person who, anticipating the risk of committing crime, has intentionally incurred mental disorder." [56]

In a preliminary discussion concerning the origins of the above tests, the translator notes two important sources of influence from which the Korean Code has evolved; namely, German law and Anglo-American law.[57] He maintains first that the fact that 'incapacity' in Korean law may be either cognitive or volitional stems from the combined influences of German and English law, in that whereas Anglo-American law defines 'insanity' in cognitive terms, Germany has done so in volitional terms. He declares secondly that whereas the existence of mitigating circumstances is unknown in Anglo-American law, it exists in Germany, and has been directly incorporated therefrom into Korean law.

The Preparatory Draft for the Revised Penal Code of Japan presents another interesting test for the exemption from punishment of an allegedly insane criminal; i.e.:

"Acts committed by a person who, as a result of mental disorder, lacks capacity to discriminate as to the propriety of his conduct or to act according to such discrimination are not punishable." [58]

The Draft also provides for mitigating circumstances, and for the above described self-induced insanity.[59]

M. J. Gamboa, in An Introduction to Philippine Law, maintains that there are three requisite elements of a crime: there must be an act or omission, the act or omission must be voluntary, and the act or omission must be punishable by law.[60] In order for the act or omission to be voluntary, there must exist freedom of will, intelligence, and intent to commit the criminal act. According to Philippine law, there can be no freedom of will if an individual was seized by an irresistible impulse, and no intelligence if the offender was insane at the time of the act.[61] Reduction of punishment due to mitigating circumstances based upon partial presence of the three 'voluntary' requirements is also possible.

Finally, the Criminal Code of the Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic provides a test which is fairly representative of some other Republics, and at the same time serves as a model code for others:

"A person shall not be subject to criminal responsibility who at the time of committing a socially dangerous act is in a state of non-imputability, that is, cannot realize the significance of his actions or control them because of chronic mental illness, temporary mental derangement, mental deficiency, or other condition of illness." [62]

Furthermore,

". . . a person shall not be subject to punishment who commits a crime while in a state of imputability but before rendering of judgment by the Court contracts a mental illness which deprives him of the possibility of realizing the significance of his actions or of controlling them . . . but, upon recovery, he may be subject to punishment." [63]

Consider now the post-acquittal treatment of a criminally insane individual in the various Asian nations. The Preparatory Draft for the Revised Penal Code of Japan states that whether or not an individual acquitted by reason of insanity will be subjected to "curative measures" depends upon first, the predicted probability of the reoccurence of the criminal behavior on the part of the offender; and second, the extent to which these measures are demanded by interests of public safety.[64] The curative measures almost always involve commitment to a security institution, the duration of which is initially five years, with the possibility of an unlimited number of three-year extensions. The statute provides, however, that there be a minimum of one review every year to ascertain whether or not the curative measures should continue. Finally, the Draft provides for a provisional release from the institution, brought about by administrative action. Because the release is provisional, however, the released offender is placed under professional supervision, and always faces the possibility of reincarceration.

The Criminal Code of the Republic of China labels its laws concerning post-acquittal treatment as "Peace Preservation Measures." [65] An individual exempted from punishment due to insanity may be incarcerated in a mental institution for an apparently unspecified period of time. There is the customary provision relating to the possible release of the offender at an early date if it is satisfactorily shown that he has recovered, as well as a provision for lengthening the stay, if deemed necessary. There does not appear to be, however, any provision for periodic review of the offender's condition, or for fixed time limits for periods of incarceration, as exist in Japan.

Finally, consider the post-acquittal treatment of an individual in the U.S.S.R. The Criminal Code of the Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic states that, in general, an offender may be committed to either a general psychiatric hospital or to a special psychiatric hospital.[66] Committment to a general psychiatric hospital will take place if the individual, by his behavior, shows a need for compulsory hospitalization and treatment. Committment to a special psychiatric hospital will occur, on the other hand, if the individual, again by his behavior, presents a special threat to public safety. The Code notes that:

"Persons committed to a special psychiatric hospital shall be kept in conditions of a reinforced supervision that excludes the possibility of their commission of a new socially dangerous act." [67]

In choosing the proper type of hospital for the offender, the court considers such factors as the type of mental illness involved, and the weight of the social danger posed by the given act. The court is given broad powers to terminate the incarceration, to alter the type of hospital being used, and even to remand the individual to the care of relatives or guardians.

Hazard, Shapiro, and Maggs supplement the above description of treatment by stating that if the offender who has been incarcerated might be sane, the hospital is obliged to appoint a commission of physicians, and to transmit its findings to the proper court.[68] Furthermore, every offender undergoing compulsory psychiatric treatment must have his case reviewed by such a commission no less than every six months. The judicial decision, Case of Illiodorova, is illustrative of these last points.[69] An individual who was found to be "non-imputable" was subjected to compulsory psychiatric treatment. The hospital, seeking to have her released, appointed a medical commission and submitted its report to the Court. The Moscow Provincial Court, on the basis of this report, discharged the offender from the hospital. The Judicial Division vacated the judgment of the lower Court, holding that the reports presented thereto had been incomplete, and that such reports were to be based upon a complete examination of the individual.

H. J. Berman provides some thoughtful comments concerning the underlying attitudes which have shaped the statutory methods of treatment.[70] According to Soviet theory, the law, by maintaining social order, maintains the mental health of the community, by giving order to interpersonal relations, by providing constructive vents for destructive impulses, and by giving to individuals a sense of community with each other. Berman's caveat bears repetition:

"Whether law adequately fulfills these (psychological) functions depends upon whether certain assumptions about human personality, implicit in law, are in fact valid." [71] [72]

[72] Unfortunately, Berman never heeds his own warning, but contents himself with determining the extent to which psychological assumptions agree with legal assumptions.

Berman goes on to point out that, more importantly, the Soviet Union's criminal law is considered a tool with which to shape the behavior of the people into the image of the "new Soviet man." Although criminal law is obviously concerned with the adjudication of legal rights, it is no less concerned with the shaping of ideas and attitudes of the offender and the general public. This 'educational' goal of criminal law, and especially of post-acquittal treatment, is reinforced by the prevailing belief that the behavior of people may be altered by the alteration of their environment.[73] [74] Since the goal of treatment is to change the offender's behavior, and since it is at least theoretically possible for anyone to properly change the behavior by changing the environment, one might imagine that post-acquittal treatment would not be limited to whatever treatment could be given by a physician, but rather could be performed by anyone capable of properly altering the environment. Indeed, this has been codified, as earlier seen, with regards to the various options possessed by a court.[75]

Writing a few years later, Berman again stressed the utilitarian approach taken by Soviet criminal law.[76] Today's purpose of criminal law in general, and of post-acquittal treatment in specific, is to foster external and self-discipline for and within the individual, rather than to 'do' justice in an abstract sense. Berman goes on to evaluate the post-acquittal treatment of the individual. He contends that various institutions in the Soviet Union, the most important of which is the Serbskii Institute of Forensic Psychiatry, help to convert the above described goals of treatment into sensible, result-oriented methods. He further notes that the court, in determining the appropriate post-acquittal treatment to be employed, is typically more concerned with the social danger presented by the offender, than it is with the specific rehabilitation of the offender; i.e., it is more concerned with maintaining an individual's group productivity, and with reeducating him for his proper role in society, than with promoting an individual's personal welfare.

Turning now to South America, it becomes apparent that most of the nations therein have codified their definitions of and tests for insanity after the fashion of many of the European nations earlier mentioned. For example, the Argentine Penal Code exempts from punishment:

"Anybody who at the time of commission of the crime could not appreciate the unlawfulness of the deed or control his actions, by reason of insufficiency or diseased disturbances of his mind, . . ." [77]

The only quasi-definition appearing in the Colombian Penal Code, on the other hand, is that any individual who experienced a mental "alienation at the time of the act will be punished according to certain specified provisions." [78] The Code does provide, however, for the reduction of punishment if an individual displays "Conditions of psychical inferiority. . . ." [79]

With regards to South American provisions for post-acquittal treatment, the measures once again seem to be almost identical to those of some of the European nations. The Argentine Penal Code requires that any individual acquitted as insane must be incarcerated in an insane asylum.[80] The offender can only be released by a court decision, which in turn will be based upon advice from the public prosecutor and a panel of medical experts, testifying as to the offender's recovery or lack thereof.

According to the Colombian Penal Code, the predominant post-acquittal treatment is also commitment to a psychiatric institution which, at least statutorily, is in the total charge of psychiatrists, and is completely independent of any analogous institution for the non-criminally insane.[81] Once committed, the offender must remain there for two years or until such time as he will be adjudicated sane, presumably whichever comes first. In any event, the offender

[73] What is interesting is that these beliefs, emphasizing the ability of and need for the State to change an individual's behavior to fit a desired norm, coexist with the belief that a person is responsible for his own character and behavior.

[74] To the extent that this belief is maintained by Soviet psychologists and psychiatrists, one might conclude that, in fact, a behavioral rather than medical model of abnormality has been adopted. Yet such a conclusion does not seem justified when viewed in the light of the statutory provisions for insanity as a defense to crime.

cannot be released without a court order which, in turn, will only be issued after a hearing at the office of the Attorney General. Another method of post-acquittal treatment used in Colombia is labelled "supervised liberty." This method involves the placing of the offender in the care of a family, nursing home, hospital, or ordinary insane asylum for a minimum period of two years. Throughout this period, they are subjected to the constant supervision of a guardianship council.

Finally, in considering the nations of Africa with regard to their laws concerning the defense of criminal insanity, it is useful to make reference to A. Milner's collection of scholarly articles on the subject. With regards to definitions of and tests for insanity, Milner and Asuni point out that a large number of African nations has adopted the M'Naghten rules, and that these countries may be usefully classified as to whether they have adopted the M'Naghten rules untouched or nearly so, or whether they have made one of three possible modifications thereto.[82] The first modification involves the elimination of the rule that in order for a defense of insanity to be valid, the offender must be able to appreciate the general wrongfulness of the action, and substitutes the rule that in order for the defense to be valid, the offender must be able to appreciate the unlawfulness of the action. The second modification is actually an additional ground for exemption from punishment; i.e., where the mental state of the offender indicates that there would be little or no utility in punishing him. The third and final modification is a further addition; that is, the addition of the irresistible impulse doctrine earlier described. According to the authors, at least eight nations have adopted the M'Naghten rules in a more or less untouched fashion, while eleven countries have incorporated them into their statutes. Many eastern and central African courts have adopted the first modification, Ghana has adopted the second, and Nigeria and the Sudan have adopted the third (with South Africa and certain other southern African countries recognizing the doctrine, without formally adopting it).

Consider now the methods used by several African nations with regards to post-acquittal treatment. The Penal Code of the Congo Democratic Republic, requiring that an offender who constitutes a danger to himself or to others be ordered into detention, emphasizes the protective function of penal sanction, rather than the rehabilitative function.[83] The Ethiopian Penal Code, based upon the Swiss Penal Code, provides that if the offender is not dangerous, he may merely be instructed to undergo outpatient treatment.[84] Should confinement be required, however, the period thereof is not limited, although the case must be reviewed once every two years. Upon eventual release of the offender from the mental institution, he is then sent to a charitable institution for a minimum of one year. Tanzania, like other nations, finding itself lacking physical post-acquittal treatment facilities, has established an institution for the criminally mentally ill, but has been forced to indiscriminately house therein offenders who became mentally ill during prison, offenders who were charged with a crime but could not be tried due to their mental illness, as well as offenders tried and acquitted due to their mental illness at the time of the crime.[85] Finally, Portuguese Africa, in emphasizing the importance of rehabilitating the offender, permits its courts to impose penal sanctions based upon a consideration of the so-called "cultural pressure," to which the offender has been subjected.[86] To this end, no hard-and-fast rule exists as to exactly who should be incarcerated in a mental institution, and for how long a period.

Milner and Asuni, in evaluating the success of procedures related to the insanity defense employed throughout Africa, stress that the lack of rapid progress in developing definitions of and tests for insanity, as well as modern, result-oriented post-acquittal treatment procedures, may be related to the general lack of development of psychiatry in Africa, which in turn may result from a combination of factors, among which are the limited number of psychiatrists (some nations have none) and physical facilities, travel and language difficulties, and superstition and ignorance.[87] Perhaps an even greater block to the rapid development of meaningful law in this field is that one continent is attempting to utilize a set of laws specifically designed for another continent, having different resources and manpower, social problems, and cultural norms. Although they do not suggest a return to primitive methods of handling these problems, the authors do believe that, "A principal danger comes from mistaking the culturally defined norms of behavior in Western culture to be ideal standards."[88] They imply that the thrust of African progress in this field should be directed towards altering the adopted laws to fit the specific needs and cultural norms of Africa, not of Europe. Such progress should involve a remodeling and clarification of many of the definitions of and tests for insanity adopted from other nations, a program to educate judges with regards to forensic medicine (at least, until more psychiatrists become available) and an adjustment of the present correctional facilities to fit the needs of the local African community.

From the above description of the definitions of and tests for insanity, and the post-acquittal treatment of offenders, can any general similarities or differences be discerned among the laws of these nations? Consider first the various definitions of and tests for insanity. One of the most obvious, yet most significant, similarities among the nations considered is that they all provide for insanity at the time of the act, no matter how defined, as a ground for exemption from criminal punishment. This is no small point. Its significance lies in the fact that the law-makers of every nation believe that there is such a thing as mental illness, and that it is possible, through the formulation of definitions and tests, to establish criteria by which to discriminate between normal, punishable people and abnormal, 'immune' people; in short, that the medical model of abnormality is the model to be preferred (at least insofar as criminal law is concerned). Of course, the various nations, in their penal codes, do not talk in terms of adopting one theory to the exclusion of another; they accept the existence of mental illness as a fact. As was discussed earlier, however, mental illness is merely a hypothetical construct whose existence was postulated in accordance with a particular theory of abnormal behavior, not quite the same thing as an empirically and scientifically demonstrable phenomenon.

Another similarity among most of the nations discussed is the existence of provisions for a reduction of punishment, if the characteristics of a person which, if fully present, would justify a complete acquittal, are partially present. This practice is in complete opposition to that in the United States, where insanity at the time of the act, if proven, is a complete defense, and always exempts an offender from punishment, independent of the amount or degree of insanity.[89]

Next, the differences which do exist among the various definitions, although they may be many in terminology, are more apparent than real. Although a penal code may discuss the defense in such varied terms as 'insanity,' 'mental disease,' 'inability to reason,' or 'loss of will,' all of the terms refer to the same phenomenon; namely, the mental condition of the offender which is such so as to render him unable to manifest the required criminal intent.

Finally, although all of the definitions and tests purport to cite medical phenomena and conditions as prerequisites to the legal exemption, many nations (Japan, for example) actually include social phenomena and conditions as prerequisites thereto ('property of conduct,' for example).

Consider now the various methods of post-acquittal treatment of offenders. Independent of the exact wording of the statutes, the methods of treatment display many similarities. First, the actual goal of nearly all such methods, whether or not openly expressed, is (at least in the opinion of the author) the retraining and reeducation of the offender for society's benefit, with the eventual reinstitution of the offender in the community from which he was taken.[90]

Second, because of the belief in mental illness, and hence in the belief that medical techniques can cure it, nearly all nations provide for the commitment of an offender to a mental institution until a certain amount of time has elapsed, or until the offender has recovered from the illness (i.e., is deemed capable of resuming his place in society). At the same time, however, most of these nations provide that judges and juries of the court, not medical experts, are the final arbiters as to whether or not an individual should be committed (although they will partially rely upon the judgment of the psychiatric experts).[91] In addition, nearly every nation provides some specific method of review of a case to determine if and when the offender is ready to be released.

Finally, almost all nations have a few procedures, besides committment, with their courts may employ, should they deem the first method unsuitable; these methods include outpatient treatment and protective custody. There usually is an additional group of remedies which, although theoretically available to the courts, is rarely used (perhaps unfortunately so) when dealing with insane offenders. Included in this latter group are such special procedures as commitment to work camps and vocational therapy.

Although most of the nations examined followed the above-stated paradigm of post-acquittal treatment, there are also several important differences among their methods. First, although the actual goal of these methods is the readaptation of an individual to a norm sought by the nation, nations vary in their candor as to admitting this. Some nations, most notably the United States and those in Europe, discuss their alleged goals in terms of preventing the offender from presenting a danger to himself or others, curing the mental disease and restoring the offender's mental health, or caring for the individual. Certain Asian and Eurasian nations, on the other hand, most notably the Soviet Union, first recognize that, in reality, post-acquittal treatment of an individual is designed to render him more compatible with his social peers, more useful to society at large, and less likely to again disrupt the social order.[92] Having recognized this goal as the one actually sought (independent of any other labels given to it by the policy and law-makers) the Russian penologists give their approval to this goal, and actively seek new methods by which to further it (this approach was discussed earlier with regards to Berman's articles).[93] Far from feeling a need to justify the incarceration of an acquitted offender on grounds pertaining to his well-being, the Soviet Union recognizes and advocates justification thereof on grounds which (at least in the opinion of the author) are deemed to be the actual ones; namely, grounds pertaining to society's well-being and best interests.

There are various other differences among the nations with regards to post-acquittal treatment that are worthy of note. For example, few African nations have developed the variety or detail of procedures that the European nations have. This may be accounted for, at least partially, by the unavilability of psychiatric personnel and facilities. Next, although all nations provide methods for determining if and when an offender should be released, they vary greatly as to the procedural safeguards designed to protect the personal rights of the offender. Whereas nations such as Norway, Japan, and the Soviet Union have formulated precise and equitable methods of periodic review of an offender who has been committed to a mental institution, other nations such as the Republic of China and Portuguese Africa (as well as certain other African nations) do not have such strict protection for the incarcerated offender. Nations also differ as to the source of their safeguards. Whereas in the United States and other common law jurisdictions the offender has a constitutionally guaranteed right to review (e.g., writ of habeas corpus), other nations afford their protection in a statutory fashion. Whether or not this makes a great deal of difference in practice, however, is doubtful. A final difference among nations which affects post-acquittal treatment is the presence or absence of national [91] In many of these nations, this procedures seems to be required by the fact that there are generally more judges available for such duties than there are psychiatrists.

[92] This is not to say that European nations totally outwardly ignore the goal of rehabilitation in terms of society's demands, or that the latter mentioned nations outwardly ignore the individual's status; the difference is one more of degree and emphasis than of kind. Furthermore, it may be more precise to say that those nations which have a socialized form of government and society, independent of their geographical location, will be more likely to express candor as to the actual goal of post-acquittal procedures, since an axiom of the society will be that the resources of the people and the goals of the government will be directed towards the State rather than the individual. Viewed in this light, Sweden's candor on this subject is more understandable since, although it is a European nation, it is a socialized state.

[93] Berman, supra notes 70 & 76.

institutions which, besides performing research in the field of forensic medicine and seeking new methods of treatment, lend an air of uniformity and standardization to what otherwise might be the indiscriminate determination of suitable post-acquittal treatment, varying from court to court. Nations benefitting from the existence of such national institutions include Switzerland, Sweden, Luxembourg, and the Soviet Union.

It has been noted that all of the rules, laws, and procedures concerning insanity as a defense to crime are predicated upon the assumption that there is such a phenomenon as mental illness, or at least that there is utility in talking in such terms. It follows logically that if it is shown that there is no such phenomenon as mental illness, or at least that there is no utility in so postulating, these rules, laws, and procedures would be irrelevant, and demand rejection or substantial revision.

It was earlier pointed out that psychologists and psychiatrists who subscribe to the medical model of abnormality maintain that mental illness is an illness like any othr illness, and hence postulate the former by reasoning by analogy. Consider the validity of such reasoning, by considering the extent to which mental illness is analogous to other physical illnesses.[94] First, a physical illness is directly observable, either by means of a person's physical senses, or by means of sensitive instruments which monitor a person's physical condition. On the other hand, mental illness is not directly observable; the only phenomenon which is directly observable is a person's behavior. The existence of the illness is inferred from the existence of the so-called 'symptoms.' Second, a person's physical illness is modifiable by manipulation of his internal structure (e.g., surgery), but not by manipulation of his environment (e.g., home life). Mental illness, however, cannot be cured by manipulation of a person's internal structure since, as already seen, the behavior is the only observable, measurable, and hence treatable aspect of the 'illness.' Finally, although the characteristics of a physical illness are generally the same throughout the world, the characteristics of mental illness, and physicians' response thereto, vary from nation to nation.

From this comparison it seems clear that the analogy postulated by psychologists and psychiatrists between physical illness and mental illness, at least with respect to the variables here discussed, is not totally valid. If the analogy is not valid, it would seem reasonable to question the existence of (or the utility of the concept of) mental illness. Furthermore, the comparison seems to suggest that in dealing with abnormality, it might be more useful to deal directly with behavior as the 'abnormality' itself, rather than as the symptom of some underlying and unmeasurable illness, since it is only behavior which is capable of empirical observation and manipulation.[95]

An important question remains, however. If all of the abnormal behavior which has hitherto been deemed symptomatic of mental illness is no longer to be so treated, in what light should abnormal behavior be viewed? After all, the elimination of a postulated cause of an observable phenomenon does not eliminate the phenomenon itself. In discussing the behavioral model of abnormality, it was seen that no qualitative difference is perceived as existing between normal and abnormal behavior, since all behavior is learned. Thus, the most that could be said about abnormal behavior is that it is maladaptive, socially undesirable, unpleasant, out of place, and so forth. It is again extremely important to notice that whereas the medical model discussed such behavior in terms of sickness, which implies the existence of some absolute and objective criteria for so judging, the behavioral model discussed the same behavior in terms of desirability, which implies the presence of only relative and subjective criteria for so judging.[96] A slightly different approach is taken by Dr. Thomas Szasz, one of the most controversial writers in this field. He classifies abnormal behavior as constituting "problems in living," rather than mental illness symptoms.[97] Whatever the abnormal behavior is called, what is significant is that it is only abnormal in the sense that someone doesn't like it, not in the sense that it is symptomatic of sickness.

[94] T. Szasz, Ideology and Insanity (1970).

[95] This conclusion, of course, is based upon the assumption that the treatment of abnormality should be handled in an empirical rather than theoretical or intuitive fashion. This assumption seems well-founded, however, when it is considered that psychology and medicine are both avowedly empirical sciences.

[96] The philosphical consequences of such an approach are enormous. Such a theory denies the existence of absolutes such as right and wrong or good and evil, and postulates that all such labels are merely expressions of a person's opinion as to something, which in turn will carry much less weight in any logical argument; i.e., it is more forceful to say, "You are wrong (in an absolute sense)," than it is to say, "I dislike what you are doing."

Taking this line of reasoning one step further, if mental illness doesn't exist, for what reasons are offenders, who have been acquitted from criminal liability, committed to mental institutions for many years? According to Dr. Szasz, such people are committed because, due to their maladaptive behavior, they have so annoyed or endangered society that they must be removed therefrom until they have learned the skills deemed appropriate by the law-makers and policy-makers of the society. If and when they can demonstrate that they have acquired the appropriate skills, they are readmitted to society. What Dr. Szasz objects to is that by considering undesirable behavior to be sickness, society enslaves its members, since in order for an individual to remain 'healthy,' he must do what society demands of him. Thus a given social ideology, in the guise of mental health, can gradually eradicate individuality.[98]

In the light of the previous discussion, consider again some of the laws and procedures relating to the insanity defense. First, consider generally the definitions of and tests for insanity. As noted earlier, many nations attempt to define a legal exemption from punishment on allegedly medical grounds in terms of social standards, clearly unsound reasoning. Yet even those nations which define their tests in purportedly terms would be hard put to show that such terms as 'ability to reason' constitute objective and absolute criteria, rather than subjective and relative criteria. Such an observation strongly points out the fallacy of assuming that mental illness is an illness like any other illness.

Second, consider the directly quoted statement made by Kinberg; it suggests a dilemma in which medical model supporters often find themselves.[99] Rather than observe phenomena and collect data, and then develop a theory to account for such observations, these supporters first postulate the existence of mental illness, and then look to the environment to find support for their empirically unjustified postulate. In the event that they find no such evidence, they are required to force theoretical labels upon phenomena which (as the quotation points out) might otherwise not be so labelled. What is amazing is that these supporters will then adduce these phenomena as hard-core data to support the existence of mental illness! Consider also Sweden's goal of post-acquittal treatment.[100] How can the 'rendering harmless' of an individual be justified by any rationale other than that society considers the offender an undesirable. Surely Sweden does not have the same goal for those of its citizens who have physical illnesses but can't be cured!

Another provision to note in the light of the previous discussion is that found in the Korean Code, which recognizes the existence of self-induced mental illness.[101] Such a recognition seems to indicate an attempt to maintain, on one hand, the belief that mental illness is an illness and, on the other hand, to recognize the incompatible fact that people may rapidly change their behavior as a function or rapidly altered circumstances (the two concepts are incompatible since one of the characteristics of a physical illness is that it generally cannot be self-induced ((e.g., one cannot wish oneself into having cancer))). Such a provision displays the extent to which the classical theorists will go to make their preconceived concept of mental illness coincide with observable behavior. Does not such a paradoxical concept as 'self-induced mental illness' suggest that a more parsimonious approach to behavior would be to abandon the concept of mental illness?

Finally, the earlier-made assumption that the actual goal of all post-acquittal treatment is the retraining of the offender for the benefit of society may be deemed justified in the light of the previous discussion.[102]

From these few examples, and from additional inspection of the law in view of the earlier discussion, it can be seen that the criminal defense of insanity, based upon the medical model of abnormality, which is based in turn upon the belief in the existence of mental illness, suffers from various contradictions, faulty logic, and unnecessarily complicated and circuitous explanations. What, then, should be done with the present insanity defense? This question may be further subdivided into two additional questions: first, should there be any insanity defense, and hence compulsory post-acquittal treatment; second, if the first question is answered affirmatively, what would be the best post-acquittal procedures to use?

It is at this point that Dr. Szasz and certain behavioral psychologists, although previously united in opposition to the medical model approach, part company. Dr. Szasz believes that the insanity plea should be abolished, and along with it, all compulsory post-acquittal treatment.[103] [104] Behavioral psychologists such as Leonard Krasner, on the other hand, do not pass judgment on the first issue, but merely imply that if such post-acquittal treatment of an offender is to be done, it would be better to proceed according to the principles of behavior modification (i.e., that behavior is modifiable by altering the environmental contingencies of a given response) than according to the medical model method (i.e., that mental illness is cured by treating the underlying personality disturbances).[105] [106]

It is the opinion of the author that, at least in the immediate future, the most practical goals are: first, to openly admit the existing goals of post-acquittal treatment; second, to adopt more and more the principles of behavior modification in whatever post-acquittal treatment is deemed necessary; and third, to critically evaluate the concept of mental illness, and its ability to justify compulsory incarceration of criminal offenders whose behavior is merely disliked.[107] The long-range goal, however, should be the abolition of the insanity defense and compulsory post-acquittal treatment. By so doing there will be no artificial discrimination between mentally healthy and sick criminal offenders in terms of punishment, and, although more people will obviously be subjected to normal penal sanctions, society will be required to recognize these penal sanctions (obviously designed to rehabilitate the offender in terms of society's objectives) for what they are, and will no longer be permitted to justify the application of these sanctions on the ground of restoration of an offender's mental health. The alternative is to continue to justify the imposition of punishment upon offenders on medical grounds, to equate conformity with normality and health, and to believe the statement which George Orwell's not-too-fictional character O'Brien makes: "You must humble yourself before you can become sane."[108]

2. Commits murder for the purpose of commiting, preparing, or making easier the commission of a misdemeanor, or to help a criminal or his accessory to escape.

In other circumstances, murder shall be sentenced to life at hard labor.

16. On para-military activities, Article 126 states:

[103] T. Szasz, supra note 98.

[104] It should be realized that what Dr. Szasz dislikes about the insanity defense and post-acquittal treatment is not that it involves the imposition of value judgments upon individuals per se (all laws do that) but rather that it does so under the guise of a seemingly universally attractive goal (to cure patients of mental disease), and hence may be receiving support from society from people who otherwise might not so give.

[106] This parting of ways is more readily understandable when it is realized that the aspect of the medical model which Szasz criticizes is its desire to discriminate between normal and abnormal individuals in terms of society's treatment thereof, whereas the aspect most often criticized by other behavioral psychologists is the method of treatment which the medical model supporters use.

[107] With regards to the first goal, certain socialist nations, as seen, have made great advances. Concerning the second goal, certain steps have been taken by behavioral psychologists in setting up token economies; i.e., scientifically controlled environments in which a person is rewarded with tokens to the extent that he responds as desired-he may then use these tokens to acquire whatever he wishes. Furthermore, most nations, as earlier seen, have methods of post-acquittal treatment, other than confinement to a mental hospital, which are already available; some of these environments may be more conducive to behavior modification than are those presently being used. Interestingly enough, the orientation of Yugoslavia, with respect to its emphasis upon the environmental changing of the offender, may provide another receptive climate for such advances.

[108] G. Orwell, 1984, at 190 (1958).

Any person who, without order or authorization of the legal authorities, mobilizes, recruits, employs, or gives orders for mobilization, recruitment or employment of troops, or supplies such troops with weapons or ammunition, shall be sentenced to death.

17. The Criminal Code deals with abortions as follows:

Article 346.—Anyone who by any means whatsoever commits or attempts to commit an abortion upon a woman actually or supposedly pregnant, even though such woman has agreed, shall be sentenced to from one to five years and fined from 5,000$ to 50,000$.

If the criminal is regularly engaged in the abortion practice, the penalty shall be the maximum of imprisonment and the fine shall be from 10,000$ to 200,000$.

If the victim becomes permanently disabled, the criminal shall be sentenced to confinement.

If the victim dies, the sentence shall be to limited hard labor.

Article 347.—Medical doctors, military medical officers, midwives, dentists, pharmacists, medical students, pharmacy students, druggists, medical equipment dealers, surgical equipment dealers, who advise or give assistance in an abortion shall be sentenced as provided in Paragraph 1 or Article 346. Further, they can be temporarily or permanently banned from practicing their profession in accordance with Article 61.

With regard to gambling, there are a number of provisions prohibiting cockfighting, unauthorized lotteries, or participation in a gambling den (Articles 458, 459, 460, and 461). Penalties range from eleven days to two years imprisonment.

Under the Criminal Code, prostitution is not an offense. However, facilitation and promotion of prostitution are punishable under Articles 357 through 364, which describe the specific acts which will constitute such facilitation and promotion.

18. The distribution of weapons in a conspiracy aimed at causing civil war is an offense (Article 123). Articles 318 and 319 forbid the unauthorized fabrication, sale, distribution, and carrying of any kind of rifle or shotgun, also of gunpowder, ammunition, and explosives. Also, Article 129 states:

Any person who uses explosives to turn or destroy any public building, storage area, shipyard, craft, or any properties of national ownership shall be sentenced to death.

19. The Vietnamese Criminal Code provides the death penalty for a number of offenses. The group of crimes termed treason and described in Articles 108, 109, and 110 are all punishable with death, also conspiracy aimed at causing civil war (Article 123), illegal military actions (Article 127), using explosives to destroy public buildings, etc. (Article 129 above), heading an armed group for the purpose of taking possession of military posts, etc. (Article 130), taking part in or organizing an uprising (Articles 130, 131), embezzlement by a public servant of more than two million piasters (Article 136), accepting bribes, and if a public servant, of more than 2,000,000$ (Article 145), premeditated murder, parricide, infanticide, and poisoning (Article 327), felony-murder (Article 329, and intentionally setting fire to a house, ship, vehicles, etc. (Articles 465).

There is no provision for a separate proceeding to determine sentence in capital cases.

20. Presumed cumulation of offenses, wherein the offender commits several crimes by the commission of one act which violates several provisions of the Criminal Code, is dealt with as below:

Article 107.—In case of a presumed cumulation of offenses, the offender shall only be prosecuted once, for the most serious offense, and shall be punished as provided for that offense.

A presumed cumulation of offenses is where the offender, by the commission of one act, violates several provisions of the Criminal Code and thus commits several crimes simultaneously.

No other provision is made on the subject of multiple prosecutions.

APPENDIX

Extraterritorial Applicability of the Criminal Codes in Various European Countries

Prepared by Members of the Staff of the Law Library, Library of Congress, February 1972

Albania

The limits of Albanian penal law in space are contained in the Criminal Code (Arts. 58-63). According to these provisions, it may be assumed that the general principle controlling Albanian penal law is the territorial principle. However, for Albanian citizens who commit a crime abroad, Albanian law shall apply unless the perpetrators have already been penalized for the commission of such crimes outside of the State. In these cases, the punishment provided for under the Albanian law could be reduced or dispensed with altogether.

There are no commentaries on the general principles of the current Albanian Penal Code. A translation of Articles 58-63 of the Albanian Penal Code follows:*

Art. 58. Criminal responsibility of the citizens of the People's Republic of Albania. Citizens of the People's Republic of Albania shall be held criminally responsible and punished in accordance with the penal law of the People's Republic of Albania, for crimes committed whether within or outside the territory of the People's Republic of Albania.

Citizens of the People's Republic of Albania who have been penalized outside of the State for crimes committed there [abroad], such crimes being also punishable under Albania law, may be exempted in Albania from any criminal responsibility, or the penalty to be inflicted upon them may be mitigated accordingly.

Art. 59. Criminal responsibility of foreigners. Foreigners who commit crimes in Albania shall be subject to the criminal laws of the People's Republic of Albania.

Art. 60. Extraterritoriality. Matters concerning the criminal responsibility of foreign citizens enjoying extraterritoriality rights must be resolved in any case through diplomatic channels.

Art. 61. Criminal responsibility of stateless persons. Stateless persons residing within the territory of the People's Republic of Albania shall be punished in accordance with the penal laws of the People's Republic of Albania, for crimes they commit within the territory of the People's Republic of Albania.

Art. 62. [irrelevant]

Art. 63. Special provisions. The general provisions of this Code shall be also enforced for crimes provided for in special penal legislation.

Austria

The Criminal Code of 1852, as amended, is still in force in Austria.[1] The principle of extraterritorial applicability has been adopted and provided for in Section 36 which covers felonies committed by Austrian citizens abroad, while Section 38, which covers crimes committed by foreign citizens abroad, affects only the crimes enumerated therein. However, insofar as other crimes are concerned, the Austrian Criminal Code is applied only if foreign governments fail to request extradition as defined in Sections 39 and 40.

Kodi Penal i R.P. të Shqipërisë* (Penal Code of the People's Republic of Albania). Tirana, 1952.

[1] Österreichisches Strafgesetz. Wien, Österreichische Strattsdruckerei, 1945:

The above-mentioned sections of the Criminal Code read as follows:[2]

Section 36. An Austrian citizen, if found in this country, is not to be extradited to a foreign country for felonies committed abroad, but he is to be dealt with according to this Penal Act without regard to the law of the country where the felony was committed.

If he has already been punished abroad for this deed, then the punishment already suffered is to be taken into account in determining the penalty due under this Penal Act.

In no case are sentences of foreign criminal authorities to be executed in this country.

Section 38. If a foreigner abroad committed the felony of high treason against the Republic of Austria (Section 58), of espionage or other collusion with the enemy (Section 67), of unauthorized recruiting (Section 92), of falsifying Austrian public instruments of credit or coins (Section 106 to 121), or of inducing or aiding the violation of military duties (Section 222), then he is to be dealt with like a national in accordance with this Act.

There is a very extensive commentary on the subject authored by Dr. Gustav Kania, with the complete citation of high court decisions and international agreements.[3]

Belgium

Translation from the French of pertinent provisions*

The Criminal Code (1964)

Art. 4. An offense committed outside of the Kingdom's territory by Belgian citizens or by foreigners shall not be punishable in Belgium, except in the cases determined by the law.

See: Law of April 17, 1878 (Criminal Procedure) Chapter II, Articles 6 to 14.

The Code of Criminal Procedure (1967)

Chapter II. Public Prosecution for Crimes or Misdemeanors Committed Outside the Kingdom's Territory

Art. 6. Any Belgium citizen who commits, outside the Kingdom's territory, one of the following offenses, may be prosecuted in Belgium:

1. [Law of August 4, 1914, Art. 3] A major or minor crime against the security of the State;

2. [Law of July 12, 1932, Art 2a] A major or minor crime against the public faith as stated in the Criminal Code, Book II, Chapters 1, 2, and 3 of Title 3, or a minor crime specied in Articles 497 and 497*bis*, if the major or minor crime has, for its object, either the currency with legal tender in Belgium or things destined for their fabrication, forgery, debasement or falsification, or the bills of exchange, papers, seals, stamps, marks or hallmarks of the State of the Belgian administration or public establishments;

3. [Id.] A major or minor crime against the public faith as stated in the same provision, if the major or minor crime has, for its object either currency without legal tender in Belgium or things destined for their fabrication, forgery, debasement or falsification, or bills of exchange, papers, seals stamps, marks or hallmarks of a foreign state.

Prosecution in the last case may not be instituted, except on official advice given to the Belgian authority by the foreign authority.

Art 7. [Law of March 16, 1964, Art. 1] Par. 1. Any Belgian citizen who, outside of the Kingdom's territory, is guilty of an act qualified as a crime under Belgian law, may be prosecuted in Belgium if the act is punishable by the legislation of the country where it has been committed.

Par. 2. If the offense was committed against a foreigner, prosecution may not be instituted except upon motion of the Public Prosecutor to the court and must, among other things, be preceded by a complaint from the injured foreigner or his family or an official notication given to the Belgian authority by the authority of the country where the offense was committed.

If the offense is committed in time of war against a national of a country which is an ally of Belgium in the sense of Article 117, paragraph 12 of the Criminal Code, the official notification may be given under the authority of the country of which this foreigner is or has been a national.

Art. 8. [Abrogated by the Law of March 16, 1964, Art. 2]

Art. 9. Any Belgian citizen who is found guilty of an offense in forestry or field matters, fishing or hunting on the territory of a neighboring state, may, if this state agrees on such reciprocity, be prosecuted in Belgium, based on the complaint of the damaged party or based on official notification given to the Belgian authority by the authority of the country in which the offense was committed.

Art 10. A foreigner may be prosecuted in Belgium when he commits the following outside of the Kingdom's territory:

1. [Law of July 19, 1934, Art. 4] A major or minor crime against the State's security;

2. [Law of July 12, 1932, Art. 2b] A major or minor crime specified in Article 6, number 2;

3. A major or minor crime specified in Article 6, number 3.

Prosecution in the last case may not be instituted except upon official notification as given to the Belgian authority by the foreign authority;

4. [Law of April 2, 1948, Art. 1] In time of war, the offense of homicide or of voluntary bodily injuries, rape, indecent exposure, or denunciation to the enemy, against a national of Belgium, a foreign resident of Belgium at the time of the initiation of hostilities or against a national of a country allied to Belgium in the sense of paragraph 2 of Article 117 of the Criminal Code.

Art. 10bis. [Law of July 14, 1951, Art. 1] Any person subject to [Belgian] military laws who commits any offense on the territory of a foreign state, may be prosecuted in Belgium.

The same laws apply to persons who are attached, in any official capacity, to the armed forces on foreign territory or those authorized to follow an army corps of which they are a part.

Art 11. A foreigner who is a principal or an accessory to a crime committed outside of the Kingdom's territory, by a Belgian citizen, may be prosecuted in Belgium, together with the accused Belgian citizen, or after the conviction of the Belgian citizen.

Art. 12. [Law of July 14, 1951, Art. 2] Prosecution for the offenses mentioned in the present Chapter shall be instituted only when the accused is found in Belgium, except in the cases stated in Article 6, numbers 1 and 2, and in Article 10*bis*.

[Law of April 30, 1947, Art. 2] However, when the offense was committed in time of war, the prosecution may be instituted, if the accused is a Belgian citizen in all cases, even if he is not present in Belgium, and, if the accused is a foreigner, [he may be prosecuted] in addition in the cases stated in paragraph 1, if he is found in an enemy country or if his extradition can be obtained.

Art. 13. [Decree-Law of August 5, 1943, Art. 4] The preceding provisions shall not apply when the accused, who has been tried in a foreign country for the same offense, has been acquitted or when, after the conviction, the penalty was executed, prescribed, or when he was pardoned, except for the major or minor crimes committed in time of war.

Any detention imposed abroad [on the accused] as a consequence of the offense for which he has been convicted in Belgium, shall always be taken into account in the duration of the penalty of imprisonment.

Art. 14. In all cases stated in the present Chapter, the accused shall be prosecuted and tried in accordance with Belgian laws.

Bulgaria

The Communist Government established in Bulgaria after September 9, 1944 introduced a new Criminal Code of February 13, 1951, drafted along the line of Soviet doctrines in this field. This Code was entirely replaced by another on April 2, 1968,[1] which also incorporated various criminal provisions scattered throughout a number of legislative acts.

---

[1] Dŭrzharen Vestnik (Official Law Gazette of Bulgaria), No. 26, Apr. 2, 1968; correction: id., No. 29, Apr. 12, 1968.

The questions of the applicability of the Code regarding crimes committed within and without the territory of the People's Republic of Bulgaria are dealt with in accordance with the traditional principles and Communist teachings related to this area.

The territoriality principle is reflected in Section 3 (1) of the Code which prescribes that it applies to all criminal offenses committed within the territorial limits of the country by any person regardless of his citizenship.

Based on the personality principle, the Bulgarian Criminal Code also applies to Bulgarian citizens for their crimes committed abroad, as explicitly stated in Section 4 (1) ; however, a Bulgarian citizen may not be extradited to a foreign state for criminal prosecution or serving of a sentence (Sec. 4 (2).

The spokesman of the present government of Bulgaria in the field of criminal law science, Professor Ivan Nenov, explains this provision on the basis of the Communist doctrine that "Bulgarian citizens must, in their behavior, always and everywhere comply with the socialist requirements—with the rules of Communist morals and socialist law." [2] In further clarification he states that the nature of the crime and the type of penalty as well as the question whether the crime affects the interests of the Bulgarian state and its citizens or that of a foreign state and its nationals, are irrelevant. Moreover, it is not important, he states, whether the act constitutes a crime under the law of the place where it occurred.[3]

Based on the protective principle, the Bulgarian Criminal Code is also applicable to foreign nationals for their criminal acts committed outside the jurisdictional territory of Bulgaria, but only if these offenses are of a general nature and affect the interests of the Bulgarian state or its citizens (Sec. 5). The above-mentioned criminal law expert, Ivan Nenov, questions the possibility for the application of this provision in regard to foreign nationals who committed a crime abroad. "This principle," he emphasizes, "has a practical significance when the criminal perpetrator, a foreign national, is found within the territorial jurisdiction of the domestic law of Bulgaria against whom, in case of a sentence in absentia, the execution of the penalty could be directed." [4]

However, in the cases specified in Sections 4 and 5 the preliminary detention and the penalty served abroad are to be deducted from the Bulgarian one. If the penalties in both countries are of a different nature, the penalty served abroad is to be taken into consideration by the Bulgarian court when determining its penalty (Sec. 7).

Based on the universality principle, the Bulgarian Criminal Code is also applicable extraterritorially to foreign nationals for their crimes committed abroad if these acts are directed against the peace and mankind and affect the interests of another state or foreign nationals (Sec. 6 (1)).

Finally, Section 6 (2) of the Code contains a provision which opens the possibility for an application of the Bulgarian Criminal Code to foreign nationals committing other crimes abroad, namely, if such jurisdiction is provided by an international treaty to which Bulgaria is a party.

The problems of the territorial and extraterritorial application of the Bulgarian Criminal Code may be summed up as follows:

(1) This Code is applicable to Bulgarian citizens for their crimes regardless of the place of commission, e.g., in the country or abroad.

(2) It is applicable to foreign citizens (a) for their crimes committed in Bulgaria; (b) for all crimes committed abroad if interests of the Bulgarian state or Bulgarian citizens are affected; (c) for crimes committed abroad if these acts are directed against the peace and mankind; and (d) for other crimes committed abroad if an international treaty, to which Bulgaria is a party, so prescribes.

GENERAL PART—CHAPTER ONE

Purpose and Scope of Application of the Criminal Code

Subchapter One. Purpose of the Criminal Code

Subchapter Two. Scope of Application of the Criminal Code

Sec. 3. (1). The Criminal Code shall apply with respect to all crimes committed within the territory of the People's Republic of Bulgaria.

(2). The question of responsibility of foreigners who enjoy immunity in regard to the criminal jurisdiction of the People's Republic of Bulgaria, shall be decided in accordance with the rules of the international law accepted by it [Bulgaria].

Sec. 4. (1). The Criminal Code shall apply to Bulgarian citizens also for their crimes committed abroad.

(2). A Bulgarian citizen shall not be extradited to a foreign state for adjudication or serving the penalty.

Sec. 5. The Criminal Code shall apply also to foreigners who committed crimes of general character abroad which affect the interests of the People's Republic of Bulgaria or of a Bulgarian citizen.

Sec. 6. (1). The Criminal Code shall apply also with regard to foreigners for committing abroad a crime against the peace and mankind, which affect the interests of another state or a foreign citizen.

(2). The Criminal Code shall apply also to other crimes committed by foreigners abroad when this is provided by an international treaty, to which the People's Republic of Bulgaria is a party.

Sec. 7. In the cases of Sections 4 and 5 the preliminary detention and the penalty served abroad shall be reduced (prispadat). When both penalties are of different kind, the penalty served abroad shall be taken into consideration for the determination of the penalty by the [Bulgarian] court.

Sec. 8. The sentence of a foreign court for a crime, to which the Bulgarian Criminal Code applies, shall be taken into consideration in the cases established by an international treaty, to which the People's Republic of Bulgaria is a party.

France

French criminal jurisdiction is based on the principle of territoriality as defined in Article 3, paragraph 1 of the French Civil Code:

"The laws of police and public security shall be binding upon all those who live on the territory."

According to Article 72 of the French Constitution, the territory of the French Republic consists of the metropolitan territory and the overseas departments and territories. For the application of the penal laws, the territorial sea, French ships and airplanes are considered a part of French territory.

If the offense is committed on French territory, or when one of the constituent elements of its has been accomplished on French territory, the offense in all its aspects is French.

The territorial principle is not absolute. Title X of the French Code of Criminal Procedure covers offenses committed abroad by both French citizens and foreigners.[1]

The French Code makes a distinction between major crimes (crimes), minor crimes (délits), and contraventions (contraventions).

---

[1] See attached Appendix.

I. Offenses Committed by French Citizens Abroad

A French citizen who commits abroad an act qualified as a major crime may be prosecuted and tried by French courts (Art. 689), provided that he is a French citizen at the time of the prosecution (it is of no importance what nationality he had at the time when he committed the major crime), that he was not tried abroad, and in case of conviction and sentencing did not serve the sentence or obtain clemency, or that the penalty has not been extinguished by the statute of limitations (Art. 692).

However, if the act committed abroad by a French citizen is qualified by French law as a minor crime then the prerequisites for the French courts to assume jurisdiction are stricter.

At first, the minor crime must be punishable not only under French law, but also under the law of the country where it was committed (Art. 689, par. 2). French court practice concerning this requirement was summarized in the French legal encyclopedia as follows:[2]

Under penalty of cassation, the trial judge must ascertain in his sentence that all elements of foreign law necessary for the accusation are established again (Crim. Jul. 8, 1927. S. 1929. 1, 360).

However it is of no matter that the foreign qualification of the crime is different from the French qualification; it does not much matter that the penalty is not the same as that prescribed in France (see, for instance, Trib. corr. Colmar, May 11, 1950, Gaz. Pal. 1950, ibid. 1950.2.189, Rev. science crim. 1950.592 Caron. L. Hugeney).

The Court of Cassation does not review the interpretation of foreign law given by the trial judge (Carrive, Rev. science crim. 1937, 309). This judge is not duty bound to quote the text of the foreign law, and the Supreme Court refers to his statements (Crim. Dec. 17, 1887, D. 88.1.330).

It must be taken into consideration that the act must be punishable by the law of the country where it was committed not only at the time when it occurred but also at the time when the complaint was lodged (Aix, Sep. 30, 1959, Gaz. Pal. 1959.2.291); that there is no incrimination according to the foreign law when the act, also incriminating according to this [French] law, is covered by the law of amnesty of the foreign country (Crim. Dec. 31, 1936, Gaz. Pal. 1937.1420; Trib. corr. Toulon, May 17, 1963. Gaz. Pal. 1963.2.387) . . . that, in general, the statute of limitations of public action against offenses committed abroad is regulated by French law (Trib. corr. Montbeliard, Jul 3, 1964. D. 1965,69. Public Prosecutor Petit's charge).

Thus, in case of a minor crime, it is necessary to refer to the foreign law unless it concerns offenses against the security of the State or counterfeiting its seal or current national monies. These minor crimes, even if committed outside of the territory of the Republic, are punishable as minor crimes committed on French territory.

If the minor crime was committed against a private person, the complaint of such person, or the official denunciation by the authority of the country where the crime was committed, must precede the prosecution undertaken by the public prosecutor.

Certain minor crimes and contraventions committed in neighboring States, as defined in Article 695 of the Criminal Code, are subject to the rule of reciprocity.

II. Offenses Committed Abroad by Foreigners

As a general rule, and subject to the provisions of Articles 690 and 693, offenses committed by foreigners in a foreign country are not punishable in France. An exception is made for the major and minor crimes specified in Article 694, which appears in the Appendix.

According to Professors G. Stefani and G. Levasseur,[3] the exceptions specified in Article 121-6 of the Code of Civil Aviation of March 30, 1967, which in part reads as follows: must be added to the exceptions specified in Article 619:[4]

The legal relations between persons who are on board a foreign airplane engaged in traffic shall be regulated by the law of the flag of that airplane in all cases where the territorial law is normally applied.

However, in case a major crime or minor crime is committed on board the foreign airplane, the French courts shall be competent provided that the perpetrator or the victim is a French national or the airplane landed in France after the major or minor crime was committed.

TITLE X

Major and Minor Crimes Committed Abroad

Article 689

Any French citizen who outside the territory of the Republic renders himself guilty of an act qualified as a major crime punished by French law may be prosecuted and tried by French courts.

Any French citizen who outside the territory of the Republic renders himself guilty of an act qualified as a minor crime by French law may be prosecuted and tried by French courts if the act is punished by the legislation of the country where it was committed. With reference to minor crimes against the security of the State or counterfeiting the seal of the State or of curren national monies, a minor crime committed outside the territory of the Republic shall be punishable as a minor crime committed within the territory.

The provisions of paragraphs 1 and 2 are applicable to the perpetrator of an act who has become a French citizen only after the act that is imputed to him.

Article 690

Whoever on the territory of the Republic becomes an accomplice to a major crime or a minor crime committed abroad may be prosecuted and tried by the French courts if the act is punished by both the foreign law and by the French law, on condition that the act qualified as a major or minor crime was established by a final decision of the foreign jurisdiction.

Article 691

In case of a major crime committed against an individual the prosecution may be undertaken only at the request of public prosecution: it must be begun by a complaint by the offended party or by an official denunciation to French authorities by the authorities of the country where the act was committed.

Article 692

In the case envisaged in the preceding articles, when a major or minor crime is concerned no prosecution shall take place if the accused proves that he was definitely tried abroad and, in case of conviction, that the punishment has been served or has been extinguished by the statute of limitations or that he has obtained clemency.

Article 693

Every offense of which an act constituting one of the constituent elements has been accomplished in France is deemed to be committed within the territory of the Republic.

Article 694

Every foreigner who outside the territory of the Republic renders himself guilty, either as perpetrator or as accomplice, of a major or minor crime against the security of the State or the counterfeiting of the seal of the State or current national monies may be prosecuted and tried according to the provisions of French law if he is arrested in France or if the Government obtains his extradition.

Article 695

Every Frenchman who renders himself guilty of minor crimes and contraventions in forest, rural, fishing, customs, or indirect tax matters on the territory of an adjacent state may be prosecuted and tried in France according to French law if that state authorizes the prosecution of its nationals for the same acts committed in France.

The reciprocity shall be legally established by international conventions or by degree.

Article 696

In the cases provided in the present title the prosecution shall be undertaken at the request of public prosecution of the place where the accused resides or of his last known residence or of the place where he is found.

The Court of Cassation may, on the request of public prosecution or of the parties, transfer the case to a court closer to the place of the major or minor crime.

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

The provisions on the extraterritorial reach, application or jurisdiction of German criminal law are contained in Sections 3 through 10 of the German Penal Code in the version of the Second Criminal Law Reform Law of July 4, 1969, to become effective October 1, 1973.[1]

By providing in Section 3 of the Code that German criminal law shall be applicable to acts committed within the country ,the Federal Republic of Germany has rejoined the majority of States where the territoriality principle plays the primordial role, while the other "principles" of international criminal law constitute its exceptions in explicity formulated narrow fields. At the same time this approach constitutes a return to the original provision of Section 3 in the Code of the German Empire of 1871 which reads: "The Criminal Code of the German Empire is applicable to all offenses committed within the Empire, even if the offender be a foreigner."[2]

The present version of Section 3 is based on the personality principle under which a State applies its criminal law to all offenses perpetrated by its subjects irrespective of the place of perpetration.[3] It also contains the principle of double criminality (Sec. 3 (2)) and provides criteria for the determination of the place where the act entailing the punishment occurred (Sec. 3 (3)). In the 1973 Code, these two matters are dealt within Sections 7 and 9, respectively.

In the opinion of one of the leading German law scholars "the [German] legislator has departed from the personality principle as the basis of the rule

[2] English translation taken from Imperial German Criminal Code Translated into English by Captain R. H. Gage . . . and A. J. Waters . . . Johannesburg, W. E. Horton & Co., Limited, 1917. p. 1. Section 3 has been changed several times. The most sweeping change occurred when the Nazi legislators, by amending Sections 3-5, extended the application of German criminal law by making a larger group of crimes committed abroad by German nationals and foreigners punishable under German law than was provided for previously. As amended May 6 ,1940 (Reichsgesetzblatt 1940, I, 754) Section 3 reads: The German Criminal Law shall apply to any act committed and not punishable under the law of the place of commission if such act does not appear to be a wrong deserving punishment when judged according to the sound sentiment of the German people, in view of the particular circumstances of the place where it is committed.

The act is considered to have been committed at the place where the offender acted and, in case of an omission, where he should have acted, or where the criminal effect of the offense took place or should have taken place. (English translation takn from The Statutory Criminal Law of Germany with Comments. Prepared by Vladimir Gsovski, Chief of the Foreign Law Section. Edited by Eldon R. James. Washington, The Library of Congress, 1947. p. 7-8.

[3] Section 3, in the German Penal Code version of Sept. 1, 1969 (BGB1, 1969, I: 1445) reads as follows:

(1) German criminal law shall apply to the act of a German citizen no matter whether he commits it within the country or abroad.

(2) German criminal law shall not be applicable to an act committed but not punishable abroad, if this act does not constitute a misdeed meriting punishment by reason of special circumstances [prevailing] at the place where the act is committed.

(3) An act is [considered to be] committed at every place where the perpetrator has acted, or in the case of omission, where he should have acted, or where the result became, or should have become, effective.

on the applicability of punishment in order that Germans should not be punished for such acts committed abroad which, at the place of the act, do not entail punishment, or are permitted, or, possibly are even called for."[4]

As it has been pointed out by the same authority, there is, however, no reason to exclude the application of German criminal law in cases where the act committed abroad is also a punishable offense under the law of the place of commission, or if the place of commission was not subject to any criminal jurisdiction (i.e., where there was no sovereignty exacting retribution).[5] Therefore, pursuant to Section 7, paragraph 2, No. 1 of the 1973 Penal Code, in these cases the personality principle of international criminal law applies: whoever at the time of commission of the offense was a German or became a German after the perpetration shall be subject to, and may be prosecuted under, German criminal law.[6] Moreover, some criminal offenses are considered by the framers of the new Code to be so serious that they are subject to German criminal law regardless of the law prevailing at the place of their commission. Thus, by virtue of Section 5, Number 6, German criminal law shall also apply to an abortion perpetrated abroad, provided the offender at the time of the act is a German and derives his livelihood from the Federal Republic, including Western Berlin. Furthermore, German criminal law shall apply to all criminal offenses, irrespective of the law of the place of commission, if the perpetrator is a German holding a German public office, or a soldier of the German Armed Forces and commits the criminal offense within the scope or during the exercise of his official capacity (Sec. 5, No. 8).

With respect to several other criminal offenses, German legislative jurisdiction has been extended by preserving the personality principle as a jurisdictional basis, although this has been done so that even acts committed abroad and directed against persons or property protected by domestic (German) law entail punishment under German criminal law (the so-called protective principle, "Schutz" or "Real-Prinzip"). In the words of Professor Maurach;[7]

". . . The idea seems to be decisive here, the one that the act of a German against certain persons or property protected by domestic [German] law, which enjoy the protection of German criminal law, wherever the offense is committed, should not remain unpunished merely because of the fact that it has been perpetrated by taking advantage of the special circumstances prevailing at the place of commission. Cases of this kind are covered by Section 5, Number 2 (endangering the external security of the democratic constitutional State in the cases of Sections 89, 90b, 90a, paragraph 1; acts against national defense in the cases of Sections 109a-109d and 109h) and Section 5, No. 5 (lewd acts in the cases of Section 174, No. 1, Section 175, paragraph 1, No. 1, and of Section 176, paragraph 1, No. 3). Here the application of German criminal law is made dependent on the perpetrator's (and in the case of Section 5, No. 5 also his victim's) being a German and his deriving his livelihood from the area of effectiveness of [the law of] the Federal Republic, including Western Berlin."

[6] The concept of "German" (Deutscher) is defined in Article 116 of the Basic Law (Constitution) of the Federal Republic of Germany of May 23, 1949, which reads as follows:

Art. 116. (1) Unless otherwise provided by law, a German within the meaning of this Basic Law is a person who possesses German citizenship or who has been admitted to the territory of the German Reich within the frontiers of Dec. 31, 1937, as a refugee or expellee of German stock (Volkszugehoerigkeit) or as the spouse or descendant of such person.

(2) Former German citizens who, between Jan. 30, 1933, and May 8, 1945, were deprived of their citizenship on political, racial, or religious grounds and their descendants, shall be regranted German citizenship on application. They shall be considered as not having been deprived of their German citizenship if they have established their domicile (Wohnsitz) in German after May 8, 1945, and have not expressed a contrary intention. [7] Maurach, supra note 4, at 124-125.

The safeguarding of persons or property protected by domestic (German) law against violations may be determined by the nature of the domestic person or property under attack as well as the criminal law protection accorded to foreigners and property protected at the foreign place of commission. Proceedings from this classification, Professor Maurach states: [8]

"(a) Without regard to the law of the place of commission, criminal acts perpetrated by [Germany's] own subjects foreigners and directed against persons and property protected by domestic [German] law are subject to German criminal law only in circumscribed, exhaustively enumerated cases.

"In this category belong, under Section 5, No. 1, treasonable acts endangering the peace (Section 80), acts of high treason and treason (Sections 81–83; Sections 94 ff . . .), furthermore endangering the democratic constitutional State in the cases of Sections 90, 90a, paragraph 2, as well as criminal acts against the national defense in the cases of Sections 109, 109e, 109f, and 109g; under Section 5, No. 3, acts of abduction (Section 234a) and of [casting] political suspicion (Section 241a) to the detriment of a German; under Section 5, No. 4, divulging business secrets of German enterprises; under Section 5, No. 7, the offenses connected with testimony (Sections 153, 154, 156) in a proceeding pending before courts located in the Federal Republic, including West Berlin . . .; under Section 5, No. 9, criminal acts perpetrated by a foreigner who is a holder of a German public office (a rare case in practice, e.g., passive bribing of a German honorary consul of foreign nationality) and, finally, under Section 5, No. 10, criminal acts which are directed against the holder of a German public office or against a soldier, to wit, in direct connection with such persons' capacity (e.g., unlawful compulsion against a German diplomat abroad under Section 240; insulting a German customs officer officiating in Basel as a "German customs bandit").

"(b) All other acts perpetrated abroad against a German (independently of his domicile in the Federal Republic) are, according to the protective principle, . . . subject to German law alone, if they are also punishable according to the law of the place of commission or if the place of commission is not subject to any criminal jurisdiction."

The German legislative jurisdiction under the universality principle is spelled out in Section 6 of the 1973 Penal Code bearing the title "Acts committed abroad against persons and property which are internationally protected." Here again German criminal law applies regardless of the law of the place of commission. The offenses belonging to this group include genocide, major crimes committed with explosives, slave traffic in children and women, unlawful narcotics traffic, traffic in obscene publications, and major and minor crimes of counterfeiting, as well as any act which the Federal Republic of Germany has undertaken to prosecute even when it is committed abroad.

The special provision of Section 9 provides the criteria to determine the place of the act constituting a criminal offense and, in particular, covers the problem with respect to accessories.

3. Acts of abduction (See. 234a) and of [casting] political suspicion [upon another] (Sec. 241a), if the act is directed against a German who has his domicile or usual place of abode in the country;

4. Divulging industrial or commercial secrets of an enterprise located within the territory on which this Law is in effect; of a business enterprise which has its seat there; or of a business enterprise with its seat abroad, which is dependent upon a business enterprise with a seat within the territory on which this Law is in effect and which forms a concern with the latter;

5. Lewd acts in the cases of Section 174, No. 1, of Section 175, paragraph 1, No. 1, and of Section 176, paragraph 1, No. 3 if the perpetrator, and the person against whom the act is perpetrated, at the time [of commission] of the act, are Germans and derive their livelihood from within the territory on which this Law is in effect;

6. Abortion, if the perpetrator at the time [of commission] of the act is a German and derives his livelihood from within the territory on which this Law is in effect;

7. Perjury, false unsworn testimony and intentional false affirmation in lieu of an oath in any proceeding, within the territory on which this Law is in effect, pending before a court or any other agency of the German Federal Republic which is competent to administer oaths or affirmations in lieu of an oath;

8. Acts which the German holder of a German public office, or a soldier of the German Armed Forces, commits while abroad in an official capacity or with respect to such official capacity;

9. Acts committed by a foreigner while holding German public office;

10. Acts committed by anyone against the holder of a German public office, or a soldier of the German Armed Forces, while in the performance of his official functions or with respect to his official functions.

Sec. 6. Acts Committed Abroad against Persons and Property which are Internationally Protected. German criminal law shall continue to apply, regardless of the law of the place of commission, to the following acts which have been perpetrated abroad:

1. Genocide;
2. Major crimes committed with explosives;
3. [Slave] traffic in children and women;
4. Unlawful narcotics traffic;
5. Traffic in obscene publications;
6. Major and minor crimes of counterfeiting;
7. Acts which the Federal Republic of Germany, in a binding international agreement, has undertaken to prosecute even when they are committed abroad.

Sec. 7. Applicability to Acts Committed Abroad in Other Cases:

(1) The German criminal law shall apply to acts which are committed abroad against a German if the act is punishable at the place of commission abroad, or if the place of commission is not subject to any criminal jurisdiction.

(2) The German criminal law shall be applicable to other acts which are committed abroad if the act is a criminal offense where committed or if the place of commission is not subject to any criminal jurisdiction and where the perpetrator

1. at the time of the commission of the act was a German, or became one after the act, or

2. at the time of the commission of the act was a foreigner, is found within this country and is not extradited, although by the nature of the act the [German] Extradition Act would permit his extradition, because an extradition request was either not made or rejected, or the extradition cannot be carried out.

Sec. 8. Time of the Act. An act shall be[deemed to have been] committed at the time when the perpetrator or accessory has acted, or, in case of omission, should have acted. When the result occurs shall not be decisive.

Sec. 9. Place of the Act:

(1) An act shall be [deemed to have been] committed at every place where the perpetrator has acted, or in the case of an omission, where he should have acted, where the result implicit in the actual element of the crime occurs or [at the place] where the perpetrator imagined that it should occur.

(2) Complicity is committed at the place of commission of the [principal] act as well as at every place where the accessory has acted, or in the case of omission, should have acted, or where he imagined that it should occur. Where the accessory acted within the country by participating in an act committed abroad, German criminal law shall apply to the complicity even though the act is not punishable under the law of the place commission.

German Democratic Republic

The Criminal Code of the German Democratic Republic of January 12, 1968,[1] provides for the international effects of the criminal laws in Section 80, which reads:

TERRITORIAL AND PERSONAL APPLICABILITY

(1) The criminal laws of the German Democratic Republic shall apply to all criminal acts which are committed within its territory, or the results of which occurred or should occur in this territory.

(2) A citizen of the German Democratic Republic may also be called to account in accordance with its criminal laws if he commits an act outside the territory of the German Democratic Republic which is punishable under its laws. This shall also apply to stateless persons who have their permanent residence in the German Democratic Republic. In such cases, the punishment served outside the German Democratic Republic for the same act shall be calculated [in the punishment].

(3) Citizens of other states and other persons may also be called to account in accordance with the criminal laws of the German Democratic Republic for criminal acts committed outside the territory of the German Democratic Republic if:

1. they committed a crime against the sovereignty of the German Democratic Republic, against the peace, against humanity, or human rights;
2. their punishment is provided for by a special international agreement;
3. they committed a crime against the German Democratic Republic;
4. they are present within the territory of the German Democratic Republic, extradition is not to be expected, and the act is punishable at the place of commitment, or in the home state or reign of the perpetrator. The punishment meted out may not be severer than at this place.

Such criminal acts may only be prosecuted with the concurrence or upon the order of the Chief Procurator of the German Democratic Republic

No commentary on the Criminal Code of the German Democratic Republic could be found in the collections of the Law Library.

Greece

I. General Remarks

A State may claim jurisdiction over an offense on the ground that a crime affects the national interests, although it has been committed abroad. In regulating this matter, some principles have been developed which have been followed by most of the European countries. These principles (universality, territoriality, personality and the protective principle) are often referred to as "principles of international law" and the group of criminal laws which governs these cases as "international criminal law." These terms are misused because each State, when enacting such laws, does not act to regulate its relations with other States, but acts as a sovereign (imperium) in stipulating under which circumstances its criminal law should apply to offenses which have been committed abroad but nevertheless affect its legal order.

According to the principle of universality, a country may apply its law to any crime, regardless of the place where the crime was committed, the nationality of the perpetrator or whether its national interests are affected or not. It stems from the necessity for international cooperation in combating crime, but it lacks legal realism and has been criticized as extremely broad and difficult to apply. More particularly, its application by a State may be in the nature of a violation of the sovereignty of the other States, and the difficulty in collecting the evidence necessary for the prosecution, especially when the crime has been committed in a remote country, is apparent. In addition, the difference between the laws of different States may lead to injustices, for an act may not be regarded as an offense according to the law of one country, whereas the same act constitutes a crime in another State.

However, the necessity for cooperation in the field of criminal law is unquestionable. International agreements with the objective of combating some crimes, such as the agreements of 1910 and 1923 on obscene literature, and the agreement of 1925 and 1931 on narcotics, is an expression of that need.

Under the territoriality principle, a country may claim jurisdiction over offenses which have occurred only within its own territory. No distinction is made as to the nationality of the perpetrator.

This system although advocated by many prominent authors, has been abandoned as an exclusive concept. It postulates that each State must preserve the existing legal order and secure the rights of its own citizens. Therefore, any deed violating those interests must be punishd by its laws, even if it is committed by an alien within the territory.

This principle ignores the fact that such acts may occur within as well as outside the State. Therefore, it does not provide for those acts which are committed abroad and which affect the national interests, or its nationals.

Under the personality principle, the criminal laws of a State are personal and must apply to citizens wherever they commit a wrongful act. The concept is based upon an inner relationship between the State and its citizens. On the one hand, it prevents a State from extraditing its nationals for crimes which they have committed abroad and on the other hand, it enables the State to punish them for such acts. For aliens who violate the laws, the principle creates a "fictio juris" by virtue of which aliens living in a country are regarded as its citizens (subditus temporarius). Thus, the laws apply to them not because the wrongful act was committed within the legislating State, but because under a fictio juris, they are regarded as nationals.

The personality principle does not offer complete protection because, besides the fact that the creation of a "fictio juris" is out of place here, it does not provide for crimes which are committed by aliens abroad and affect the national interests.

The basis of the protective principle is that each State has the right to secure its national interests. These interests can be affected not only by acts committed within its territory but also by acts which take place abroad. The means of safeguarding the State's interests rests in the criminal laws, consequently, those laws must protect:

(a) All rights which are enjoyed within the State by nationals or aliens.

(b) All rights which belong to the State or to its citizens and are exercised abroad. The offense against those rights must be punished wherever it is committed and regardless of by whom because it is an inherent right of any State to safeguard such rights.

(c) Those rights which two or more countries are interested in securing. These are known as "common" or "international" rights, e.g., the security of international trade, currency, etc.

II. The Greek Criminal System

The Greek Criminal Code deals with territorial jurisdiction in Articles 5 to 11. Article 5 provides that all offenses committed within the State shall be punished according to its provisions regardless of the nationality of the perpetrator and the gravity of the offense. This provision is an expression of the territorial principle. Offenses committed within territorial waters or in Greek space are to be considered to have occurred on the country's territory. Furthermore, paragraph two of the same Article provides that Greek ships and planes are to be regarded as Greek territory even when they are abroad unless there is an exception in accordance with international law.

Article 6 is an expression of the principle of personality. It is designed to secure the punishment of those who commit crimes abroad. Without this provision, perpetrators would remain unpunished in the event that they returned to Greece, because extradition of Greek citizens is not provided for under Greek law. A condition for the applicability of this Article is that the act must be a major or a minor crime according to the laws of the country where the offense was perpetrated as well as according to Greek law. If the place of the crime is not subject to any criminal jurisdiction, Greek law is applicable.

Paragraph two of the same Article provides that the perpetrator shall be punishable if at the time of the commission of the act, he was Greek but rejected his nationality afterwards, or if he was an alien at that time but assumed Greek nationality afterwards.

The wording of Article 6 may lead to difficulties in its application because it does not make clear whether or not it applies exclusively to major or minor crimes. It simply implies that it must be illegal. Some authors contend that an offense is punishable if it is a petty offense. The opinion that the act must be a major or minor crime seems to be in accord with the whole spirit of Article 6.

Also, there is the question of what the applicable penalty shall be in the event that the law of the country where the act took place provides for a milder punishment than the law of Greece. It appears that the Greek law applies even when the penalty which it requires is severer.

If the offense committed abroad is a minor crime, prosecution must be requested either by the victim or the country where the act took place (paragraph 3). Petty offenses are punishable only where the law expressly so provides (paragraph 4).

Article 7 has its roots in the protective principle and is designated to protect Greeks against whom an offense may be perpetrated abroad by aliens. It provides that the offense must be a major or minor crime according to the law of the country where it occurred as well as to Greek law. The injured party must be a Greek citizen at the time of the commission of the crime and it is irrelevant if he acquired another citizenship subsequently.

Article 8 specifies that Greek criminal law shall apply to the crimes without restriction, specified in Articles 5 to 7, to wit, without respect to the nationality of the perpetrator, to the place of commission, and to the gravity of the crime. The enumeration of the crimes in Article 8 is exhaustive, hence, any crime not mentioned therein shall be tried under Articles 5 to 7, provided that the conditions set out therein met. Those crimes are:

(a) Acts of high treason or treason against Greece;

(b) Offenses against the national defense;

(c) Offenses committed by a Greek holding a public office;

(d) Acts against Greek public officials during the performance of their official duties, or with relation to such duties;

(e) Perjury in a proceeding pending before a Greek authority;

(f) Piracy;

(g) Offenses against the currency;

(h) Unlawful traffic in narcotics;

(i) Commerce in obscene literature;

(j) Any offense for which the application of Greek law is provided by international agreement.

Articles 9, 10, and 11 specify that if the perpetrator has committed a crime abroad and was convicted or acquitted, or if the prosecution of the act has been barred for lapse of time, or pardoned, or if prosecution has not been requested by the foreign country, it may not be prosecuted in Greece. If the perpetrator has served part of the senteence, that time shall be deducted from a punishment subsequently imposed by the Greek court for the same offense (Article 10). If a Greek national has been convicted abroad for a crime which entails additional punishment according to Greek law, the Greek court may impose such punishment. Likewise, the Greek court may impose security measures, if they are provided for by the Greek law. A translation of the above-mentioned Articles follows in the Appendix.

TRANSLATION FROM THE GREEK

Articles 5–11, Greek Criminal Code

Art. 5, par. 1. Greek criminal laws shall apply to all offenses committed within the State, even if the offender is an alien.

Par. 2. Greek ships and planes shall be regarded as Greek territory, wherever they are, unless subject to alien jurisdiction, in accordance with international law.

Art. 6, par. 1. Greek criminal laws shall apply to major and minor crimes committed abroad by Greek citizens if such acts are punishable according to the law of the place of the commission, or if that place is not subject to the sovereignty of any State.

Par. 2. Prosecution may be instituted against an alien who was a Greek at the time of the commission of the crime as well as against anyone who acquired Greek citizenship after the commission of the act.

Par. 3. In the case of minor crimes, it is necessary for the application of paragraphs 1 and 2 that either the injured party or the country where the act occurs, requests the prosecution of the perpetrator.

Par. 4. Petty offenses committed abroad are punished only where the law expressly provides therefor.

Art. 7, par. 1. The Greek criminal law shall apply to acts committed by aliens abroad against Greek nationals if such acts are major or minor crimes under Greek law and are also offenses where committed or if the place of commission is not subject to the sovereignty of any State.

Par. 2. The provisions of paragraph 3 and 4 of Article 6 shall be applicable to this Article.

Art. 8. The Greek criminal laws shall apply to the following acts regardless of the nationality of the perpetrator and the place of commission:

(1) High treason or treason against the Greek State;
(2) Offenses against the national defense;
(3) Offenses committed by Greek officials;
(4) Acts against Greek officials during the performance of their duties or in relation to such duties;
(5) Perjury in proceedings pending before Greek authorities;
(6) Piracy;
(7) Offenses against the currency;
(8) Slave traffic;
(9) Unlawful traffic in narcotics;
(10) Commerce in obscene literature;
(11) Any other case where the application of Greek law is provided for by international agreements.

Art. 9, par. 1. Prosecution for an act committed abroad may not be instituted:

(a) If the perpetrator was tried abroad and acquitted or has served the penalty imposed;
(b) If the prosecution of the act or the penalty imposed has been barred for lapse of time;
(c) If no prosecution was requested, although required by the law of the place of commission.

Par. 2. These provisions do ont apply to the acts specified in Article 5.

Art. 10. A punishment executed abroad shall be deducted from a punishment subsequently imposed for the same offense by the Greek courts.

Art. 11, par. 1. If a Greek national was convicted abroad of an act which entails additional punishment according to Greek law, the Greek court may impose such punishment.

Par. 2. Likewise, the Greek court may impose security measures upon a Greek citizen who has been convicted or acquitted by foreign courts, if such measures are provided for by the Greek law.

Hungary

Law No. V of 1961 on the Criminal Code of the Hungarian People's Republic,[1] provides for the international effects of the criminal laws in Sections Four through Seven, which read as follows:[2]

Effect of criminal law as to territory and persons

Sec. 4. (1) Hungarian law shall apply to crimes committed in Hungary and also in cases where a Hungarian citizen commits abroad an act considered a crime under Hungarian law.

(2) A crime committed outside the borders of the Hungarian People's Republic but on a Hungarian warship, a Hungarian military aircraft or a Hungarian merchant ship on the high seas or on a Hungarian civil aircraft in flight shall be judged in the same manner as crimes committed in Hungary.

Sec. 5. Hungarian law shall also apply to acts committed by foreign citizens abroad if the act:

(a) Is a crime under Hungarian law and also punishable under the law of the place of commission or

(b) If it is a crime defined in chapters IX and X of this Act and in title II of chapter XIII, regardless of whether it is punishable under the law of the place of commission or not, provided in both cases that the Procurator General orders criminal proceedings to be instituted.

Sec. 6. A sentence served as a result or preliminary custody resulting from the decision of a foreign court shall be included in the punishment meted out by the Hungarian court for the same act regardless of whether the crime has been committed in Hungary or abroad.

Sec. 7. International treaties (Conventions) and failing these international practice shall be applied to the criminal responsibility of persons enjoying extraterritoriality or personal immunity. The question of international practice shall be decided upon by decision of the Minister of Justice.

Italy

The Italian penal law has, for a long time, followed the so-called territorial principle whereby the applicability of the criminal law is limited to the territory of the State.

However, due to what Italian scholars call "the universal vocation of the penal law,"[3] it also recognizes extraterritorially binding effects in cases prescribed by law (Arts. 7-10 of the Italian Penal Code).

Such cases may be divided into two major groups. In the first group (Arts. 7 and 8), the application of the Italian criminal law to acts committed abroad by its citizens and aliens alike, is subject to no conditions whatsoever. For those under the second group (Arts. 9 and 10), the application of Italian criminal law is dependent upon the fulfillment of certain conditions. The translation of these four Articles is as follows:[1]

Art. 7. Crimes committed abroad. A citizen or foreigner who commits any of the following crimes while on foreign territory shall be punished according to Italian law:

1. Crimes against the State;
2. Crimes of counterfeiting the seal of the State and using such counterfeit seal;
3. Crimes of counterfeiting coins which are of legal tender in the territory of the State, or revenue stamps, or Italian public securities;
4. Crimes committed by public officials in the service of the State, abusing their powers or violating the duties inherent in their functions;
5. Any other offense for which special provisions of the law or international conventions prescribe the applicability of Italian criminal law.

Art. 8. Political crimes committed abroad. A citizen or foreigner who commits on foreign territory a political crime other than those specified in (1) of the preceding Article shall be punished under Italian law, upon the request of the Minister of Justice.

If the crime is one which is punishable on the denunciation of the injured party, such action is also required in addition to the above request.

For the purposes of penal law, any crime which damages the political interests of the State, or the political rights of a citizen, is a political crime. A common [ordinary] crime, inspired wholly or in part by political motives, is likewise considered a political crime.

Art. 9. Ordinary crime committed by a citizen abroad. A citizen who, apart from the cases specified in the two preceding Articles, commits a crime while on foreign territory for which the Italian law provides the death penalty or imprisonment for life, or imprisonment for not less than three years shall be punished under that law provided that he is in the territory of the [Italian] State. If it concerns a crime for which a punishment of deprivation of personal liberty for a lesser period is prescribed, the guilty party shall be punished at the request of the Minister of Justice, or upon the petition or denunciation of the injured party.

For cases provided for in the preceding provisions, when the crime has been committed to the prejudice of a foreign State or of a foreigner, the guilty person shall be punished at the request of the Minister of Justice, provided that his extradition has not been granted, or has not been agreed to by the government of the country in which he committed the crime.

Art. 10. Ordinary crime committed by a foreigner abroad. A foreigner who, apart from the cases specified in Articles 7 and 8, commits on foreign territory to the damage of the State or of a citizen, a crime for which Italian law provides the death penalty, or penal servitude for life, or imprisonment for not less than one year, shall be punished according to such law, provided he is in the territory of the State and there is a request from the Minister of Justice, or a petition or denunciation by the injured party.

If the crime is committed to the prejudice of a foreign State or a foreigner, the guilty party shall be punished according to Italian law and at the request of the Minister of Justice, always provided that:

1. He is on the territory of the State;
2. The crime is one for which the death penalty or imprisonment for life or imprisonment for a period of not less than three years is provided;
3. His extradition has not been granted or it has not been agreed to by the Government of the country in which he committed the crime, or by the country to which he belongs.

THE NETHERLANDS

The applicability of the Dutch Criminal Code, Articles 2–8, depends on the place where the punishable acts are committed (Arts. 2 and 3), the people who commit them (Arts. 5 to 7), and the nature of the acts (Arts. 4–7).

Articles 2 to 7 deal only with the question of the extent to which a Dutch judge must apply the Dutch law. A judge does not have to apply foreign law, although he must sometimes take it into account (Art. 5 under 2).

The administration of justice uses two criteria to determine the scope of its task under the Criminal Code:

(1) The extent to which the Dutch courts exercise jurisdiction over Dutch subjects. The application of the Criminal Code may be limited to cases in which the subjects of the State are guilty of punishable acts (personality principle) or to cases in which the people who are on the territory of the State commit punishable acts (territoriality principle).

(2) The interests which the Government protects in her Criminal Code. The Criminal Code may be limited to the protection of national interests (protective principle) or be extended to the protection of both national and foreign interests (universality principle).

The most important principle is the territoriality principle, i.e., the exercise of the authority of the State on its own territory. This rule may create a problem as to what is to be considered the place of the crime. When deciding where an act was committed, consideration must be given to the place where the perpetrator was in action as well as to the place where a given instrument took effect.[1]

Article 3 of the Dutch Criminal Code is an important extension of the applicability of the Code, which is also based on the principle of territoriality, in that it covers punishable deeds committed on board a Dutch vessel or airplane outside Dutch territory. This is not a pure application of the public international law adage that the "vessel is territory," for then foreign vessels inside Dutch territorial waters would be considered to belong to the territory of their land of origin and Dutch law would not be applicable to acts committed on board these vessels. According to Article 2, the Dutch Criminal Code is applicable in these cases. In practice, however, this rule is applied circumspectly if at all, in view of the principle expressed in Article 8 that Article 2 should find application only subject to the principles of public international law.[2]

The personality principle (also called the active nationality principle), implies that people belonging to one and the same state according to nationality, are, in principle, bound by their national criminal law wherever they are. This can be seen in Article 5, first paragraph, under number 1, in its purest form. In practice, however, the "good behavior" of the Dutch people abroad does not have to go beyond that of the subjects of the country in which they are. Therefore, the rule exists that there must be incrimination under both legal systems. Under Dutch law, the crime has to be a major one, but under foreign law, it might be an offense of a lesser degree, provided, however, that it is still regarded under the latter law as a punishable act.

The protective principle implies that the Dutch Criminal Code is applicable to acts, regardless of who commits them or where they are committed, which touch upon the national legal order. Formulated in this extensive way, one may say, as Pompe does,[3] that this protective principle is the underlying idea in Articles 2, 3, 5, and 6.

The universality principle (also called the passive nationality principle), is expressed in Article 8. When applying this Article, it should not be forgotten that the applicability of Articles 2 to 7 may be, as already stated, limited by the

Pertinent provisions of the Dutch Criminal Code

Art. 2. The Dutch Criminal Code shall apply to anyone who renders himself guilty of any punishable deed within the Kingdom in Europe.

Art. 3. The Dutch Criminal Code shall apply to anyone who renders himself guilty of any punishable deed outside the Kingdom in Europe on board a Dutch vessel or aircraft.

Art. 4. The Dutch Criminal Code shall apply to anyone who renders himself guilty of any of the following offenses outside the European territory of the Kingdom:

1. One of the major crimes described in Articles 92–96, 97a, 98–98c, 105, and 108–110;

2. One of the major crimes described in Articles 131–134bis and 189 if the punishable deed or major crime, which is mentioned in these Articles is a major crime in the meaning of paragraph 1;

3. Any major crime regarding coins, currency notes or banknotes, seals or stamps;

4. Forgery in debentures or certificates of debt of the Dutch Government or a Dutch province, municipality or public institution; counterfoils; dividend and interest coupons belonging to these papers including the certificates issued instead of those papers; and the intentional use of such a false or forged paper as if it were real and genuine;

5. One of the major crimes described in Articles 381–385, 409, and 410, or the minor crime described in Article 446a;

6. The major crime described in Article 207a.

Art. 5. The Dutch Criminal Code shall apply to a Dutch citizen who outside the European territory of the Kingdom renders himself guilty of:

1. One of the major crimes described in Titles I and II of the Second Book and in Articles 206, 237, 272, 388, and 389;

2. An act which is considered a major crime according to the Dutch Criminal Code and is penalized by the law of the country in which it is committed.

The prosecution may also take place, if the suspect did not become a Dutch citizen until after the act was committed.

Art. 6. The Dutch Criminal Code shall apply to a Dutch official who outside the European territory of the Kingdom renders himself guilty of one of the major crimes described in Title XXVIII of the Second Book.

Art. 7. The Dutch Criminal Code shall apply to the captain and all persons on board a Dutch vessel who outside the European territory of the Kingdom, or also off the vessel, render themselves guilty of one of the punishable acts described in Title XXIX of the Second Book and Title IX of the Third Book.

Art. 8. The applicability of Articles 2–7 is limited by the exceptions recognized in public international law.

POLAND

I. Pertinent Provisions

Provisions relating to criminal jurisdiction over acts committed outside the Polish People's Republic are contained in the Criminal Code of April 19, 1969.[1] They read as follows:

Chapter XVI. Responsibility for Offenses Committed Abroad

Sec. 113. The Polish penal law shall apply to Polish citizens who committed an offense abroad.

Sec. 114, par. 1. The Polish penal law shall apply to aliens who commit an offense abroad provided such an act is likewise recognized as an offense by the law in force in the place of its commission.

Par. 2. If differences exist between these laws, the differences may be considered in favor of the perpetrator in applying the Polish law.

Sec. 115. Regardless of the provisions in force at the place of commission of an offense the Polish penal law shall apply to aliens in case of the commission of:

(1) An offense against the essential political or economic interests of the Polish People's Republic,

(2) An offense subject to prosecution by virtue of international agreements.

Sec. 116. If the act committed abroad does not constitute an offense at the place of its commission, the prosecution shall take place on the order of the Prosecutor General of the Polish People's Republic.

Sec. 117. In case of a conviction in the Polish People's Republic, an offense of which a person had been convicted abroad, the court shall deduct from the sentence the whole or a part of the sentence served abroad, taking into consideration the differences between those sentnces.

Sc. 118. A Polish citizen may not be extradited to another country.

Sec. 119. An alien who enjoys the right of asylum may not be extradited to another country.

II. Citations and Commentaries

The principles, contained in the provisions of the 1969 Criminal Code pertaining to offenses committed abroad, are discussed by two prominent authorities on criminal law, namely Professor Igor Andrejew, who took part in drafting the Code, and Professor Witold Swida.

Professor Igor Andrejew states:[2]

II. An act committed outside Poland (and not aboard a Polish vessel) may be considered a crime in the light of Polish law on a basis other than the territorial principle.

Thus, if an act is committed by a Polish citizen, he is responsible on the basis of Polish law regardless of whether the act occurred in or outside Poland (personality principle, Sec. 113). However, if an act was committed outside Poland in a place where the act does not constitute an offense, prosecution takes place only on the order of the Prosecutor General of the Polish People's Republic (Sec. 116).

Therefore the definition of the nationality principle given in the Criminal Code is fairly broad. On the one hand, a Polish citizen, regardless of where he is, must comply with his national law. If he is in a country which permits polygamy, this does not mean that he should not have to comply with the principle of monogamy prevailing in Poland. On the other hand, it would be useless to prosecute a Polish citizen for every act which is not considered an offense at the place of its commission. In order to avoid conflicting decisions, the Code makes the prosecution dependent on the decision of the Prosecutor General of the Polish People's Republic.

Polish law explicitly proclaims the principle that a Polish citizen is not subject to extradition, i.e., that he cannot be surrendered to the authorities of another state (Sec. 118).

III. An alien may be tried by a Polish court for an act committed abroad and recognized as an offense both by Polish law and the law in force at the place of its commission (Sec. 114, par. 1). This is a subsidiary responsibility since as a rule the perpetrator is subject to extradition to the authorities of the state where the offense was committed.

In applying Polish law to an alien, the court may take the differences between Polish law and the law in force at the place of the commission of the offense into consideration in favor of the perpetrator (Sec. 114, par. 2).

IV. In some instances an alien is responsible for an act committed abroad even if the act is not recognized as an offense in the place of its commission. These instances refer to offenses against vital political and economic interests of the Polish People's Republic (protective principle, Sec. 115,(1)). Prosecution in such cases is justified by the particular importance of the object of protection because of which [i.e., importance] the prosecution cannot depend on the legal qualification of the act in the light of foreign legislation which sometimes may not only tolerate such acts but even directly encourage them. Prosecution takes place on the order of the Procurator General of the Polish People's Republic (Sec. 116).

Offenses against vital political and economic interests of the Polish People's Republic are dealt with in Chapter XIX (Secs. 122-135) of the Criminal Code. They include: violent overthrow of the government(Sec. 123), espionage (Sec. 124), terroristic acts (Sec. 126), sabotage (Sec. 127), violent overthrow of the government, espionage, terroristic acts and sabotage committed against an allied power (Sec. 129),[3] acts committed by persons authorized to represent a governmental or social organization or institution in dealings with a foreign government, foreign organizations or enterprises (Sec. 130), economic sabotage (Sec. 134), and, finally currency or customs sabotage (Sec. 135).

According to Professor Swida different principles concerning the applicability of domestic law complement each other and he discusses how the 1969 Criminal Code regulates this question in his treatise.[4]

A translation of Professor Swida's relevant remarks follows:

2. The Territorial Principle

218. The fundamental principle of the application of Polish criminal law is the territorial principle (Sec. 3). According to this principle, any person, either a Polish citizen or an alien, who commits an offense in the territory of the Polish People's Republic shall be punishable according to Polish criminal law (p. 99).

3. The Personality Principle

224. In addition to the territorial principle, our Code bases the applicability of criminal law on the personality principle, stating in Section 113 that criminal law applies to a Polish citizen who has committed an offense abroad. The Code does not introduce the restriction contained in Section 6 of the 1932 Criminal Code which provided that the prerequisite of responsibility is that an act be considered an offense also by the law in force in the place of its commission. Now a Polish citizen is responsible for an offense committed abroad as well, even if the act is not an offense according to the law in force in the place of its commission (p. 100–101).

4. The Protective Principle

225. The Criminal Code also uses the protective principle as a supplement to both territorial and personality principles. This principle is introduced in two variations: (a) simple, also known as general or limited (Sec. 114) and (b) strict, also known as special or unlimited (Sec. 115 (1) and (2)).

226. According to the simple protective principle, Polish criminal law applies to an alien who has committed an act abroad which is also recognized as a criminal offense under the law in force in the place where the act was committed (Sec. 114 par. 1). In case of differences between these laws, the differences may be taken into account in favor of the perpetrator in applying Polish law (Sec. 114, par. 2).

227. The second variation of the protective principle is called the strict protective principle because it does not make the punishability dependent on establishing that an offense is likewise punishable under the law of the place of its commission. This principle applies to especially serious offenses whose unqualified prosecution is necessary from the point of view of the interests of the Polish People's Republic. These offenses are crimes against the vital political and economic interests of the Polish People's Republic as defined in Chapter XIX of the Code, with the exception of treason (Sec. 122) and entering into an agreement with a hostile organization (Sec. 132) which can be committed only by a Polish citizen. According to the strict protective principle, an alien is responsible for the offenses to which this principle applies, regardless of whether they are punishable in the place of their commission. The clause that in case of differences between the foreign law and Polish law, the court may take these differences [into account] in favor of the perpetrator, also is not applicable (p. 101).

5. The Universality Principle

228. Regardless of the provisions prevailing at the place of the commission of an offense, Polish criminal law applies to aliens if they have committed an offense [which is subject to] prosecution according to international law (Sec. 115 (2)). Naturally the prerequisite for prosecution is the punishability of the offense according to Polish law and not only as defined in an international agreement concluded by the Polish State (p. 101–102).

ROMANIA

THE CRIMINAL CODE*

Chapter II. The Applicability of Criminal Law.

The Personality [Principle] in Criminal Law

Art. 4. Criminal law shall apply to offenses committed outside of the country's territory if the perpetrator is a Romanian citizen or if, without citizenship, he is a resident in the country [Romania].

The Reality [Principle] of Criminal Law

Art. 5. Criminal law shall apply to offenses committed outside of the country's territory, against the security of the Romanian State, or against the life of a Romanian citizen, or resulting in grave bodily injury or injury to his health, when committed by a foreign citizen or by a person without citizenship who has no domicile in the country's territory.

Trials for the offenses specified in the preceding paragraph shall be allowed with the prior authorization of the General Prosecutor.

The Universality [Principle] of Criminal Law

Art. 6. Criminal law shall also apply to offenses other than those stated in Article 5, paragraph 1, committed outside of the country's territory by a foreign citizen or by a person without citizenship who has no domicile in the country's territory, if:

(a) the fact is considered an offense also by the criminal law of the country where it has been committed;

(b) the perpetrator is in the country.

For offenses against Romanian State interests or against a Romanian citizen, the perpetrator may also be tried when his extradition has been obtained.

The preceding paragraph shall not apply when, according to the law of the State in which the perpetrator committed the offense, any clause exists which forbids criminal prosecution, the continuation of a criminal trial or the execution of the penalty, or when the penalty has been executed or is considered to have been executed. When the penalty [imposed] has not been executed or has been executed only partially, [the trial] shall proceed according to the legal provisions stated for the recognition of foreign judgments.

Criminal Law and International Agreements

Art. 7. Articles 5 and 6 shall apply if an international agreement does not state otherwise.

Immunity From Jurisdiction

Art. 8. Criminal law shall not apply to offenses committed by diplomatic representatives of foreign countries or by other persons who, in conformity with international conventions, are not subject to the criminal jurisdiction of the Romanian State.

Codul penal al Republicii Solialistic România,* Bucharest, 1968.

Extradition

Art. 9. Extradition shall be accorded or it may be requested based on an international convention or on reciprocity and, in absence of these, by virtue of the law.

Scandinavian Countries

I. Introduction

Extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction is sometimes referred to as international criminal law. However, Scandinavian writers prefer to use this term only for the criminal laws which have originated from international institutions and from agreements between individual states.[1]

This report deals with the applicability of national provisions in respect to space, because it is difficult to discuss the somewhat narrower subject of extraterritorial jurisdiction alone. The basic jurisdictional principle of Scandinavian criminal law, as of Anglo-American criminal law, is the territorial principle. However, the Scandinavian countries have had supplementary provisions on extraterritorial jurisdiction for more than a century. There are also Scandinavian provisions which make it possible to consider that a criminal act has been committed where the actual or intended consequences of the act have taken effect, and it may be doubtful whether such jurisdiction should be considered as territorial or extraterritorial jurisdiction.[2]

Part II, about the historical development, deals briefly with the relative place of Scandinavian criminal law within the Western World, because it is desired to stress that the current Scandinavian codes are closely related both to Anglo-American and to Continental European criminal law. The Scandinavian emphasis on territorial jurisdiction points to the relationship with English law.

Part III, about the current criminal codes, discusses the actual Scandinavian provisions in some detail. The Scandinavian experience with dual territorial and extraterritorial jurisdiction has been good, and the current Scandinavian provisions have, in principle, great similarity to the jurisdictional provisions of the proposed Federal Criminal Code.[3]

Appendices A, B, and C contain the translations of the jurisdictional provisions in the current criminal codes of Denmark,[4] Norway,[5] and Sweden[6] respectively. Appendix D is a copy of Chapter 10 on criminal jurisdiction in the English version of Professor Andenaes' standard text on Norwegian criminal law.[7] This appendix was included because it is representative of the way in which Danish Norwegian, and Swedish writers normally present the rationale of the Scandinavian provisions on criminal jurisdiction. It also illustrates how easy it would be to apply this approach to Chapter 2 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code.[8] It is probably this kind of systematic or rational approach which Professor Damaska has in mind when he states that: "Continentals would consider traditional common law jurisdictional notions less rational than their own."[9]

II. The Development of Scandinavian Criminal Law

The historical basis for Scandinavian criminal law is the same as that for Anglo-American criminal law, namely, the laws of the North Germanic peoples who settled around the North Sea. There was much interaction between these peoples who had excellent means of seaward transportation while their means of overland transportation were poor. This common development lasted up to the Norman invasion of England in 1066. Two American scholars have discussed the later developments in such a way that they supplement each other. Orfield wrote in 1953: [10]

> A study of the growth of criminal law in the Scandinavian states indicates that there are many close parallels with the growth of the criminal law in England. Concepts of private vengeance existed contemporaneously in both groups. There were outlawry, ordeals, and the use of compurgations and oath helpers in both groups. Movements to eliminate the wide use of the death penalty occurred side by side in both groups. A century ago the Scandinavians became interested in American methods of prison administration. During the past century all the Scandinavian states have developed modern codes of substantive and of procedural criminal law, which deserve study in other states when modernization of the criminal law is being attempted. The Scandinavian states have developed a unique alternative to the juvenile courts, namely, the use of committees and boards instead of courts. Criminal penalties are light, yet the Scandinavian states have a much lower percentage of crime than the United States. Scandinavian criminal procedure has moved away from the inquisitorial principle to the accusatorial.

Gerhard O. W. Mueller wrote a decade later: [11]

> Here was a legal system which had spawned our own common law, which was thoroughly continental, yet, because of its historical ties with the British Isles, and a stubborn resistance against mid-European imperialization, had stayed somewhat aloof of the Roman law influences which had reshaped the law of the continent proper. Norwegian law, perhaps like Scandinavian law generally, has therefore become a virtual link between the Roman based continental legal systems and the common law though, without question, its legal ties, like its geography, are much closed with Central Europe than with England and America.

Professor Mueller seems to reflect the school of thought that it is possible to divide the entire Western World up into either common law systems or civil law systems. A Swedish writer has defended this view in some detail,[12] even though he also agrees with the late Professor Max Rheinstein that "the differeneces between the several families of the civil law group are so considerable that it might be justified to regard Nordic [i.e., Scandinavian] laws as another, though peculiar different, family of the civil law group." [13] However, most Scandinavian writers simply reject the idea that Scandinavian law can be classified as either civil law or as common law,[14] primarily because they feel that the so-called civil law group is too fragmentated to be considered one group.[15] The general Scandinavian (and to a large extent European) trend seems to be to consider all the legal systems of the Western World as belonging to one large group of relatively closely related legal systems. As it has been pointed out by the Swiss Professor Schnitzer,[16] all the legal systems of this Euro-American group are mixtures of Roman and Germanic law. Schnitzer clarifies his theory further by stating that this whole group has "developed out of a mixed Roman and Germanic civilization imbued with Christianity." [17]

The Swedish Professor Malmström has written a good article in English [18] about the different comparative approaches, and his opinion seems to be representative of a rather generally held Scandinavian view when he accepts Schnitzer's proposal about organizing the individual legal systems in a way similar to that of a color scale according to the relative importance of Roman ing arrangement: [19]

		CONTINENTAL EUROPEAN GROUP
Common law (England, U.S.A., etc.)	Scandinavia	Germany Switzerland Austria	France Belgium Luxemburg Holland	Italy Spain Latin America
			LATIN GROUP

Malmström himself admits that his grouping of the Euro-American legal systems is not a perfect solution, but it seems to be a more useful tool for comparative purposes than is the mere division of the Western World into "civil law systems" and "common law systems."

III. The Current Criminal Codes

The jurisdictional provisions in the current criminal codes of Denmark,[20] or Germanic elements. This would, according to Malmström, lead to the follow- Norway,[21] and Sweden [22] are all arranged in the same way: (A) the territorial principle is first established as the general jurisdictional principle; (B) the personality principle is then applied to fill in certain lacunae which have been left by the territorial provisions; (C) the universality principle is finally applied to fill in the lacunae which were left by the two previous principles. The provisions apply to all criminal offenses, regardless of whether they are described in the special part of the criminal codes or in other statutes.

The wording of the current Norwegian jurisdictional provisions has remained practically unchanged since 1951,[23] and the present provisions have much likeness to the corresponding provisions in the Norwegian Criminal Code of 1902.[24] Differently worded provisions which made the territorial, the personality, and the universality principles applicable to most serious crimes had already been introduced in the Norwegian Criminal Code of 1842.[25] The wording of the current Danish jurisdictional provisions has remained virtually unchanged since 1930,[26] and is quite similar to the original, somewhat weaker, provisions which were enacted in 1866.[27] The wording of the present Swedish jurisdictional provisions dates back to 1965,[28] and they were, in principle, introduced by the Swedish Criminal Code of 1864.[29] This Code was divided into a general and a specific part, as is usual in European criminal codes. However, the general arrangement of the Swedish Criminal Code was changed in 1965 in order to make it conform better with the original arrangement of 1754.[30] The Swedish Criminal Code is, technically, a chapter of the general Swedish lawbook or code, Sveriges Rikes Lag, which has been uninterruptedly in force since 1734.

A. Territorial Jurisdiction

Scandinavian criminal law has from olden times recognized the territorial principle in the sense that the national criminal law (legal competence) applies to, and the national courts have jurisdiction (judicial competence) over, any crime committed within the national territory, regardless of the nationality of the perpetrator.[31] It is this territorial principle which the criminal codes of Denmark,[32] Norway,[33] and Sweden [34] have established as their basic jurisdictional principle. The Scandinavian words which have been translated as "territory" or "Realm" clearly include both the sea and air territory, and it seems to be generally agreed that the provisions also cover pursuit in continenti from the air or sea territory.[35] Denmark and Norway are extending the territorial principle to apply to Danish or Norwegian ships and airplanes respectively, while Sweden [36] considers such jurisdiction as extraterritorial.

B. Extraterritorial Jurisdiction

The territorial principle developed historically as a pragmatic and practical principle which reflected the traditional concept of sovereignty. It was never, in Scandinavia, accepted as a negative principle in the sense that a crime could be prosecuted only if it had been committed within the territorial jurisdiction.[37] The Scandinavian discussion in the middle of the 19th century indicates that it was not doubted that the state had the right to exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction, but that there was considerable doubt as to the practicability of the suggested version of the personality principle, because different countries had different concepts of what constituted a crime. Controversial subjects of the time such as duelling and bigamy, were discussed.[38]

It is interesting to note that the Royal Swedish Commission in its report of 1840 included a response from the law faculty at the University of Uppsala about the hypothetical prosecution of a returning Swedish citizen who, perfectly lawfully, had owned and sold slaves in the United States.[39]

1. The Personality Principle

The personality principle fills in lacunae left by the territorial principle by extending jurisdiction to include crimes which have been committed abroad by citizens or permanent residents of the respective Scandinavian country. The Danish [40] and the Swedish [41] criminal codes describe the personality principle in sweeping terms, while the Norwegian code [42] describes exactly to which criminal acts the principle applies. The Norwegian method of drafting is probably preferable from an American point of view.

It appears, from the legislative history dating back to the middle of the 19th century, that the Scandinavian personality principle can scarcely be said to have been motivated by the allegiance that citizens and permanent residents owe to their country. The main motivation for the enactment was that the Scandinavian countries, as the general rule, do not extradite their citizens or permanent residents to non-Scandinavian countries, and that consequently, it had to be made possible to prosecute citizens or permanent residents for crimes which they had committed abroad. The 19th century discussions also indicate that it was felt that the general preventive effect of the criminal code would be undermined if it should become impossible to prosecute a person present in the country for a crime which he undoubtedly had committed. It is a consequence of this philosophy that the relevant time for deciding citizenship or permanent residency, at least in Denmark, is the time when the criminal investigation is initiated, rather than the time when the crime was committed.[43]

The Danish and the Norwegian personality principle is limited to criminal acts which were also punishable in the country where they were committed, while Sweden does not extend this benefit to its citizens or permanent residents. Those provisions reflect the discussions previously referred to about the different concepts of such crimes as duelling, bigamy, and slavery, and criticism has been made that the relatively new Swedish Criminal Code of 1965 does not follow Danish-Norwegian law on this point.[44] However, the present Swedish solution is motivated by the desire to offer international legal assistance by being able to prosecute criminals, rather than to extradite them.[45] The shortcoming of the Danish-Norwegian provisions is that prosecution becomes impossible, if the respective foreign country does not have a criminal offense which corresponds closely to an offense described in the Danish or the Norwegian Criminal Code. For instance, it has proved impossible to prosecute Danish citizens in Denmark for defrauding innkeepers in France, because France does not have any criminal offense which corresponds close enough to Section 298, No. 3, of the Danish Criminal Code.[46]

The Swedish reference to international legal assistance refers to the fact that European international cooperation within the field of law enforcement has greatly increased within the later decades. It has been a long-standing Scandinavian practice to prosecute for crimes committed in another Scandinavian country, and to execute criminal judgments handed down by the courts of the other Scandinavian countries. The latter field is now regulated by uniform Scandinavian laws,[47] while the former is based on informal agreements and mutual understandings. A very similar trend can be seen for all of the European countries, and this is reflected by the recent European convention on the international validity of criminal judgments.[48] Normally it is this body of law which Scandinavian writers refer to when they use the term "international criminal law." [49]

2. The Universality Principle

The real [50] or universality [51] principle denotes that non-residents/aliens may be prosecuted for acts committed abroad when the state has a special interest in protecting itself or its citizens against such acts. The universality principle is generally accepted in Scandinavia as an unavoidable supplement to the territorial and the personality principles.[52] The Swedish [53] and the Danish [54] provisions are drafted in sweeping terms, while the Norwegian,[55] as for the personality principle, describes accurately the crimes for which the universality principle applies.

C. Where Shall the Crime be Deemed Committed?

It is generally accepted principle within Scandinavian criminal law that a crime may always be considered to have been committed at the place where the crime was executed, regardless of where the consequences of the act occurred. It is on this background that the criminal codes of Denmark,[56] Norway,[57] and Sweden[58] have provisions that a crime under certain circumstances may be "deemed" or "considered" as committed also where an actual or intended consequence took place. These provisions are not considered as mere extensions of the territorial principles, but as independent jurisdictional provisions, e.g., the unlawful mailing of a bomb is considered a committed crime both where the bomb was mailed and where it was received.[59]

It is generally agreed that the Scandinavian provisions about where a crime shall be deemed to have been committed also apply to attempts, cooperation, and crimes of omission.[60]

D. The Applicability of Foreign Law

The recognition of extraterritorial jurisdiction greatly enlarges the possibility of conflicts with foreign criminal codes. The Danish,[61] Norwegian,[62] and Swedish[63] codes state rather categorically that the national courts should apply national law. However, this recognition of lex fori does not prevent foreign law from being applied in a number of situations. For instance, it is a matter of course that questions arising in the civil law area, such as the question about marriage in a bigamy case, are always decided in accordance with the appropriate legal system.

The Scandinavian countries do not have any absolute prohibition against double jeopardy. However, Section 10, Subsection 3 of the Danish Criminal Code states expressly that foreign judgments for acquittal prevent prosecutions based on the personality principle. The same rule may normally be deduced from Sections 12 and 13 of the Norwegian Penal Code, and the rule seems also to be followed in the Swedish administrative practice based on Section 5 of the Swedish Penal Code.[64] The criminal codes of Denmark,[65] Norway,[66] and Sweden[67] also have provisions which make it mandatory for the courts to deduct punishment which has already been served abroad.[68]

E. International Law

The Scandinavian criminal codes[69] expressly state that their jurisdictional provisions are limited by generally acknowledged exceptions of international law. It is generally agreed that these provisions confer immunity to certain persons, such as foreign diplomats, the crews from foreign warships on visits, and the like. Scandinavian writers claim that, apart from such rules of immunity, it is disputable whether international law limits the right of individual countries to punish acts committed outside their territory by aliens. They often refer, in this connection, to the Cutting case of 1886 where the United States disputed that Mexico had jurisdiction over the Uniter States citizen, A. K. Cutting.[70]

F. The Protected Interest

It should finally be mentioned that extraterritorial jurisdiction may be limited by the fact that the criminal offense is described in such a way that it, as a practical matter, has to have been committed inside the territorial borders.[71]

THE DANISH CRIMINAL CODE of 15 April 1930, as amended by later Acts.

General Part

CHAPTER II—CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH THE CRIMINAL LAW IS GENERALLY APPLIED

3. (1) Where the penal legislation in force at the time of the criminal proceedings in respect of any act differs from that in force at the time of commission of that act, any questions concerning the punishable nature of the act and the penalty to be inflicted shall be decided under the more recent Act: provided that the sentence may not be more severe than under the earlier Act. If the repeal of the Act is due to external conditions irrelevant to the guilt, the act shall be dealt with under the earlier Act.

(2) If in circumstances other than those provided for in the last sentence of subsection (1) an act ceases to be lawfully punishable, any penalty awarded, but not yet served for such act shall be remitted. The convicted person may demand that the question concerning the remission of the penalty be brought, at the instance of the Public Prosecutor, before the court which passed sentence in the first instance. The decision shall be made by court order.

4. (1) The question whether the punishable act shall have legal effects of the nature referred to in sections 30, 56 to 61, 70 to 77, or 79 of this Act shall be decided under the law in force at the time of the criminal proceedings.

(2) Unless otherwise provided, other legal consequences shall take effect only if provided for by the law in force at the time the act is committed.

(3) The provision of sect. 3, subsect. (2), of this Act shall likewise apply to legal effects other than punishment, provided such effects directly arise from the punishable nature of the act.

5. Where an aggravation of the penalty or other legal effects have been prescribed in the case of recidivism, decisions made under previous law shall be taken into account as if they had been made in conformity with the law under which the immediate act is to be dealt with.

6. (1) Under Danish criminal jurisdiction shall come acts committed—(I) within the territory of the Danish State; or (II) on board a Danish ship or plane being outside the territory recognised by international law as belonging to any State; or (III) on board a Danish ship or plane being within the territory recognised by international law as belonging to a foreign State, if committed by persons employed on the ship or plane or by passengers traveling on the ship or plane.

(2) The Minister of Justice shall decide to what extent acts committed on board a foreign ship or plane within Danish territory by and against any person employed by it or travelling on it as a passenger shall be brought before the courts.

7. Under Danish criminal jurisdiction shall also come acts committed outside the territory of the Danish State by a Danish national or by a person residing in that territory—(I) where the act was committed outside the territory recognised by international law as belonging to any State; provided acts of such nature are subject to a penalty more severe than simple detention; (II) where the act was committed within the territory of a foreign State, provided it is punishable also under the law in force in that territory.

8. (1) Under Danish criminal jurisdiction shall also come acts committed outside the territory of the Danish State, irrespective of the nationality of the perpetrator—(I) where the act violates the independence, safety, Constitution or public authorities of the Danish State, the duties of an official to the State or such interests the legal protection of which depends on a personal connection with the Danish State; or (II) where the act violates an obligation which the perpetrator is required by law to observe abroad or prejudices the performance of an official duty incumbent on him regarding a Danish ship or plane; or (III) where an act committed outside the territory recognised by international law as belonging to any State violates a Danish national or a person residing within the territory of the Danish State, provided acts of such nature are subject to a penalty more severe than simple detention.

(2) In the circumstances referred to under paragraph (III) of subsect. (1) of this section, the Chief Public Prosecutor shall decide whether or not an action shall be brought.

9. Where the punishable nature of an act depends on or is influenced by an actual or intended consequence, the act shall also be deemed to have been committed where the consequence has taken effect or has been intended to take effect.

10. (1) Where prosecution takes place in this country under the foregoing provisions, the decision concerning the penalty or other legal effects of the act shall be made under Danish law.

(2) Provided that, in the circumstances referred to in sect. 7 of this Act, the penalty to be inflicted in respect of an act committed within the territory recognised by international law as belonging to a foreign State shall not be more severe than that provided for by the law in force in that territory.

(3) In the case referred to in sect. 7 of this Act, no prosecution may be proceeded within this country if the perpetrator has been finally acquitted in the State where the act was committed or if he has served the penalty inflicted or if the penalty has been remitted under the law of that State.

(4) If, otherwise, any person who is to be sentenced for an act in this country has already served his sentence elsewhere, this shall be taken into account by the court in such manner as to reduce the penalty commensurately or to remit it, as the case may be.

11. If a Danish national or a person residing in the Danish State has been punished in a foreign State for an act which under Danish law may entail loss or forfeiture of an office or profession or of any other right, such effect may take place in the course of a public action brought by the order of the Chief Public Prosecutor.

12. The application of the provisions of sections 6 to 8 of this Act shall be subject to the exceptions recognised by international law.

PART I—GENERAL PROVISIONS

CHAPTER I—APPLICABILITY OF THE NORWEGIAN PENAL LAW

Section 12

The Norwegian penal law is applicable, unless otherwise provided or agreed upon by a treaty with a foreign state, to acts committed:

1. in the realm including on a Norwegian vessel on the high seas and on a Norwegian aircraft in areas outside the jurisdiction of any state,

2. on a Norwegian vessel or aircraft wherever it is, by a member of its crew or others travelling on the craft,

3. abroad by a Norwegian national or any other person domiciled in Norway when the act

   (a) is covered in chapters 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 14, 17, 18, 20, 23, 24, 25, 26 or 33 or sections 135, 141, 142, 144, 169, 191–195, 199, 202, 204 (cf. 202), 205–209, 223–225, 228–235, 242–245, 291, 294 no. 2, 318, 326–328, 330 last para., 338, 367–370, 380, 381 or 423 of this law, or

   (b) is a felony or misdemeanor against the Norwegian state or a Norwegian authority, or

   (c) is subject to punishment also according to the laws of the country in which it has been committed,

4. abroad by a foreigner, when the act

(a) is one treated in sections 83, 88, 89, 90, 91a, 93, 94, 98–104, 110–132, 148, 149, 152, paras. 1 and 2, 153, paras. 1 to 4, 154, 159, 160, 161, 169, 174–178, 182-185, 187, 189, 190, 191–195, 202, 217, 220, 221, 223–225, 229, 231–235, 243, 244, 256, 258, 267–269, 276, 292, 324, 325, 328, 415 or 423 of this law or the Defense Secrets Law, sections 1, 2, 3, or 5 or

(b) is a felony punishable also according to the laws of the country in which it has been committed, and the guilty person is domiciled in the realm or is staying here.

In cases where the punishability of the act depends on or is influenced by an actual or intended effect, the act is considered to have been committed also where the effect has occurred or is intended to occur.

Section 13

In the instances mentioned in section 12, No. 4, legal proceedings can be limited only by the decision of the King.

In the instances mentioned in section 12, No. 4 (b), legal proceedings cannot be initiated, unless the perpetrator actually can be punished according to the laws of the country in which the act has been committed. Nor can more severe punishment be inflicted than provided for by the laws of that country.

In every case where somebody has been punished abroad, and in this country is convicted of the same offense, the punishment already served shall, if possible, be deducted from his sentence.

Section 14

The application of the above described rules is circumscribed by generally acknowledged exceptions of international law.

Part One—General Provisions

CHAPTER 2—OF THE APPLICABILITY OF SWEDISH LAW

Sec. 1. A person, who has committed a crime within this Realm, shall be tried according to Swedish law and in a Swedish court. The same applies when it is uncertain where the crime was committed but grounds exist for assuming that it was committed within the Realm.

Sec. 2. If a crime has been committed outside the Realm by a Swedish citizen or by an alien domiciled in Sweden, he shall be tried according to Swedish law and in a Swedish court.

If some other alien, while being outside the Realm, has committed a criminal act which was punishable under the law in force at the place of the crime, he shall be tried according to Swedish law and in a Swedish court, if, after having committed the crime, he has become a Swedish citizen or has acquired domicile in this Realm or if he is a Danish, Finnish, Icelandic, or Norwegian citizen and is found here, and similarly too if he is found in the Realm and the crime is punishable according to Swedish law by imprisonment for more than six months.

Sec. 3. Even in a case other than those mentioned in Section 2, an alien, who has committed a crime outside the Realm, shall be tried according to Swedish law and in a Swedish court,

1. if he committed the crime on board a Swedish vessel or airplane or if he was a commanding officer or belonged to the crew of such carrier and committed the crime while in that capacity;

2. if he committed the crime in an area where a detachment of military forces was found but, unless he was a serviceman, only if the detachment was there for other than training purposes;

3. if the crime was committed against Sweden, a Swedish citizen or a Swedish group, institution or organization or against an alien domiciled in Sweden; or

4. if the crime violated international law.

Sec. 4. A crime is deemed to have been committed where the criminal act occurred and also where the crime was completed or, in case of attempts, where the intended crime would have been completed.

Sec. 5. Prosecution for a crime committed within the Realm on a foreign vessel or airplane by an alien, who was a commanding officier or belonged to the crew of or otherwise accompanied the carrier, against such alien or a foreign interest shall not be instituted without an order from the King or from someone authorized by the King to give such order.

Prosecution for a crime committed outside the Realm may be instituted only pursuant to an order as stated in the first paragraph. Nevertheless, prosecution may be instituted without such order if the crime was committed on a Swedish vessel or airplane or, while on duty, by the commanding officer or some member of the crew of such carrier or by a serviceman in an area where a detachment of the armed services was found or by a Swedish, Danish, Finnish, Icelandic or Norwegian citizen against a Swedish interest.

Sec. 6. No one may, without an order from the King or from some one authorized by the King to give such order, be prosecuted for an act for which he has been subjected to punishment or other sanction outside the Realm. If prosecution is instituted in this Realm, the fixing of the sanction shall be done with due consideration for what he has suffered outside the Realm, and he may according to circumstances be sentenced to a lesser punishment than the one set by law for the act or be completely absolved of punishment.

Sec. 7. Aside from the provisions of this chapter regarding the applicability of Swedish law and the jurisdiction of Swedish courts, attention shall be paid to the limitations resulting from generally recognized principles of international law or, in accord with special statutory provisions, from agreements with foreign powers.

Sec. 8. Separate statutory provisions govern extradition for crime.

Conditions stipulated in connection with extradition from a foreign state to Sweden shall be complied with in this Realm.

The General Part of the Criminal Law of Norway

(By Johannes Andenæs, Dr. Jur.; Translated by Thomas P. Ogle, LL.B.)

THE APPLICABILITY OF PENAL PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO SPACE AND TIME

§ 39. The Penal Code's Territorial Applicability

I. Posing the problem

To what extent does Norwegian penal law apply to acts committed in foreign countries or by foreigners? That is the question of the penal law's territorial applicability. In this connection we occasionally speak about international penal law, in analogy with international private law. In both instances the word international indicates only that we are dealing with foreign countries or foreign citizens, and not that the rules are the same or similar in most countries. But otherwise there is a great difference between the two branches of law. In international private law, the question is which country's law our courts will or must apply to a judicial question connected with foreign countries or aliens, whereas here there is a conflict of national laws and a choice between them. On the other hand, Norwegian courts never sentence anybody on the basis of foreign penal laws.

With respect to civil rights and duties bearing on the offense, there may be a question of applying foreign law in accordance with basic concepts of international private law. In a bigamy case, for example, the question may arise whether Norwegian or foreign law should be used as a basis for judging the validity of a marriage or divorce. As we shall see later, even foreign penal enactments can have a certain significance in a Norwegian criminal case, namely, when Norwegian law refers to them. But the authority for criminal liability must always exist under Norwegian law. This follows from § 96 of the Constitution which requires all judgments to be according to law; here, the word law most probably means Norwegian law (see S.K.M., p. 21). Our international criminal law is not a doctrine of conflict of laws, but the body of propositions telling us how far Norwegian penal law extends. The general rules on this are to be found in Penal Code, § § 12–14.

According to Penal Code, § 14, the application of the rules in Penal Code, §§ 12 and 13, is limited by "generally acknowledged exceptions of international law." International law is thus made a part of Norwegian law, so that there cannot be any actual controversy. The main concern of Penal Code, § 14, is with the rules on immunity for certain persons, such as foreign diplomats and the crew of foreign warships on visits to this country. Apart from such rules of immunity, it is disputable whether international law limits the right of individual countries to punish acts committed outside their territory by aliens.[1] The comments to the draft of the Penal Code give a negative answer (S.K.M., p. 18). If the court which hears a case against an alien comes to the conclusion, contrary to these comments, that international law precludes Norwegian jurisdiction over the case, it follows from Penal Code, § 14, that this international principle prevails over the enactments in Penal Code § § 12–13.

Generally, before judgment can be rendered and executed, the guilty person must be present in this country or subject to extradition. One country cannot exercise criminal jurisdiction within the territory of another country. But to a certain extent criminal cases can be heard even with respect to absentees (Code of Criminal Procedure, § § 309–311 and 374). If the accused is sentenced to a fine and he has funds in this country, the judgment can also be executed.

II. The territorial principle

The natural solution is that each state punishes those offenses which have been committed on its soil whether the offender is a citizen or an alien (the territorial principle). The evidence is usually more easily accessible in the place where the offense was committed. And for general preventive purposes it is important that trial and execution of sentence be had where the crime was committed.

According to Penal Code § 12, No. 1, Norwegian penal law is applied to acts which are committed in the realm. The rule also applies to legislation outside the Code (Penal Code, § 1). It makes no difference whether the offense is serious or minor, or whether the perpetrator is a Norwegian or an alien. "In the realm" also includes the territorial waters, and the law makes no distinction with respect to acts committed on board foreign vessels. A fight between crew members of a foreign vessel in Norwegian territory thus falls with Norwegian penal law, but if no Norwegian interests are affected, for example by disturbing the peace of the port, there would obviously be every reason for the Norwegian prosecuting authorities to refrain from action in such a case. The freedom to refrain from prosecution granted by Norwegian law generally makes it less dangerous to give our penal law a wide scope of application than for those countries which have a strict legality principle with respect to prosecution.

Penal Code, § 12, No. 1, considers Norwegian vessels a part of the realm when on the high seas, that is, when on the ocean outside of the territorial waters of any country. The same applies to Norwegian planes outside of the areas which are under some other country's jurisdiction. However, if the vessel is in a foreign port or within the territorial waters of some country, the act will be regarded as having been committed in the foreign country. But Penal Code, § 12, No. 2, treats just like acts committed in Norway, any acts committed "on a Norwegian vessel or aircraft wherever it is," as long as the act is committed "by a member of its crew or others travelling on the craft." Thus, an offense committed aboard a Norwegian vessel in a foreign port or in foreign territorial waters is covered by Norwegian penal law if it is committed by one of the crew or by a passenger, but not if it is committed by a visitor on board. The visitor would be affected only if he falls within Penal Code, § 12, Nos. 3 or 4.

The territorial principle also applies to offenses against the state, such as rendering aid to the enemy (Penal Code, § 86). An enemy soldier, of course, cannot be affected by this provision; he is protected by the international laws of war. But apart from that the provision also applies to aliens who commit offenses within this country (see, for example, Rt. 1948, p. 1141), even if the offender acts for the best interest of his own country (see, for example, Rt. 1946, pp. 1074 and 1185, 1947, p. 69.) Here, of course, it is not correct to speak about treason as it would be if the act were committed by a Norwegian. But this is a characterization which is not included in the description of the act, and the state has an interest in protecting itself also against foreigners who aid the enemy. It appears from Penal Code, § 12, No. 4, that the most serious felonies against the state are covered by Norwegian penal law even when they are committed by foreigners abroad.

[1] See Castberg, Studier i folkerett [Studies in international law], pp. 179–182, 189–192, 194–198, 207, 221–222 (Oslo, 1952); Skeie, Det norske strafferett, I, pp. 84–85 (Oslo, 1937).

III. Personality principle

If the nations of the world had universal and absolute extradition treaties with each other, we could go quite far with the territorial principle. But since this is not so, it must be supplemented in various ways.

It is a common principle, upon which Norwegian law also builds, that a state does not extradite its own citizens to a foreign state. Thus, if a Norwegian has committed some offense abroad and has taken refuge in his home country, Norwegian authorities could do nothing if they could rely only upon the territorial principle. Here, Penal Code, § 12, No. 3, comes into play (the principle of personality, an example of which may be found in Rt. 1949, p. 142). It applies to acts committed abroad by Norwegians or, more specifically, persons who are Norwegian citizens or are domiciled in Norway. Those who have a permanent residence here are domiciled in Norway. They can actually be extradited, but the law has nevertheless made them subject to Norwegian penal law to the same extent as Norwegian citizens. The reasoning is this: if they could not be punished here, one would have to try to extradite them or expel them, "measures which, where minor offenses are concerned, would often be unreasonably harsh and at times actually brutal" (S.K.M., p. 16).

From this interconnection of the problem with the rules on extradition one would think that the citizenship or the residence of the offender as of the time of judgment would be determinative. However, the wording of Penal Code § 12, makes it clear that the conditions at the time of the act are the determinative ones.

The provision in Penal Code, § 12, No. 3, does not deal with all punishable acts. There is little reason to pursue acts committed abroad when they do not offend Norwegian interests and are not punishable under the law of the place where they were committed. The law mentions three instances where it can be applied to Norwegians who have violated some law abroad. Under (a) it lists all of the more serious violations of the penal law, "acts which at least all civilized nations agree ought to be punished," as it is stated in the comments to the draft code (S.K.M., p. 15). Then it includes under (b) felonies and misdemeanors against the Norwegian state or Norwegian public authority. From a Norwegian point of view, the foreign state would usually not have satisfactory penal provisions against such acts. Finally, it mentions under (c) those instances where the act is also punishable according to the laws of the country where committed (see Rt. 1954, p. 900). In this instance, therefore, it is immaterial whether the act is serious, and against whom it is directed. The fact that there is no possibility of punishment in the country where the act was committed, e.g., because prosecution is barred by some statute of limitation, or because the necessary information or complaint are lacking, is immaterial if the act in itself is punishable.

An additional restriction, however, may follow when the penal provision in question must be interpreted to cover only acts committed within Norwegian territory or against Norwegian interests. When Penal Code, §406, for example, provides punishment for anybody who, by an unlawful act, "attempts to evade the payment of public taxes or duties," it must be interpreted to protect purely Norwegian fiscal interests. If a Norwegian, conducting business in Sweden evades Swedish taxes, he cannot be prosecuted in Norway under authority of Penal Code, § 12 (see, Penal Code, § 406, para. 3, and S.K.M., p. 6).

IV. Universality principle

Even this combination of the territorial and the personality principles does not always suffice. Existing extradition agreements may be suspended because of war or insurrection, or the offense may be committed in a no-man's land, or in a country with which we have no extradition agreement. In such a case, if we could not prosecute in Norway acts committed abroad by foreigners, dangerous criminals might seek asylum here. In addition to this national self-interest we might mention the ideal of international solidarity in the struggle against criminality. Just as nations help each other with extradition and police cooperation, it can be argued that there ought to be solidarity with respect to punishment in the case of serious offenses.

Penal Code, § 12, No. 4, therefore, states the principle that Norwegian penal law also may be applied to acts committed abroad by foreigners (the universality principle). But the condition is that either one of the serious offenses listed in No. 4 (a) is involved, or the act is one which is punishable according to the law of the place where it was committed and the guilty person is domiciled "in the realm," or at least is staying here during the prosecution. If the act is not one of those listed in No. 4 (a), it is, according to Penal Code, § 13, para. 2, an additional condition to penal prosecution that the perpetrator actually can be punished according to the law of the country where the act was committed. Thus, penal prosecution in Norway is precluded if barred by limitation in the country where the act was committed. Moreover, one cannot impose a more severe punishment than authorized there.

Penal Code, § 13, para. 1, also shows that in Norway prosecution of an act committed abroad by a foreigner was not intended to become an ordinary occurrence. The provision states that prosecution in these cases can be initiated only by order in council. The offender will ordinarily be extradited or expelled. Only where this is not possible or desirable, and where there exists an offense so serious that it cannot go unpunished, will the universality principle be used.

V. Where shall the offense be deemed committed?

It follows from the rules in Penal Code, §12, that it is often significant whether an offense has been committed in Norway or abroad; and the particular country in which the act took place may also at times be relevant (see Penal Code, § 12, Nos. 3(c) and 4(b)). Here Penal Code, § 12, last paragraph, comes in with a provision relating to the place where the act was committed: "In cases where the punishability of the act depends on, or is influenced by an actual or intended effect, the act is considered to have been committed also where the effect has occurred or is intended to occur."

The actual place where the act was committed is where the offender was when he committed the act. The law contains no provision substituting the place of the effect for the place of action; it provides that the act is deemed committed in both places. This means that Norwegian penal law can be used when either the act itself was committed in Norway or the result has occurred, or was intended to occur, here.

The principle is also of significance in relation to liability for cooperation. Suppose that a Dane in Denmark induces a Norwegian to publish a defamatory statement in Norway. The Dane can be punished in Norway for cooperation in defamation (see Rt. 1927, p. 513). And if the Norwegian has not executed the plan and thus cannot be punished, the Dane can be punished here for an attempt. Under Penal Code, § 12, last paragraph, the intended effect is equated with the effect that has actually occurred.

VI. The effect of foreign adjudication and execution

The rules on the territorial applicability of penal laws often lead to a situation where many countries have the right to punish the same offense. Where the case is prosecuted will then depend on where the offender is and what provisions the interested countries have with respect to extradition and expulsion.

Punishment of the offender abroad, however, does not preclude prosecution in this country, except in those cases which are mentioned in Penal Code, § 12, No. 4 (b) (See Penal Code, § 13, para. 2). Of course, Norwegian prosecuting authorities will not prosecute if the punishment which the offender has served abroad is roughly similar to that which is sufficient according to the Norwegian sense of justice. But this is not always the case, especially where the act is directed against the interests of the Norwegian state. Suppose that a Norwegian in Sweden has organized a spy ring directing its activities against Norway. He is arrested in Sweden and convicted there under Swedish penal provisions dealing with intelligence activities which endanger foreign powers. This punishment, of course, will not be equal to that which a country deems necessary as a punishment for espionage directed against itself.

But when someone who has been punished abroad is sentenced in this country for the same act, Penal Code, § 13, para. 3, provides that the punishment already served shall, if possible, be deducted from the sentence. The reservation "if possible" indicates that there are punishments which may not be reduced, such as the death penalty or removal from an official position.

The criminal proceeding in Norway, of course, is completely independent of the prior case. If the accused is found guilty by the foreign court, he may still be acquitted in the Norwegian trial.

Generally speaking, foreign judgments in criminal cases cannot be enforced in this country. An exception is made, however, with regard to sentences of courts in the other Northern countries (Denmark, Finland, Iceland and Sweden). This possibility of executing foreign sentences was first introduced by an Act of May 14, 1948, but only with regard to sentences of fines, forfeiture and costs. A new Act of November 2, 1963, extended the rule to sentences of imprisonment as well. The Act is a result of Nordic cooperation. Similar laws are enacted in the other Northern countries. One of the reasons for the broadening of the scope of the Act, as compared with previous legislation of 1948, was the consideration that it often will be an advantage for the convict to serve his sentence in his own country, where he ordinarily will have his family and where no language difficulties will impede the program of rehabilitation. There was much discussion in Parliament about the constitutionality of the new law.[2] A strong minority was of the opinion that the prohibition in § 96 of the Constitution against punishing anybody "except according to judicial sentence" means according to a Norwegian sentence. They therefore proposed to insert in the new Act a clause providing that nobody should be compelled to serve a foreign sentence in Norway against his own will, but this view did not prevail.

§ 40. Extradition, Expulsion and Rejection

I. The Extradition Act

We now have a separate statute dealing with the extradition of offenders (Act of June 13, 1908). Prior to this statute, the rules were fixed by extradition treaties, but by and large these were built on the same basic concepts as the Extradition Act. In § 25, para. 2, however, it is provided that "the provisions of existing treaties shall remain in force, despite any conflicts with this Act." Extradition treaties concluded after the Act had to be framed in accordance with it. Under the Extradition Act, extradition may also take place when Norway does not have an extradition treaty with the requesting state. Extradition in this case takes place as a matter of comity, under the direct authority of the Act.

The rules on extradition are quite similar among those countries which belong to the Western European cultural circle. Belgium's Extradition Act of 1833 has served as a model for later extradition legislation. One basic purpose of the Extradition Act is to protect the individual against arbitrariness and political prosecution. Within the framework of the European Council, a European Convention on extradition was formed after World War II, and Norway joined it. On the basis of Scandinavian cooperation, an Act of March 3, 1961, was passed concerning the extradition of offenders to Denmark, Finland, Iceland and Sweden. This Act allows a more liberal use of extradition between the closely related Scandinavian countries than that which exists between other countries.

II, The conditions for extradition

The substantive conditions for extradition are set forth in §§ 1–4 of the Extradition Act,

1. The person who is sought to be extradited must not be a Norwegian citizen (§ 1). The Scandinavian Extradition Act of 1961 makes an exception to this principle if the offender has resided in the state which is seeking extradition during the last two years or if the act or a similar act is subject to a higher punishment than imprisonment for four years under Norwegian law.

2. The offense, according to Norwegian law, must not be deemed committed in Norway (§ 4, No. 1). Here Penal Code, §12, applies: the act is also deemed to have been committed in Norway, so that extradition is precluded, when the effect has occurred or was intended to occur here, even though the offender resided abroad.

3. Extradition cannot take place for any political offense, nor for any ordinary offense which is committed in connection with a political offense and for the purpose of furthering it (§ 3). This special treatment of political offenses has become common since the Belgian Extradition Act of 1833. Political offenses are not treated in a similar manner everywhere, as are ordinary offenses. Nor is there a similar common interest on the part of the various states as there is in combating general criminality. It would not be considered proper for a democratic country, such as Norway, to extradite political refugees to a dictatorial state, such as Soviet Russia or Franco Spain.

The typical political offenses are violations of Chapters 8, 9 and 10 of the Penal Code; that is, they include not only attacks on the Constitution, but treason as well. The fact that the act has a political motive is not sufficient to make it a political offense (see Rt. 1909, p. 570; 1921, p. 205 and Ot.prp. No. 26 for 1906–1907, p. 9). If a politician defames an opponent in order to weaken him in a campaign, it is not a political offense in the eyes of the law. The act must be directed against the state or its political institutions. If the defamation of a political opponent is made in an unlawful attempt to assume power, however, extradition is precluded.

An attack upon the head of the state traditionally is a political offense, regardless of its purpose (see Penal Code, § § 100–102). But here the law has made an exception to the rule that political offenses cannot be the basis for extradition. "Offenses which have as their aim the murder of, or assault upon, a head of state or a member of his family, shall be subject to extradition, as long as they are not connected with some other political offense" (§ 3, para. 2). Thus, an isolated attempt against the life of a head of state can lead to extradition, but not an attempt committed in connection with a coup d'état or a revolution. A clause to this effect first came into the Belgian law after an attempt in 1854 against Napoleon III; the provision has therefore come to be known as the Belgian assassination clause. But the provisions in the Norwegian extradition law differ on many points from the Belgian clause.

According to § 4 of the reciprocal Scandinavian Extradition Act, there is an opportunity to extradite even for political offenses when the act or a similar act is punishable under Norwegian law and the person whose extradition is requested is not a Norwegian citizen. The reason for this rule is the close connection between the Scandinavian countries and the similar interests they have in protecting themselves against espionage, treason and unlawful attempts to overthrow the state. The proposal of the law, however, became the subject of vehement attack, and Parliament passed it only by a narrow margin.[3]

4. Extradition is granted only for crimes of a certain significance (§ 2). Generally, the crime involved must be a felony with a penalty more severe than imprisonment of one year. The law adds, however, that it is enough that the act, if committed in Norway under fully comparable conditions, could have resulted in such a sentence. This aims at penal provisions dealing with offenses against public authorities. The Norwegian penal provisions do not affect the person who has proceeded against foreign public authority, but if he could have been affected by the Norwegian penal law had the act been committed against Norwegian authorities, extradition is possible. Violations of legislation outside the Penal Code, such as that on taxes, duties and exchange, are not extraditable, even though the provisions impose a punishment greater than imprisonment for one year. Some exceptions exist, however, under § 2, para. 2. With respect to military offenses, see § 2, para. 3.

5. The law also sets up certain other restrictions. See § 4, Nos. 2 and 3.

III. Procedure

The Extradition Act contains detailed rules on extradition procedure. The procedure has many stages:

1. The foreign state must first make a request through diplomatic channels, i.e., through the State department, accompanied with proof of the reason for extradition (§ 9).

2. The case is then presented to the Ministry of Justice, and if it finds that the request does not fulfil the formal legal requirements, or that there is no legal right to extradition, the foreign state will be told, through diplomatic channels, that the request cannot be granted (§ 10).

3. If the department finds that the request can be granted, the case is presented by the prosecution to the District or City Court[4] which holds a hearing to determine whether there is a lawful right to extradition (§§ 13–14).

[3] See Edvard Hambro, Asylrett og utleveringsplikt. Tidsskrift for Rettsvitenskap, 1960, pp. 29–61.

[4] The case is heard by one judge. No lay judges are participating. [Translator's note]

The state requesting extradition is not bound to present proof that the accused has committed the act with which he is charged. Nothing more is required than reasonable grounds for suspicion and even this requirement can be omitted in the extradition agreements (§ 9. para. 3). If this is done. the hearing of the court will determine only whether the formal requirements for extradition are present.

4. If the court determines that the conditions for extradition are not present, the request must be denied (§ 16). But if it determines that the conditions are present, this does not necessarily mean that extradition will take place. It is now for the Ministry of Justice to make the final decision on the request for extradition (§ 17), and it may consider international and political factors (see Ot.prp., No. 26 for 1906–1907, p. 13).

Thus, before extradition can take place, there must be both an administrative and a judicial appraisal of the request for extradition. Prior to the Extradition Act the question was solely in the hands of the administration.

According to the Scandinavian Extradition Acts, the procedure is more simple. See, §§ 11–15 of that law.

IV. Expulsion

Extradition takes place only at the request of a foreign state. Even though it may also benefit the extraditing state to get rid of the offender, the Act considers that extradition takes place primarily in the interest of the requesting state.

Legislation also provides an easier method for getting rid of undesirable persons, namely expulsion. The rules on this subject are to be found in Chapter 5 of the Alien Act (Act Concerning Admission of Aliens into the Country, of July 27, 1956). As with extradition, expulsion of Norwegian citizens cannot take place. The reasons for expulsion fall into two groups. According to the Alien Act, § 13. expulsion may be had after a decision of the police authorities. This applies, for example. where the individual has not obeyed the rules relating to the obligation to register, to obtain a residence permit, or regarding the becoming of a public charge, or where he has been convicted of felony. According to § 15, the King (now the Ministry of Justice), for reasons of security or the protection of other public interests, may resolve to expel any alien, unless such an action would violate an agreement with a foreign state. Here there is a completely discretionary decision which in no way is subject to a court hearing. Nor are any definite procedures prescribed for the decision.

The expulsion is not to any particular country. In principle, the expelled person himself must be entitled to determine where he wants to go, if he can obtain a visa (where necessary) and money for the trip. But with the existing visa regulations, his home country may be the only country willing to receive him. For this reason expulsion may have the same practical effect as extradition.

Rejection—Even more unrestricted is the right to reject (Alien Act, § 11). The statute provides, however, that political refugees shall be given asylum in the country if they apply for it and there are no special reasons against it (§ 2). Under the Act, political refugees are those aliens who rightfully fear political persecution in their native land. "Political persecution means that because of race, religion, nationality, political views, membership in a special social group or for other political reasons, a person is subjected to political persecution which is directed against his life, freedom or otherwise is of a serious nature and, similarly, that a person can be subjected to severe punishment because of a political offense."

§ 11. The Applicability of the Penal Code With Respect to Time

I. Presenting the question

It may happen that the law is amended after the act has been committed but before it is heard by the court. Which law shall then apply, the old or the new, or sometimes the one and sometimes the other? This is the question of the applicability of the Penal Code with respect to time.

If the law is made more severe by the amendment, it follows from § 97 of the Norwegian Constitution that it cannot be made applicable to prior acts. Only when the proposed statutory amendment tends to be more lenient, or at least cannot be said to be more severe, does the legislature have a choice. Various solutions have been chosen in foreign laws. If the amendment of the law expresses a change of view by the legislature, it is natural that the new law should also be made applicable to previous acts. If the new law repeals the threat of punishment because of such a change of view, it has thus declared that there is no sufficient reason to punish acts of this nature; if it has reduced the punishment, it has declared that the earlier one was excessive. In both instances, this leniency should also be extended to previous acts. The determination is more difficult when changed social conditions have led to the legal amendment, as when emergency legislation is repealed after the crisis is over. Here, the amendment contains no expression of a changed legislative viewpoint, but only that there is no further use for such provisions. As we shall see, this is not the distinction on which Penal Code § 3, builds, at least not directly.

II. The milder law is applicable

Penal Code, § 3, provides the general rule on the effect of a change in the penal law during the interval between the commission of the act and trial therefor. The ruel does not limit itself to the relationship between the Penal Code of 1902 and the older penal legislation, but applies also to newer legislation, both within the Penal Code's own area and outside the Code (see Penal Code, § 1), "unless otherwise provided." This reservation presupposes that the new enactment itself can make transitional provisions in conflict with Penal Code, § 3. Actually it was unnecessary to say this; that a new enactment can make exceptions to the rule follows from the fact that Penal Code, § 3, is only an ordinary legislative provision, not a constitutional provision.

Penal Code, § 3, para. 1, sets up the principle that it is the penal provisions which exist at the time of the commission of the act which are applicable to the act. But the rule is immediately modified by the next paragraph, which provides that the penal provisions in force at the time of adjudication are applicable when they lead to a more favorable result for the accused than the older law. Together the two provisions establish the rule that the milder law is applicable. But the fact that the law at the time of the act is named as the principal one is of practical significance when there are doubts as to which law is the milder, e.g., when the two laws have different types of punishment which cannot be directly compared. The law at the time of the act is then applicable.

> In Getz' draft Penal Code of 1887 the rule was the reverse: the rules in force at the time of adjudication were to be used as the starting point, but the sentence was to be no less favorable to the defendant than it would have been had the rules in force at the time of commission been applied. The Penal Law Commission agreed that this was the correct view in principle, but because of the prohibition in the Constitution against giving a law retroactive force it found that it should be set up "as a main principle, that the law in force at the time of the act should be used, unless the later law positively and unconditionally is more favorable to the accused" (S.K.M., p. 9). This was more probably an exaggerated caution. It can hardly be said that § 97 of the Constitution is violated unless the new law is stricter than the old one. The issue arose in treason trials after World War II, since the Treason Act of Dec. 15, 1944, created new and stricter rules on the loss of rights and presumed these to be applicable to acts committed during the entire German occupation to the extent that this was consistent with the Constitution. The Supreme Court held that the Constitution does not prevent the application of new penal provisions on earlier acts when the new rules lead to a result which is not less favorable for the accused than if he had been judged according to the rules which were in force when the act was committed. Whether this test was met had to be determined separately for each individual case (see Rt. 1945, pp. 26 and 43).

Only legislation in force when the act is committed or adjudicated can be applied. If a new and milder law is passed after the act has been committed, but is repealed before the case comes up for trial, it is not applicable.

How do we determine which of the two laws is the milder? Do we compare the laws in the abstract and determine on the whole which one is the milder? Or do we determine which law will lead to the most favorable result for the particular accused The law states that the new provisions apply when they are more favourable to the accused than the provisions in force when the act was committed. The judge must therefore make a preliminary determination of the result according to both laws (see, for example, Rt. 1952, p. 1059). Suppose that a new enactment increases the penalty for an offense, but at the same time increases the availability of suspended sentence.[5] Under the old law, the punishment would be unconditional imprisonment for three months; under the new law, it would be imprisonment for six months, but with the possibility of suspending the execution of the sentence. Thus, the new law is milder if the judge finds that suspended sentence should be granted in the case before him, but more strict if he comes to the opposite conclusion. Therefore, where several persons have taken part in the same offense, one of them may have his case judged according to the new law, because he can have the benefit of suspension of the sentence, while the other may have his case judged according to the old law because he cannot under any circumstances obtain a suspended sentence, so that as to him the older law is the milder.

It is the legislation as a whole in force when the act was committed or when it was judged which must be applied (see S.K.M., p. 9; Rt. 1905, p. 454). The judge cannot combine the two laws so as to mete out the punishment according to the old law, and suspend sentence pursuant to the rules of the new law.

It may occasionally be difficult to determine which law is the milder, especially when the new law makes a change in the type of punishment. A new law, for example, makes possible a shorter term of imprisonment, but at the same time extends the applicability of loss of rights. The judge must try to ascertain which sanction is the more favorable for this particular person; a loss of rights which is a serious punishment for one person may be a mere formality for another.

III. The area of application of Penal Code, § 3

Penal Code, § 3, uses the terms "penal law" and "penal provisions." The question is now how far these expressions extend.

1. Procedural provisions.—It is clear that procedural provisions do not fall within Penal Code, § 3. The general rule here is that the court applies the procedural rules which are in force when the case comes up for trial. An accused has no protection against new and less favorable rules of procedure being applied in his case. New rules, for example, which restrict the accused's access to appeal or rehearing, can also be applied to prior acts. But new procedural rules can, of course, provide that they are non-retroactive.

Whether a provision is inserted in a procedural enactment or in a penal statute cannot determine its character. The Penal Code contains several provisions of a purely procedural nature (see, for example, § 39b) and, on the other hand, it is not impossible that substantive penal provisions can for some reason or other be found in a procedural statute. The decisive factor in relation to Penal Code, § 3, must be the character of the provision itself, not its place in the legal system (see, however, the statement in Rt. 1939, p. 740). The nature of some provisions may be doubtful. The rules on prosecution are in certain ways considered procedural. But it appears from Penal Code, § 3, paras. 3 and 4, that in this respect the rules on prosecution are considered substantive law (see below, pp. 338–339).

2. Provisions governing execution of sentences.—Provisions governing execution of sentences also fall outside Penal Code, § 3. These are questions which usually do not arise until after adjudication, at the stage of execution. New provisions as to prison rules, release on parole or collection of fines, for example, are generally also applied to previously imposed sentences, regardless of whether the change involves an improvement or a worsening of the convict's situation. Any other rule would lead to serious practical difficulties.

But if the rules were to be so radically changed as to create in effect an entirely new punishment—if, for example, the rules on jailing were aggravated to such an extent that only the name would distinguish it from imprisonment in a penitentiaary—it would be a violation of § 97 of the Constitution to apply the new rules to prior acts. How far legislation may go in this area depends on an interpretation of the Constitution. Since the recent trend has been in the direction of making the rules milder, the question has not been of much practical significance (see, however, Rt. 1948, p. 103).

3. Provisions governing legal consequences which are not punishment.—Provisions governing legal consequences other than punishment also fall outside Penal Code, § 3. This is clear for purely civil claims, such as claims for damages or redress as a result of the punishable act. The rule here is that the law at the time of the act must be used. If one were to follow the principle in Penal Code, § 3, that a new and milder law shall apply, this would mean for the victim a loss of the claim which had arisen in his favor by the commission of the offense. That which is favorable to one is detrimental to the other.

But the situation is doubtful with respect to public sanctions which are not legally defined as punishment, but which nevertheless stand in close proximity to punishment, such as preventive detection, safety measures, and forfeiture. The correct solution is probably to say that Penal Code, § 3, is not directly applicable, and that the question must be solved by interpretation of the new provisions and any special transitional provisions which may exist, but that Penal Code § 3, allows a certain basis for the use of analogy where the measure is closely related to punishment. Practice has taken no definite position on the issue. In general, the new regulations expressly state whether they are applicable to prior acts.

4. Changes in judge-made law.—The provision in Penal Code, § 3, refers to legislative amendments, not to judge-made law. The Supreme Court may overrule a legal interpretation which earlier decisions have followed. Whether the change derives to the benefit or the detriment of the accused, the new construction will nevertheless apply to prior acts. But if the change is to the detriment of the accused, the prior legal practice may be the basis of an acquittal on the grounds of excusable mistake of law.

IV. More details about the applicability of § 3

As the area proper of the applicability of Penal Code, § 3, we are thus left with legislative amendments which have a direct effect upon whether the offender is to be punished, and if so in what manner. However, Penal Code, § 3, will not apply to all changes of this nature.

Temporary enactments—One group, namely, temporary enactments, can be immediately distinguished. A temporary Act, for example, may be given effect until December 31, 1964. A violation of this Act is committed in December of 1964, and is prosecuted the next year, after the Act has lapsed. There is no change of view on the part of the legislature. And it would clearly weaken the effectiveness of such temporary enactments if a violation were to be nonpunishable if it did come up for decision until after the law had expired. Toward the end of the time period, people could violate the law without any risk, since they could rely on the fact that the case would not be tried until after the time had run. It has been discussed whether it can really be said that there has been any change whatsoever in the penal legislation in such cases. It can be argued that there is no change in the legislation at all, but that the act according to its own terms affects only those offenses which are committed before a certain date. The situation is similar to the one we have when a conservation act, for example, provides that hunting is forbidden during a certain time of the year. In any event, it is assumed in practice that a temporary law must generally be interpreted so that it is applied to all violations which occur within the time limits, and that the offense shall not be exempt from punishment merely because the case first reaches court after the time period has run. This interpretation takes precedence over the general provision in Penal Code, § 3 (Rt. 1926, p. 501; Rt. 1920, p. 486).

There may be a question as to whether the same principle of interpretation should apply to all laws which define themselves as temporary or which are clearly based on temporary conditions, even though they mention no special time limit. Here also, the termination of the applicability of the law is due to a change of conditions, not a change of the legislature's viewpoint. And it can be said that the difference between enactments with a fixed time-limit for their applicability and other temporary enactments is of a rather formal character. It is often a matter of accident whether a time limit is fixed by the law. Time-limited laws, on the other hand, are often legislatively extended before they expire, if the extraordinary conditions which motivated them continue to exist.

However, a significant difference nevertheless remains. It is only when the time-limit is fixed that the offender can calculate when the law will be ineffective. The courts have not been willing to accept as a general rule that Penal Code, § 3, is inapplicable to penal provisions which are due to exceptional temporary conditions. See the decision in Rt. 1920, p. 486, quoted below.

Distinction between penal provision and norm of conduct—Practice, on the other hand, has laid down the basis for another limitation which often leads to the same result. In the leading case, in Rt. 1920, p. 486, the rule is formulated that Penal Code, § 3, does not apply to "such provisions, which can have indirect significance for the applicability of a penal provision, but which cannot themselves be said to be of penal nature." In other words, a distinction is made between the penal provisions proper and the norms of conduct which are sanctioned by the penal provisions. Only changes within the first area fall within Penal Code, § 3. As far as the norm of conduct is concerned, the law at the time of action is always applicable.

Blanket penal provisions—The rule has its most important area of application with respect to the blanket penal provisions which confine themselves to providing punishment for violation of regulations promulgated by some public authority to whom the power to make such regulations has been duly delegated within a specific area (see above, § 3, II). By established practice, it is assumed here that only changes in the penal provision itself fall under Penal Code, § 3, and not changes in those regulations which fill out the penal provision. Typical examples are changes in price and rationing provisions. As long as the statute itself with its threat of punishment remains unchanged, it does not benefit the accused that the regulations are changed before trial, so that the act now would be non-punishable.

Rt. 1920, p. 486: An enactment of May 14, 1917, dealing with provisions to secure the country's supply of food and other goods, gave the King, in § 1, the power to introduce rationing ordinances, and in § 8, imposed punishment on one who intentionally or negligently violates regulations made pursuant to the statute. The defendants, in the fall of 1918, had sold ninety-five kilos of coffee without rationing coupons or permit. But before this case came to trial, the rationing of coffee was terminated. The accused were nevertheless found guilty by the City Court and their appeal was unanimously rejected by the Supreme Court. The Attorney-General argued that Penal Code, § 3, did not apply to penal provisions which exist because of exceptional temporary conditions, and which at the outset are meant to last no longer than necessity demands. The Supreme Court Justice who voted first, and with whom the other Justices concurred, did not agree with this: "To consider the courts competent to make a discretionary evaluation, in each individual case, of these conditions and, according to the circumstances, attach relevance to the abolition in certain cases and not in others, in relation to prior violations, would in my opinion lead to a very unfortunate uncertainty and arbitrariness in law enforcement and would also be in direct conflict with the legal provision as it is worded." But he held that Penal Code, § 3, could not be applied since it spoke only about changes in the penal law and the penal provisions in force. "And it seems to me that it would be an extremely unnatural construction that provisions which increase or lower a maximum price or change the quantity which can be sold for a rationing coupon, or which make changes in the tariff duty, could be termed penal provisions."

Rt. 1933, p. 1001: According to the Salmon Fishery Act of Feb. 27, 1930, no salmon fishery equipment may be used or left standing so that fish can be caught or their movement interrupted from Friday at 6:00 p.m. to Monday at 6:00 p.m. More detailed provisions as to permissible methods of closing the nets may be given by the King. § 37 of the law provides punishment for violations of the law or of provisions made under authority of the law. The accused had closed his nets in a manner which was in fact effective, but which was not permitted according to the provisions in force at the time. Before the case came up for decision, however, the closing rules had been changed, making the method which he had used permissible. He was nevertheless found guilty, since the change in the closing rules could not be regarded as a penal provision according to Penal Code, § 3. There were two dissenting opinions.

Rt. 1938, p. 367: According to the Act of July 14, 1894, dealing with measures against contagious diseases among domestic animals, the Ministery of Agriculture can decree measures which are necessary to prevent contagion. Violation of these rules are punishable under § 27 of the Act. During an epidemic of splenic fever, the Ministry had provided that dogs were to be leashed or kept indoors. A dog owner had violated the regulation, but before his case came up for decision, the epidemic was over and the prohibition cancelled. Referring to established practice, the Supreme Court unanimously held that this could not justify an acquittal.

See also Rt. 1938, pp. 866 and 922 (the traffic rules, which are decreed by the King by authority of the Highway Traffic Act, are not penal provisions in relation to Penal Code, § 3); Rt. 1950, pp. 557, 715 and 924; Rt. 1953, p. 1206 (the same is true with respect to price regulations.)

The distinction between penal provision and norm is also used as the basis outside of the area of delegated legislation. It often happens that an Act first contains a number of prohibitions and orders and then a general provision which provides punishment for one who violates the rules. In practice, it is presumed that a change in the prohibitions and orders is not a change in a penal provision and thus does not fall within Penal Code, § 3.

Rt. 1930, p. 903: The owner of a seine was charged with failure to sign up his crew as members of the compulsory health insurance plan, as required by the rules which were then in force. Before the case came to trial, the law was changed exempting such cases from compulsory insurance. This, however, did not prevent punishment, "since the amendment of 1928 did not actually contain any change with respect to the penal provisions of the law here considered."

As the practice has developed, it can be said that outside the Penal Code itself, it is almost an exception that new provisions are applied to the benefit of the offender. As a rule this happens only when the entire statute is repealed or the punishment is changed, but not in the very common instance where the changes relate to the description of the acts to which the threat of punishment pertains. It cannot be regarded as certain, however, that the courts will disregard changes in the norms of conduct when they have a more permanent and general character. The Price Act of June 26, 1953, § 18 states: "It is forbidden to accept, demand or agree to prices which are unreasonable." The penal threat is found in § 52, which generally directs itself against those who breach provisions which are fixed in the law or promulgated under its authority. Assume that the provision in § 18 against unreasonable prices is repealed. If the penal threat had been inserted in the same provision the repeal of § 18 would have affected earlier violations, and it does not seem reasonable that the result should be different because the authority for punishment is found in a general provision. The relationship between norm and penal provision is the same, e.g., in the Motor Vehicle Act, which has a prohibition against drunken driving in § 17, and a threat of punishment in § 29.

I have been referring to the legislation outside the Penal Code where the question of the effect of new laws is most practical. The consequence of the established practice must undoubtedly be that the distinction between penal provision and norm must also apply with respect to those provisions of regulatory character in the Penal Code itself which refer to rules of conduct contained in other laws or in regulations made by public authorities (see, for example, Penal Code, §§ 334, 339, 352 et seq.). Whether the same can be presumed with respect to violations of other types will have to remain an unsolved question. An example is the provision in Penal Code, § 220, which makes it a crime to enter into a marriage which is void due to previous marriage, consanguinity or relationship by marriage. How far the marriage prohibition extends is shown by the act dealing with the consummation and dissolution of marriages, of May 31, 1918, §§ 7 and 8. Suppose that a previously divorced man has married his divorced wife's daughter, in violation of § 8. He is accused under Penal Code, § 220, but before the case comes to trial, the prohibition in § 8 of the Marriage Act is repealed. The penal provision in Penal Code, § 220, remains unchanged. If one applies the principles which practice has established with respect to penal provisions outside the Penal Code, the change should not benefit the accused.[6] But this is hardly reasonable, since the change in the law in this instance signifies a changed evaluation by the legislature. If Penal Code, § 220, instead of referring to the marital law, had itself contained the definition of the prohibited relationship, it is clear that there would have been an amendment of the penal provision. The choice of formulation depends on reasons of convenience which should not have any bearing on the decision.

The solution which the courts have chosen can be criticized both from a theoretical and practical point of view. Skeie[7] has strongly held that it is untenable to limit the concept "penal provision" as it is done in legal practice. A complete penal provision consists of a threat of punishment and a description of the acts which fall under it. The two together make up the penal provision. It can be arranged editorially in many ways. The threat of punishment and the norm can be combined in one and the same provision. Or the threat of punishment can be combined in one section, and the norm in another, or even in another law. The threat of punishment may also be in a status whereas the norm is found in regulations promulgated by public authorities. Whatever may be the legal technique, both parts are needed to make up a complete penal provision. Whether the amendment concerns the penal threat itself or the description of the acts to which it applies, there is in fact an amendment of a penal provision.

[7] Skeie, Den norske strafferett, I, pp. 69–70 (2nd ed., Oslo, 1946).

The interpretation of Penal Code, § 3, making it applicable only to the penal threat, leads to a result whereby similar questions are determined differently, dependent on which legal technique is used. The real considerations, however, are the same whether one or the other form is used.

Skeie comes to the conclusion that both a change in the threat of punishment and in the description of the act should be applied in favor of the offender. Strong practical objections, however, can be raised against this point of view. For example, if one thinks of an area such as the price and rationing legislation, where the various provisions change rapidly, it is naturally important from a legislative point of view to create respect for the rules as they are at any time, and it would be very unfortunate if breaches were to go unpunished merely because the provision in question was amended before the case went to trial. When the law itself is changed, the legislature can say explicitly whether or not older breaches are to be affected by the new law. But when only regulations promulgated by public authorities, under authority of the statute, are involved, this solution is precluded because the new regulations cannot disregard the legislative enactment in Penal Code, § 3. In favor of the distinction presently recognized by practice, it can be said that it leads to reasonable results in the most important practical situations, and it is flexible enough so that policy considerations can influence the determination.

The rational solution should probably be for the law to give the court free discretion to determine whether new and (for the accused) more favorable provisions should be applied, without binding the decision to a fictitious distinction between penal and non-penal provisions.

V. The rules on prosecution

The rules on prosecution, as mentioned before, are considered penal provisions with respect to Penal Code, § 3. It follows that the rule most favorable to the accused must be applied. If a new law has been enacted which requires that the victim request public prosecution, the public prosecutor cannot proceed with the case if such a request is lacking. In the reverse case, where a request for prosecution is needed under the old law, but not under the new one, the result will be the same and the public prosecutor cannot proceed with the case without such a request.

There are two exceptions to the rule, both of which are unfavorable to the accused:

1. If legal proceedings have been lawfully initiated, it follows from Penal Code, § 3, para. 3, that a subsequent law which makes the prosecution dependent upon the request of the victim, or which restricts prosecution to private action, shall not apply to the case. The lawfully commenced prosecution can thus continue.

2. Out of consideration for the victim, Penal Code, § 3, para. 4, provides: "The time limiting the victim's initiation of legal action, or request for prosecution, shall in no case be computed until the law determining it has come into force." Suppose that the period of limitation in Penal Code, § 80, for a request for public prosecution, or the commencement of a private prosecution has been shortened from six to three months. The new provision is more favorable to the offender than the old and should thus be applied, but with the limitation which is provided for in Penal Code, § 3, para. 4. If two months have passed when the new law comes into effect, the victim will nevertheless have three months within which to commence action. If four months have passed, the new law will have no effect whatever. According to the old law he would have two months left, but it is obviously not the purpose of Penal Code, § 3, para. 4, to create a situation whereby the victim will have more time than before.

VI. The rules on limitation

The rules on limitation are also penal provisions and thus the mildest rule must be applied. But if prosecution has been lawfully initiated according to the old law, the prosecution can continue even though there is now a new law which shortens the period of limitation (Penal Code, § 3, para. 3.). The law provides a similar rule with respect to limitation on execution of sentences if execution has been lawfully commenced.

VII. Amendments after sentence

If the amendment is introduced after the sentence has been passed by the trial court, but before the case has been heard on appeal, the provision in Penal Code, § 3, para. 2, comes into effect. The rule will be different according to the type of legal remedy used against the judgment.

The law does not take into consideration an amendment passed after final judgment. The comments to the draft code indicate that in such a case unjustified hardship will have to be avoided through pardoning (S.K.M., p. 9). The same applies when, according to the rules in Penal Code, § 3, para. 3, it is impossible to take into consideration a new and milder law which has come into effect subsequent to the judgment in the lower court, but before the case is finally determined. See, for example, Rt. 1929, p. 571.

VIII. When is the act deemed committed?

There may occasionally be doubts about when an act is to be deemed committed.[8]

If the amendment tends to favor the defendant, the doubts are of no importance. The new and milder law shall then be applied in all cases. If the new law is stricter than the old, however, the question will be significant, since only acts which have been committed after the new law has come into effect are affected by the aggravation.

The starting point is that the commission of the act itself is decisive. Here, we cannot analogously use the principle in Penal Code, § 12, last paragraph and § 69, para. 2, attaching relevance to the occurrence of the effect of the criminal act.

A continous offense which occurs partly before and partly after the amendment must be treated partly according to the old law and partly according to the new law. The same holds true if several acts, some of which take place before and some after the new and stricter law, are all judged in the same proceeding. Difficult questions may arise here. (See Rt. 1947, p. 25.)

If the offense consists of an omission, it must be considered as continuing as long as the legal duty remains (see above, § 37, III). In other words, if the duty has not ceased by the time the new and strict law comes into effect, the new law can be applied.

SWITZERLAND

The Swiss Criminal Code of December 21, 1937,[1] as amended on October 5, 1950,[2] regulates, in Sections Three to Six, its territorial applicability. It is the territoriality principle which is the basic point of contact between a criminal case and the applicability of the Swiss Criminal Code (Sec. 3). The exception to this principle is the provision of Section Four which is based on the so-called protective principle. It applies to criminal cases against the security of the state committed abroad no matter by whom. And finally the third point of contact is the personality principle which claims Swiss jurisdiction when a crime or an offense against a Swiss national is committed abroad (Sec. 5).[3] A translation of the above-mentioned Sections follows:

Sec. 3. 1. The present Law shall apply to anyone who commits a crime or an offense in Switzerland.

If the offender served a sentence for his act fully or partially abroad, then the Swiss judge shall take the served punishment into account.

2. If a foreigner was prosecuted abroad on the request of a Swiss authority, he shall not be punished further for the same act in Switzerland: if the foreign court finally acquitted him; if the penalty to which he was sentenced abroad was carried out, remitted or barred by the statute of limitations.

If the offender did not serve the sentence abroad at all, or only partially, then the penalty, or the remainder, shall be carried out in Switzerland.

Sec. 4. The present Law shall also apply to anyone who commits abroad a crime or an offense against the state (Secs. 265, 266, 266bis, 267, 268, 270, 271, 275, 275bis, 275ter), carries on an illegal intelligence service (Secs. 272 to 274), or interferes with military security (Secs. 276 and 277).

If the offender served the penalty for his act fully or partially abroad, then the Swiss judge shall take the served penalty into account.

Sec. 5. Whoever commits a crime or an offense abroad against a Swiss national and the act is also punishable in the place of perpetration, Swiss law shall apply, provided, however, that he is found in Switzerland and not extradited aboard, or if he was extradited for this act to the Federation. If the law of the place of perpetration is more lenient, then this shall be applied.

The offender shall not be punished further for a crime or an offense if the punishment for which he was sentenced abroad was carried out, remitted or barred by the statute of limitations.

If the penalty was not served abroad at all, or only partially, then the penalty or the remainder of it shall be carried out in Switzerland.

Sec. 6. The present Law shall apply to a Swiss national who commits a crime or an offense abroad for which Swiss law permits extradition provided that the act is also punishable in the place of perpetration and the person is found in Switzerland or is extradited to the Federation for this act. If the law of the place of perpetration is more lenient, then this shall be applied.

2. The offender shall not be punished further in Switzerland: if he was finally acquitted abroad for his crime or offense; if the punishment for which he was sentenced abroad was carried out, remitted, or barred by the statute of limitations.

If the punishment abroad was only partially carried out, then the served part shall be taken into account.

I. Pertinent Provisions

In the Soviet Union, the personality principle and the universality principle (universal repression principle) are the main principles upon which the applicability of Soviet criminal law[1] to crimes committed outside the boundaries of the Soviet Union is based. The former makes criminal law applicable to Soviet citizens and stateless persons, the latter, to aliens. The relevant provisions are contained in Section 5 of the Fundamental Principles of Criminal Legislation of the USSR and Union Republics (Osnovy ugolovnogo zakonodatel'stva Soiuza SSR i soiuznykh respublik) which reads as follows:[2]

> Sec. 5. Applicability of the Criminal Laws of the USSR and the Union Republics to Acts Committed Outside the Boundaries of the USSR
> Citizens of the USSR who commit crimes abroad shall be subject to criminal responsibility according to the laws in force in a union republic on the territory of which criminal proceedings are insitituted against them or they are arraigned before the court.
> Persons without citizenship who are situated in the USSR and who have committed a crime outside the boundaries of the USSR shall be responsible on the same basis.
> If the persons specied in the preceding paragraphs have been punished abroad for the crimes committed by them, the court may accordingly mitigate the punishment or completely relieve the guilty person from serving the punishment.
> Aliens who have committed crimes outside the boundaries of the USSR shall be subject to responsibility according to the Soviet criminal laws in instances provided for by international agreements.

These provisions have been incorporated into the criminal codes of all the union republics. For the purpose of this report, the relevant section of the [1] Soviet criminal legislation consists of the Fundamental Principles of Criminal Legislation which defines the principles and general provisions of criminal law, federal (obshchesoiuznye) criminal laws defining crimes against the state, milltary crimes, and if necessary, other crimes against the interests of the Soviet Union, and the criminal codes of the union republics.

Criminal Code of the Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic of 1960 is quoted below:[3]

> Art. 5. Operation of the present Code with respect to acts committed outside boundaries of USSR. Citizens of the USSR who commit crimes abroad shall be subject to responsibility in accordance with the present Code if criminal proceedings are instituted against them or they are brought to trial on the territory of the RSFSR.
> Persons without citizenship who are situated in the RSFSR and who have committed crimes beyond the boundaries of the USSR shall bear responsibility on the same basis.
> If the persons specified in paragraphs one and two of the present article have undergone punishment abroad for the crimes committed by them, a court may accordingly mitigate the assigned punishment or may completely relieve the guilty person from serving the punishment.
> For crimes committed by them outside the boundaries of the USSR, foreigners shall be subject to responsibility in accordance with Soviet criminal laws in instances provided for by international agreements.

II. Comments and Interpretation

A. Soviet citizens and stateless persons.[4]

One of the leading authorities on criminal law, N. D. Durmanov, points out that a Soviet citizen and a stateless person:[5]

> . . . is subject to criminal responsibility before the Soviet court according to Soviet criminal law irrespective of the place where he committed an act considered a punishable crime by Soviet law.
> Section 5, paragraph 1 of the Fundamental Principles has in mind, of course, acts considered crimes by Soviet law. It is of no importance whether these acts are considered crimes by the state where they were committed.

B. Aliens.

According to the interpretation of Section 5, paragraph 4, of the Fundamental Principles prevailing in the Soviet Union, Soviet criminal law has no external application except when international treaties provide for the punishment of aliens for crimes committed abroad.[6] Such a view is expressed by M. I. Kovalev who states:[7]

> Aliens who commit crimes outside the boundaries of the USSR are subject to criminal responsibility only in the cases provided for by international agreements.

However, it should be pointed out that the provisions of Section 5, paragraph 4, do not make an alien immune from prosecution in the Soviet Union for other acts committed abroad which are punishable under Soviet criminal laws but not punishable under foreign law.

According to the Soviet doctrine formulated in one of the commentaries:[8]

> . . . a crime is deemed to be committed on the territory of the USSR if the criminal result occurs within the boundaries of the USSR. Therefore, aliens who commit an act whose criminal result occurs within the boundaries of the USSR may bear criminal responsibility under the Criminal Code of the RSFSR if the criminal result occurs in the territory of the RSFSR or under the criminal codes of the other union republics if the criminal result occurs in their territory.

[8] Id.

This doctrine is, in the first place, applicable to crimes against the Soviet Union. An authority on Soviet criminal law states: [9]

> An act which was begun outside the boundaries of the USSR but completed (the result has occurred or should have occurred) on our territory, is considered [an act] directed against the USSR and committed on the territory of the USSR. Thus, for instance, the planting of a delayed action bomb intended to go off on our territory should be considered a crime against the USSR.

Confirmation of this doctrine may be found in the decision of the Military Division of the Supreme Court of the USSR of May 19, 1960, which convicted Francis G. Powers, a pilot of the U–2 plane, of espionage for which preparations had been made outside the boundaries of the USSR.[10] Powers was tried and convicted of espionage on the basis of Section 2 of the Law on Crimes Against the State of December 25, 1958, which reads as follows: [11]

> The transfer or stealing or obtainment for the purpose of transfer to a foreign state, a foreign organization or its intelligence service, of information constituting a state or military secret, as well as the transfer or obtainment on assignment from a foreign intelligence service of any other information to be used to the detriment of the USSR, if the espionage is committed by an alien or a stateless person, shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for from 7 to 15 years with confiscation of property and with or without exile for a term of 2 to 5 years, or by death with confiscation of property.

Other crimes against the state are treason, terrorist acts, diversion, sabotage, anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda, smuggling, currency violations, disclosure of state secrets, and others.

The Law of December 25, 1958, makes these federal crimes but since its provisions were incorporated in the criminal codes of the union republics, they are also republican offenses.

YUGOSLAVIA

The Criminal Code of March 2, 1951, as amended, is in force in Yugoslavia.[1] The Code has adopted the principle of its extraterritorial applicability. Thus it provides for the prosecution of specified crimes committed abroad (Section 92), all crimes against the State, crimes committed by Yugoslav citizens abroad (Section 93), and, finally, crimes against Yugoslavia or her citizens committed by foreigners abroad (Section 94).

An English translation of the Code is found in the Collection of Yugoslav Laws, and the above-mentioned provisions read as follows: [2]

> Applicability of criminal law to anybody who commits specific criminal offences abroad
> Art. 92. The present Code is applicable to anybody who commits outside the Yugoslav territory any of the criminal offenses provided by this Code in articles 100 to 112, 114 to 118, 120, 121 and in article 221 insofar as the deed relates to domestic currency.
> Applicability of criminal law to Yugoslav citizens for criminal offences committed abroad
> Art. 93. Yugoslav criminal law shall also apply to a citizen of Yugoslavia when he commits abroad a criminal offence other than the criminal offences enumerated in article 92 of the present Code, provided he is found on Yugoslav territory or has been extradited.

Applicability of criminal law to foreigners for criminal offences committed abroad

Art. 94. (1) Yugoslav criminal law shall be applicable to a foreigner who has committed outside the Yugoslav territory a criminal offence against her or her citizen, if this offence is threatened at least by the punishment of imprisonment and does not belong to the group of offences specified in article 92 of the present Code, provided the foreigner is found on Yugoslav territory or has been extradited.

(2) Yugoslav criminal law shall also be applicable to a foreigner who has committed abroad a criminal offence against a foreign state or another foreigner for which a punishment of five year's strict imprisonment or a heavier penalty may be imposed under this law (refers to Yugoslav law), provided the perpetrator is found on Yugoslav territory and is not extradited to a foreign state. In such a case the court may not inflict a heavier punishment than the one provided by the law of the country of the place of commission.

FOREIGN CRIMINAL LAWS COMPARED WITH THE PROPOSED FEDERAL CRIMINAL CODE

(By Members of the Staff of the Law Library, Library of Congress, March 1972)

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES,
Washington, D.C., January 26, 1972.

Mr. CARLETON W. KENYON,
Law Librarian,
Library of Congress,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. KENYON: The Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures of the Senate Judiciary Committee is considering a proposed total revision and reform of Title 18 (Crimes and Criminal Procedure) of the United States Code. The "work basis" for the Subcommittee's effort is the Federal Criminal Code prepared by the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws. The Code is contained in Part I of the Subcommittee's hearings, a copy of which is enclosed. Additional copies may be obtained from the Subcommittee on request.

Since the Federal government has never had a penal code, only an aggregation of loosely joined statutes supplemented by court decisions and common-law doctrines, the proposed codification and revision would represent an enormous development in American criminal jurisprudence.

Because continental Europeans have hundreds of years of experience in drafting, construing and applying criminal codes, the Subcommittee wishes to draw upon the law, practice, theory and experience of the nations of Europe, as it evaluates and formulates a penal code for the government of the United States.

This letter details a number of questions, and areas in which information of a comparative nature is desired. Please do not feel restricted by this list; if any of your European lawyers, specialists and staff think of other subjects or alternatives that may be of interest and useful in the Federal code, I hope they will include such material in the work furnished to the Subcommittee.

In response to the various questions, except where obviously inapplicable, please gather the text, in English translation, of (a) relevant European Code sections or portions of sections; (b) relevant chapters, pages or sentences in Code Commentaries; (c) additional bibliography or citations. We are searching for ideas and possibilities for the Federal Criminal Code, rather than for a comprehensive survey of European criminal law. On this basis a Norwegian Code section is as valuable as a French Code section even though it comes from a much smaller nation. The Subcommittee is particularly interested in the 1969 German Criminal Code (eff. 1973) because it is the newest of the continental codes.

We should like information on the following points:

[3] Nikola Srzentic, Krivicno Pravo. Sarajevo, 1968 p. 31–33 (Criminal Law); Milos Radovanovic, Krivicno Pravo SFRJ. Beograd, 1969. p. 147–151 (Criminal Law of the SFRY).

1. The National Commission, following the lead of the American Law Institute in its Model Penal Code (1962), has proposed what is primarily a code of substantive criminal law. The proposed Code is divided into three Parts—Part A, General Provisions; Part B, Specific Offenses; Part C, Sentencing.

Is such a tripartite division followed in the European codes? How are European codes structured?

2. The proposed code contains 350 sections (Part A: 73; Part B: 238; Part C: 39) but the numbering system runs from Section 101 to Section 3601.

Is it customary in European Codes to leave so many blank numbers for future statutes? What is the usual numbering system?

3. The proposed Code defines the various "intent" requirements or the mental elements necessary for criminal conduct in §302(1). The Code would establish four different kinds of culpability: intentionally, knowingly, recklessly and negligently.

How do the continental Codes regard and use the element of the defendant's state of mind? Is it used to determine guilt or innocence? Degree of guilt? Sentence? How do the kinds of culpability proposed in the draft code compare with European provisions? (See 3 W.P. 1455).

4. The proposed Federal Criminal Code includes a section (§305) which defines the causation requirement or causal connection which must be proved between the defendant's conduct and the result.

How is causation handled by the continental codes? (See 3 W.P. 1456).

5. The Draft proposes that mental disease or defect at the time of the criminal conduct be a defense and defines that defense in proposed §503.

Is there an insanity defense to criminal charges under European Codes? How do the European provisions compare with that of the Draft Code? Do any continental codes provide that the insane defendant may be found guilty, but that upon conviction he must be accorded medical rather than penological treatment? How do the European Codes handle the procedural aspects of the insanity defense: is there provision whereby the Judge selects a psychiatrist to examine the defendant or do both the government and the defense lawyers bring in their own medical witnesses? Is there provision whereby the defendant found not guilty by reason of insanity is automatically committed to a mental institution for observation and treatment?

6. Although the defendant who "lacks substantial capacity to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law" because of mental illness has a defense under §503, the defendant who is similarly situated because of alcohol, or drug intoxication has no defense under §502 (except in limited situations).

How do European Codes handle the problem of the defendant who is intoxicated? Is he given a defense to criminal liability? Is he handled differently upon sentencing? (i.e. sent to a hospital rather than prison?) If European law is similar to American, how do theorists defend different treatment, for example, for the alcoholic and the mentally-ill person?

7. The Draft Code contains a rather elaborate and detailed group of sections on self-defense and use of force, etc. (§603—Self-Defense: §604—Defense of Others: §605—Use of Force by Persons with Parental, Custodial or Similar Responsibilities: §606—Use of Force in Defense of Premises and Property; §607—Limits on the Use of oFrce; Excessive Force; Deadly Force.)

How do these detailed rules compare with the equivalent provisions in European codes? Do the European Codes enunciate specific rules or set general standards? (See 3 W.P. 1460).

8. Near the end of the Code proposal, in §3002, the system of classification of offenses is set forth. There are six categories: Class A, Class B and Class C Felonies, Class A and Class B Misdemeanors and Infractions. This is a system of classification for purposes of sentencing.

How and for what purposes do European codes classify offenses? (See 3 W.P. 1462–1464).

9. How do European Code provisions on sentencing of convicted defendants compare with the sections in Part C of the proposed Federal Code? Do European Code sections on suspension of sentences provide for suspension of imposition of sentence and/or suspension of execution of sentence? Do the continental codes provide for a sentence of probation or is probation a form of suspension of sentence? Is a person so released under supervision by probation officers, police officers or no one? Do the European Codes provide for indeterminate or de-terminate sentences of imprisonment? Are there special extended term prison-sentence provisions for dangerous special offenders similar to §3207? How do the authorized prison sentences for a representative group of crimes compare with the authorized prison sentences for the same offenses under European codes? Are there mandatory minimum prison sentences under the continental codes? If the European nations employ systems of release on parole, how do they compare with the provisions in Chapter 34 of the Draft? Are prisoners released on parole by an administrative agency such as the United States parole board or by the Court? Does European law have any equivalent to proposed §3007 under which an organization convicted of an offense may be required to give notice or appropriate publicity to the conviction? Is giving publicity to a conviction (a different colored license plate for persons convicted of drunken driving, for example) used as a sanction or sentence under European Codes? Do the European Codes have any equivalent to proposed §3003 (Persistent Misdemeanant)? Do European Codes require Judges to give reasons in writing for sentences imposed? Are sentences subject to review on appeal by a higher court? If so, may the appellate court raise as well as lower the sentence? May the government appeal a sentence or only the defendant? What standards do the Codes require for sentencing review? If appellate review of sentences is not authorized under European penal or criminal procedure codes, how is uniformity of sentencing amongst the judges secured? How does §3204 (Concurrent and Consecutive Terms of Imprisonment) compare with European code provisions on multiple offenses? According to Professor Andenaes some European codes provide for a joint sentence rather than concurrent or consecutive sentences (3 W. P. 1473; also 1484–1485). How are terms computed under joint sentencing provisions? Under a "joint sentence", what happens if one but not all of the convictions is reversed on appeal? Regarding the imposition of fines, do any European codes have provisions similar to §3301 (2)? In the United States many imposed fines are never collected and therefore of limited value either as a punishment or deterrent to others; how do the European codes provide for collection of fines? What is the "day fine" system and how are provisions regarding it formulated? Is the day fine a fixed amount depending upon the gravity of the offense of which the defendant is convicted or is the amount fixed based upon the ability of the defendant to pay?

10. Is mistake of law a defense under European codes? Mistake of fact? How do continental provisions compare with §§303, 304, 609? (See 3 W. P. 1460–1461, 1488–1491).

11. One significant change in the proposed Code from present federal criminal law is the separation of the jurisdictional base upon which federal prosecution rests from the definition of the offense as to which the defendant is prosecuted. Are there analogues to this differentiation between crime and jurisdiction in any of the European codes? (See 3 W.P. 1478)

12. How do the Draft Code's provisions on extraterritorial jurisdiction (§208) compare with the European provisions on extraterritoriality and jurisdiction over crimes committed outside national boundaries? (See 3 W.P. 1478–79)

13. How is the problem of criminal conspiracy handled under European codes? (See §1004)

14. How do European codes handle the problem of "felony-murder" (murder committed by one party to a felony)? (See §601[c])

15. In those European nations which have a federal system (e.g. West Germany, Switzerland) does the Federal government have concurrent or exclusive jurisdiction over riots, mass demonstrations and crimes or is jurisdiction limited in a way similar to proposed §1801(4)? How do the Code provisions in this area (§1801—Inciting Riot; §1802—Arming Rioters; §1803—Engaging in a Riot; §1804—Disobedience of Public Safety Orders under Riot Conditions) compare with European code sections dealing with similar problems? (See 3 W.P. 1505)

16. Do any of the European codes have a section similar to §1104 (Para-Military Activities)?

17. A number of sections and subchapters of the proposed code deal with an area which is often referred to as "crimes without victims"; i.e. crimes in which the victim either consents or is a willing customer of the defendant. See, e.g., §§1821–1829 (drugs), §§1831–1832 (gambling), §§1841–1849 (prostitution), §1851 (obscenity), and homosexual activity between consenting adults. How do the European codes approach these problems?

18. How do European code provisions on firearms and explosives compare with §§1811 to 1814 and the Commission's controversial recommendation in the introductory note to the subchapter?

19. Which European jurisdictions provide for capital punishment? For which offenses? Do any European codes provide for a separate proceeding to determine sentence in a capital case? (See §3602). Are separate hearings on sentencing authorized in any cases or does the absence of a jury system on the continent make separate hearings not bound by restrictive rules of evidence superfluous?

20. How do the codes' provisions on multiple prosecutions and trials (§703—Prosecution for Multiple Related Offenses; §704—When Prosecution Barred by Former Prosecution for Different Offense; §706—Prosecutions Under Other Federal Codes; §707—Former Prosecution in Another Jurisdiction: When a Bar; §708—Subsequent Prosecution by a Local Government: When Barred; §709—When Former Prosecution is Invalid or Fraudulently Procured) compare with the relevant sections of European codes? (See 3 W.P. 1494–1496).

In addition, please furnish us with a list of the names and approximate addresses of the major criminal-law scholars in Europe so that we may, if our resources permit, contact them directly to solicit their evaluations of the Code proposed by the National Commission. Two such experts, Professor Johannes Andenaes of the University of Oslo and Mirjan Damaska of the University of Zagreb, prepared comparative studies which are published in Volume III of the Working Papers of the Commission. Copies of the Working Papers can be obtained from the House Judiciary Committee.

It would be helpful if as much material as possible could be made available to the Subcommittee no later than March 17, so that at least some of it may be inserted into the hearings of the Subcommittee, now planned for the end of that month, and made available to the American academic and legal communities interested in criminal law.

If you have any questions in reference to this request, please contact Mr. G. Robert Blakey, the Chief Counsel to the Subcommittee at 225-3281.

With kindest regards, I am

Sincerely yours,

JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman.

GENTLEMEN: On January 26, 1972, the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures submitted an extensive question letter to the Law Librarian of the Library of Congress requesting the assistance of the European Law Division in researching useful continental precedents for the pending total revision, codification and reform of Title 18 of the United States Code (Crimes and Criminal Procedure). On February 3, 1972, the Subcommittee sent a slightly modified questionnaire to 250 Professors of comparative law throughout the country. On February 14, Dr. Hsia of the Far Eastern Law Division suggested that the questions should also be sent to the Far Eastern, Near Eastern and Hispanic Law Divisions of the Library of Congress because the European Criminal Codes were adopted and adapted rather than copied by non-European states which adopted the code approach. Accordingly, please find attached a copy of the questions which the Subcommittee has prepared.

Please do not feel restricted by this list. If any of your lawyers, specialists and staff think of other subjects or alternatives that may be of interest and useful in a United States Federal Criminal Code, I hope such material will be included in the work furnished to the Subcommittee.

In response to the various questions, except where obviously inapplicable, please gather the text, in English translation, of (a) relevant Code sections or portions of sections; (b) relevant chapters, pages or sentences in Code Commentaries; (c) additional bibliography or citations. We are searching for ideas and possibilities for the Federal Criminal Code, rather than for a comprehensive survey of the criminal law of other areas of the world.

Since the Federal government never had a penal code, only an aggregation of loosely joined statutes supplemented by court decisions and common-law doctrines, the proposed codification and revision would represent an enormous development in American criminal jurisprudence. Your assistance in this development is appreciated.

Sincerely,

G. ROBERT BLAKEY, Chief Counsel.

ARGENTINA

INTRODUCTION

The old penal code of Argentina, enacted pursuant to the provisions of Law 1920 of November 7, 1886, in force as of March 1, 1887, was repealed by the new code enacted by Law 11179 of 1921, in force as of April 29, 1922.

Almost after the enactment of the Code of 1886, a movement to amend it began. A new draft was prepared in 1891 which included a definition of all the violations of the law, regardless of the court which should try the case, making it, therefore, common to all the Republic. This reform was not adopted. A new draft was prepared in 1916 and eventually was approved in 1921, becoming Law 11179.

The Code of 1921 was soon the object of severe criticism, mainly because in that year, there appeared the draft prepared by the famous Italian penalist Enrico Ferri and soon afterwards, between the years 1923 and 1925, the ideas of the brilliant Spanish penalist Luis Jiménez de Asúa were published. These prompted the Argentinians to prepare new drafts revising their code.

After the preparation of several drafts and amendments to the Code, Law 17567 of 1968 was finally enacted (Boletín Oficial, January 12, 1968) and enforced as of April 1, 1968. It contains substantial amendments to the penal code.

JURISDICTION OF THE PENAL CODE

In the study of Argentine criminal law, it should be taken into consideration that the country is politically organized under a federal system. The basic codes, such as the civil, commercial, criminal or penal and mining codes nevertheless are enforceable throughout the nation. This does not hold true with regard to procedural laws or codes, which, like the criminal codes, are local. With regard to substantive criminal laws, notwithstanding, certain matters, because of their subject or their jurisdiction, are subject to federal jurisdiction, as it happens when the sovereignty and security of the nation is involved or in cases where territorial waters are concerned. The provinces are empowered to create their own criminal laws in those cases where there is no conflict with federal matters.

MAIN FEATURES OF THE PENAL CODE OF 1921

The Argentine Penal Code of 1921 is divided into two parts: Book I which contains the General Part which covers the general application of criminal law, the penalties, suspended sentence, reparation of damages, criminal liability, attempt, accessoryship, recidivism, concurrence of felonies, extinction of liability and prosecution, exercise of prosecutions, functions and definitions of the terms used. Book II deals with special crimes or felonies and is divided into felonies against the person, honor, civil statutes, liberty, property, security of the nation, felonies against the government and the constitutional order, public administration and public faith.

The Code respects the legal principle, nullum crimen sine lege. It defines every offense precisely, assigns to each a corresponding sanction and seeks to grant a judge a certain margin of discretion which will permit him to apply punishments within minimum and maximum limits provided by the law. At times, it gives the judge a choice among different classes of punishments.

The punishments established by the Code are imprisonment and jailing, fine and disqualification (inhabilitación). It does not provide for capital punishment nor for forfeiture of property. Life imprisonment is a rare punishment applied in exceptional cases, such as in homicide under aggravating circumstances.

Individualization of punishment is achieved by a system of sufficiently ample minimum and maximum sentences, by parallel punishments and other dispositions, such as that of Article 41 which calls for the consideration of mitigating and aggravating circumstances, or those of Article 26 referring to parole or similarly those of Article 13 on conditional release, which looks to the rehabilitation of the convict.

Short sentences have been largely replaced by the imposition of fines for many offenses and through the use of the suspended sentence based on the moral stature of the convict. However, there is no provision for judicial grace, nor free mitigation of punishment, although Article 44 allows the judge to exempt the perpetrator from punishment in accordance with the degree of danger if the act was incapable of being harmful.

Parole is another important measure adopted by the Code in an effort to stimulate good conduct. It is not based on the executive power; it is a judicial faculty which does not exempt from punishment as a pardon would, but it subjects the person to whom it has been granted to certain obligations and rules of conduct, which in case of noncompliance would lead to revocation of the benefits. On the local level, the governors of the provinces can grant clemency.

A suspended sentence can be given only to convicts without previous criminal records and sentenced to a maximum term of two years in jail. This limitation was adopted by the Code because, for certain persons, short terms of jailing were found to have a more harmful effect than liberty on probation, for in jail the convict is likely to acquire detrimental habits.

Another peculiar advantage of the Code is its provisions for parallel punishments, which permit the judge to choose from among several punishments the one which best fits the personality of the offender. The Code also contains both punishments and security measures. Among the latter there are sanctions ranging from imprisonment for an indefinite period in the Southern territories (Art. 52) to commitment in an insane asylum in case of insanity, and protection of minors.

In order to obtain the best possible individualization of punishment, the judge, prior to sentencing, must try to obtain a conception of the perpetrator's personality, with the assistance or advice of experts, and especially by direct examination of the convict. The individualization and graduation of punishment is made obligatory by Article 41 of the Code.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CODE ADOPTED IN 1968

The amendments adopted in 1968 to Book I of the Code are the following:

(1) Under the old provision, in certain instances a conviction entailed absolute disqualification (inhabilitación absoluta). It included, among others, the loss of pension or retirement benefits. The 1968 amendment provides that the convict's relatives shall receive said pension or retirement. It also empowers the courts to assign to the victims of the criminal act and to those persons dependent upon him up to one half the amount of said retirement or pension, or in case the convict has no dependent, they may receive said amount in full, until the amount set as civil indemnity by the court is paid in full.

(2) Courts are empowered to impose limited disqualifications which entail the loss of the position, office or profession for a period of time of no less than six months nor more than ten years in the following cases:

(a) In the case of conviction for incompetence or abuse in the performance of a public office;

(b) In the case of abuse in the exercise of parental authority, adoption, guardianship or curatorship rights, and

(c) In the case of abuse or incompetence in the practice of a profession or activity for which licensing is required.

(3) Restoration of qualifications to convicts punished with the penalty of disqualification in these cases where they have properly behaved during half of the time of the service of sanction or for ten years in case of life imprisonment when the convict has made restitution as far as it was possible for him to do.

In these cases where the penalty also included disqualification to hold public office, restoration of qualifications does not entail reappointment of the convict to said office.

(4) In these cases where a crime was committed for profit, the court may add a fine to the penalty of deprivation of liberty, even though it is not provided in the Code or only provided in alternate form. In case a fine is not provided for by the Code, said fine cannot exceed the amount of 50,000 pesos.

(5) Conviction of crime entails the furfeiture of the instruments with which it was committed and the objects which the crime produced, all of which shall be sized. They shall be destroyed, except in cases where they may be used by the governments of the nation or the provinces.

(6) In the case of a first conviction where the penalty of jailing for a term not exceeding two years is applicable, the courts are empowered to suspend the sentence. This decision shall be based on the moral qualifications of the convict, the nature of the crime he committed and the circumstances surrounding the case.

In the cases of concurrence of crimes, a suspended sentence shall be applied if the penalty does not exceed the term of two years of imprisonment. Suspended sentence shall not be applicable for the penalties of fine or disqualification.

(7) It shall be considered that a suspended sentence was not pronounced upon a culprit in a case where he did not commit another crime within the term of four years.

Should he commit another crime, then he shall serve the punishment imposed in the first sentence in addition to the punishment for his second conviction.

A suspended sentence may be granted for a second time in a case where a new crime was committed eight years from the date of the first conviction.

(8) With regard to reincidence or recidivism, the 1968 amendments provide that a previous conviction shall not be taken into account to consider the convict a second offender in the cases that another term equal to the one of the served sentence has elapsed. Said term shall never exceed ten years nor be less than five yars.

(9) Reincidence or recidivism causes an increase in the penalty to one-third of its minimum or maximum periods. After the third reincidence, the minimum penalty shall be doubled but not less than one year or more than one half the term set for the maximum penalty.

In case the penalty for deprivation of liberty was served prior to the convict's reaching twenty-one years of age, his term cannot be computed, in order to calculate the term in case of aggravation of his penalty.

(10) In case several crimes punishable with divisible penalties of imprisonment or jailing concur, the highest penalty shall be applied, also taking into consideration the crimes punished with minor penalties.

In cases where some penalties are indivisible they alone shall be applied, except in the cases where life imprisonment and imprisonment for a certain term concur, in which case life imprisonment shall be applied. Disqualification to exercise certain rights and fines shall always be applied regardless of the provisions of the first paragraph.

(11) With regard to the barring of prosecution by application of the statute of limitation, the following amendments were also adopted in 1968:

(a) Crimes punishable by fine, regardless of the amount involved, were included in one provision and assigned the same prescriptive term.

(b) Said term was raised to three years.

(12) Prior to the 1968 amendment, in cases where a crime was punishable by a fine, the offense was barred from prosecution if the fine established by the Code was voluntarily paid by the offender. Due to abuses by those persons who had sufficient means, this privilege was repealed.

(13) The term for the statute of limitation to operate with regard to payment of fines was raised to three years.

(14) The application of the provisions of the statute of limitation, with regard to crimes committed by public officials while in office, is suspended for as long as said officials remain in office.

(15) The 1968 amendment authorizes private prosecution of certain crimes solely on the complaint of the victim himself: (a) Such crimes are rape, seduction, abduction and indecent assault, provided that death of the victim does not occur or that the latter did not suffer any of the injuries described by Article 91 of the Code; (b) threats; (c) minor injuries; (d) trespassing; and (e) criminal bankruptcy. Excepted, however, are those cases where public interest is involved. Or, where the victim is a minor or incapacitated without legal representation, or that he is an abandoned child. In these instances, they shall be publicly prosecuted. The same holds true in those cases where there is a conflict of interest between a minor and his legal representative.

CONCLUSION

From the above study we may conclude that the Argentine Penal Code, as amended, lies between the classical and the positive schools; therefore, we may call it an eclectic code. For some authors, like Professor Luis Jiménez de Asúa, it is placed in the neoclassical school, and for others, like Juan P. Ramos, it lies within the social defense theory.

BULGARIA

I. General Remarks

The Communist Government, established in Bulgaria after September 9, 1944, introduced a new Criminal Code on February 13, 1951, drafted along the line of Soviet doctrines in this field. This Code was entirely replaced by another on April 2, 1968,[1] which also incorporated various criminal provisions scattered throughout a number of legislative acts, in particular, the provisions dealing with military offenses and crimes against the peace and mankind as well as provisions regarding persons who deviate from socially useful labor and conduct a parasitic life. The new Code is based on the traditional principles of criminal law science and reflects the fundamentals of the Communist teachings related to this area.

The Bulgarian Code of Criminal Procedure adopted on February 5, 1952,[2] and amended several times, is still in force.

None of the above-cited major legislative acts have been translated into English and only a few decisions of the Supreme Court involving the new Criminal Code have been published.

The spokesman of the present regime in Bulgaria and indisputable authority in the field of criminal law is Professor Ivan Nenov, at the University of

There is no commentary on the new 1968 Criminal Code; the two major codes of 1951 and 1952 have been extensively analyzed and interpreted by the above-mentioned legal scholars, as follows:

II. Answers to the Questionaire

Question 1. The Criminal Code of the People's Republic of Bulgaria of April 2, 1968, is divided into two major parts:

General Part, consisting of 11 Chapters:

1. Scope and Limits of Application of the Criminal Code
2. Crime [Definition]
3. Criminally Responsible Persons
4. Penalty
5. Determination of the Penalty
6. Special Rules Regarding Juveniles
7. Release from Serving an Imposed Sentence
8. Release from Criminal Responsibility
9. Extinction of Criminal Prosecution and Criminal Penalty
10. Rehabilitation of Criminal Prosecution and Criminal Penalty
11. Compulsory Medical Measures

Special Part, comprising 14 Chapters:

1. Crimes against the People's Republic
2. Crimes against the Person
3. Crimes against Citizens' Rights
4. Crimes against Marriage, Family and Youth
5. Crimes against Socialist Property
6. Crimes against the Socialist Economy
7. Crimes against Personal Property
8. Crimes against the Activity of State Organs and Public Organizations
9. Crimes Involving Documents
10. Crimes against Order and Public Peace
11. Generally Dangerous Crimes
12. Crimes against the Defense of the People's Republic
13. Military Crimes
14. Crimes against Peace and Mankind

Question 2. The Code contains 424 Sections running from Section 1 through Section 424. The custom of leaving blank numbers in statutes is not known in Bulgarian legislative techniques and practice. In case a new section must be added to the statutes by an amendment the number of the preceding section is used with the addition of a letter; for instance, Section 275 (original), Section 275 a (additional).

Question 3. The Bulgarian Criminal Procedure Code of February 5, 1952, states that the accused is innocent until the contrary is proved (Sec. 3, par. 1). The Criminal Code of 1968 defines a crime as a socially dangerous act, committed guiltily and punishable by law (Sec. 9, par. 1.). Thus, under Bulgarian substantive criminal law, one of the basic elements of a crime is guilt (vina) in its two forms: intent (umisŭl) and negligence (nepredpazlivost). The intent could be dolus directus or dolus eventualis. The Code itself does not provide definitions of these terms. In analyzing the various elements of crimes Professor Ivan Nenov describes guilt as "a concrete mental relationship between the perpetrator and the socially dangerous act condemned by the socialist law and its socially dangerous results [consequences]."[3] Otherwise expressed, according to Nenov, the guilt is the capacity of the perpetrator to understand the nature and importance of his act and to direct his conduct accordingly.[4]

The relevant provisions of the Code regarding guilt read as follows:

Sec. 9. (1) Crime is that socially dangerous act (commission or omission) which is committed guiltily and is declared punishable by law.

(2) [irrelevant]

Sec. 11. (1) A socially dangerous act is committed guiltily when it is [committed] intentionally or negligently.

(2) The act is [committed] intentionally when the perpetrator is aware of its socially dangerous nature, foresaw its socially dangerous results [consequences] and wanted or allowed the occurrence of these results.

(3) The act is [committed] negligently when the perpetrator did not foresee the occurrence of the socially dangerous results, but thought that they could be averted.

(4) Negligent acts shall be punished only in the cases provided by law.

(5) [irrelevant]

Question 4. The Bulgarian Criminal Code does not contain any specific provisions which define the causation requirement or casual connection to be proved between the defendant's conduct and the criminal result. However, this is expressed in the description or set of facts of each individual crime. For instance, Section 115 of the Code states that "whoever guiltily kills another [human being] shall be punished for murder," e.g., the defendant's conduct resulted in the death of another person. Professor Ivan Nenov emphasizes the point that "the casual connection between the act and the criminal result is a necessary objective element of the crime."[5] Thus, the Bulgarian criminal law doctrine in this field does not consider the problem of the casual connection between the act and the criminal result to be a juridical but a factual one. According to this doctrine the act, as an objective fact, is of interest to the law inasmuch as it leads to certain objective changes in reality, negatively affecting social relations.[6]

Question 5. In Chapter Three of the General Part of the Code entitled "Criminally Responsible Persons," Section 33 states in its first paragraph that "a person is not criminally responsible if he acts in a condition if irresponsibility (nevmenjaemost) [e.g.], when he, because of being mentally ill or permanently or temporarily mentally disturbed, is unable to comprehend the meaning and importance of the accomplished [act] or to conduct his actions." Professor Ivan Nenov summarizes the legal provisions under which guilt may be excluded in the following three situations, namely, when there is (a) a mental retardation; (b) permanent mental disturbance; and (c) temporary mental disturbance and as a result thereof, the perpetrator was in such a mental [psychic] condition that he could not comprehend the criminality of his conduct himself in conformity with the requirements of the law.[7] The second paragraph of Section 33 provides that "no penalty shall be imposed on a person who committed a crime if prior to the pronouncement of the sentence, he falls into [a state of] mental disturbance, as a result of which he cannot understand the meaning and importance of his actions or control them. Such a person shall serve [his sentence] if he recovers."

Thus, if the defendant is found insane, he is criminally irresponsible; if he is found guilty but prior to the pronouncement of the sentence becomes insane, no penalty is imposed. The trial court, as explained in a decision of the Supreme Court, is under the duty to examine the mental condition of the defendant by appointing an expertise of medical doctor-psychiatrists.[8] As a rule, the appointment of experts may be made upon the request of the interested parties in the trial or upon the initiative of the organs of the preliminary proceedings and the court.[9] However, it is within the authority of the court and the organs of the preliminary proceedings to evaluate the need of an expert in the specific case.[10] A rejection of such a request must be justified by the respective organ.[11]

In the above-described cases the Code prescribes the application of appropriate compulsory medical measures (Sec. 34), discussed in a special Chapter 14 of the General Part of the Code (Secs. 89–92). Thus, in regard to a person who has committed a socially dangerous act in a condition of irresponsibility or who fell into such a condition prior to the pronouncement of the sentence or during the time of serving the penalty, the court may (a) surrender him to his relatives if they will assume the obligation for his cure under the care of a psycho-neurologist despensary; (b) order compulsory treatment in a regular psycho-neurological institution; or (c) decree compulsory treatment in a special mental institution or in a special department of a regular mental neurological institution.

According to Section 90, the court decides what type of treatment is necessary in each individual case. Also, the court must decide after a period of six months whether the compulsory medical measures should be discontinued or changed.

In instances of compulsory medical treatment this Code does not expressly specify whether the judge should select the psychiatrist who is to examine the defendant. The Code of Criminal Procedure, however, provides that a defense counsel be appointed ex officio if the defendant himself cannot realize his rights of defense because of physical or mental deficiencies (Sec. 175, par. 2). Furthermore, the Code states that upon the recommendation of the district government attorney and on the basis of investigation and expertise the district court may, in a public hearing, order that the accused be sent to a medical institution for compulsory treatment (Sec. 124, par. 2). Another provision in Section 128 provides for the possibility that the trial be stopped if the accused, after the commission of the criminal act, falls into a disturbed state of mind, which excludes his guilt. After his recovery the trial is to be reopened; if the defendant is incurably ill, the preceedings are to be closed by the government attorney.

Question 6. As explained elsewhere [Answer to Question No. 5], under the provisions of the Bulgarian Criminal Code guilt may be excluded in the following three situations: namely, when there is (a) mental retardation; (b) permanent mental disturbance; and (c) temporary mental disturbance, and as a result thereof, the perpetrator was in such a mental condition that he could not comprehend the criminality of his conduct or conduct himself in conformity with the requirements of law.[12] The last category of temporary mental disturbance may be the result also of alcoholic or other drug intoxication, i.e., a case of a pathological alcoholic intoxication. However, the doctrine excludes "normal drinking (getting drunk) of alcohol" as a defense.[13] Thus, the Code accepts the principle that voluntary intoxication does not in itself relieve the perpetrator of criminal responsibility.

The 1968 Code contains a special provision in Section 92 which deals exclusively with the compulsory medical measures applicable to criminals suffering from alcoholism or drug intoxication.[14] According to this provision, if the crime was committed by such a person, the court may order, in addition to the penalty, also compulsory medical measures. If the imposed penalty is not a deprivation of liberty (imprisonment), the compulsory medical treatment is given in a medical institution under a special cure and labor regime. The compulsory cure of a criminal condemned to imprisonment is carried out during the serving of the penalty; but the term of compulsory cure is deducted from the term of deprivation of liberty. The court may order the continuation of this treatment even after the release of the criminal and only the court may interrupt this measure.

No provision is contained in the Code of Criminal Procedure regarding the problem of defense of an alcoholic defendant; nor are there any discussions in legal writings.

Question 7. The Bulgarian Criminal Code and doctrine distinguish two general standards or situations in which an act is considered "not socially dangerous," and consequently not punishable, namely, in the case of "self-defense" (Sec. 12) and in the case of "state of distress" (Sec. 13).

In the first instance, a person is acting in self-defense when he is trying "to protect state or public interest from an immediate illegal attack [as well as], the person or rights of the one who is defending himself or another [person]." This is excusable, however, up to certain "limits." Any act which is in excess of the use of self-defense is punishable. Again, the law excuses and does not punish any excess of self-defense if the latter was a result of "fright" or "confusion".

In interpreting Section 12 of the Code, the Supreme Court defines "fright" or "confusion" as "that mental condition of the perpetrator in which his mental disturbance is so strong that it restricted to a considerable degree his capacity to control his actions and to motivate his conduct within the limits of self-defense".[15]

The second possibility of an excusable act is when a person is acting in a state of distress, e.g., "in order to save state or public interests as well as his own or somebody else's personal or property rights from an immediate danger, which the perpetrator could not avoid in any other manner, [and] if the damage caused by the act is less significant than that of the averted [damage]". However, the law excludes the existence of a state of distress "if the avoidance itself of the danger constitutes a crime".

Question 8. The Bulgarian Criminal Code does not classify criminal acts; the only term known and used is prestŭplenie (crime, offense). Professor Ivan Nenov states that the basic "twofold or threefold division of criminal acts as practiced in bourgeois legislations has no essential importance in the Bulgarian legal system."[16]

Depending on the seriousness of the crime, however, the penalty may range from public reprimand to death. There are eleven different types of penalties, which may be imposed in combination (Sec. 37, par. 1). For the most serious crimes "which jeopardize the foundations of the People's Republic" the Code provides the death penalty executed by a firing squad "as a temporary and an exceptional measure" (Sec. 37, par. 2).

Question 9. Sentencing. In accordance with the Criminal Code provisions the trial court determines the penalty within the limits prescribed by law for the committed crime after taking into consideration the provisions of the General Part of the Code as well as (a) the degree of social danger of the act and its perpetrator; (b) the motives for the commission of the crime; and (c) all other circumstances aggravating or mitigating the guilt (Sec. 54). If the mitigating circumstances are so exclusive and numerous, and if the penalty provided by law appears to be still too harsh, the court may change the type of penalty accordingly (Sec. 55).

If the Code prescribes the choice of one or two types of penalties the court may select the most appropriate in kind and term; if the law provides the imposition of two or more penalties the court may determine the term of each penalty so that they may in their combined form fit the purposes of the penalty (Sec. 57).

Special rules are applicable in regard to the determination of the penalty for juvenile delinquents (Secs. 60–65).

Reasons in Writing Sentences. Each sentence must contain, in addition to several other items of information, as listed in the Code of Criminal Procedure, written information on the reasons for the sentences imposed, as well as on the kind of appeal allowed, before which court, and within what period of time (Sec. 213).

---

[15] Id., decision No 236 of 1969. I crim. div.
[16] Nenov, op cit., p. 369.

Appeal. Sentences of the people's court as a first instance are appealed to the district court and sentences of the district courts are reviewed by the Supreme Court (Sec. 220, Crim. Proc.); both sides in the trial, defendant and the government, may appeal (Sec. 221, Crim. Proc.).

Suspension. Under the present Criminal Code probation is a form of suspension of sentence which may be realized in one of the following manners: (a) full suspension of the execution of a sentence; (b) partial suspension of the execution of the sentence; (c) conditional suspension of the imposition of the sentence; and (d) suspension of criminal responsibility by imposition of nonpenal measures.

(a) When the court imposes the penalty of deprivation of liberty of up to 3 years, it may suspend its execution for 2 to 5 years, if the defendant has never been deprived of his liberty for a crime of a generally dangerous nature and the court is inclined to believe that this would be in the interest of the case (Sec. 66).

Whenever a sentence is suspended, the court may authorize a public organization or a labor collective to exercise "educational care" during the determined period. General supervision of the educational care and conduct of the convicted on probation is placed in the hands of the people's court within that jurisdiction. There is a special regulation regarding the implementation of these provisions (Sec. 67).

(b) The court may release a convicted person on probation before the full serving of his penalty e.g. (Sec. 70–73).

(c) The Criminal Code also provides for the possibility of suspending the imposition of a sentence when, upon the recommendation of a public organization or the labor collective, the court decrees his reeducation by this organization or collective if the crime is punishable by deprivation of liberty for up to one year, there is no great social danger, the defendant admits his guilt and regrets the act and if the purpose of the penalty is better realized in this manner.

(d) Suspension of criminal responsibility may be achieved by the imposition of measures involving public influence by the comrade's court in cases of a certain type of criminal act as listed in the Criminal Code (Sec. 77). In its decision No. 37 of January 20, 1969, the Supreme Court stated that the comrade's court is an organ of society which makes use of measures of public influence not only in cases that are transferred to it by the trial court, but also in cases within its jurisdiction.[17]

Minimum Prison Sentence. The mandatory minimum prison sentence is one month and every sentence of imprisonment is always a determinate one; furthermore, it is always a joint sentence rather than a concurrent or consecutive one (Sec. 57). The court determines the term of each penalty in cases of several crimes and combines them.

Fine. A fine is imposed in accordance with the financial situation as well as the income and family obligations of the convicted defendant. It may be less than 10 leva (official rate of one leva equals $1.17).[18] The fine is collected from his property. However, properties which are not subject to confiscation, as specified and listed in a special law, may not be sold for the compulsory collection of the fine.

"Day Fine". The Code is silent on the problem of the "day fine" system.

Question 10. As a rule, under Bulgarian criminal law, a generally dangerous act is punishable only if it was committed guiltily, e.g., intentionally (dolus directus and dolus eventualis), or negligently. If the element of guilt in either of its two forms is absent the generally dangerous act does not constitute a crime [see also answers to questions Nos. 5, 6 and 7]. There are a few situations in which the Code excludes the presence of the element of guilt: in cases of a mistake as well as in cases of an "accidental act," and in the execution of an illegal official order.

Professor Ivan Nenov, when analyzing mistake as a circumstance which excludes guilt, emphasizes the point that a mistake of law is not known in Bulgarian criminal legislation. "If we refer to a very old division of mistakes," he states, "into a 'mistake of fact' and a 'mistake of law,' we have to stress [the fact] that under our legal system only the first category—'the factual one' is of importance." [19] However, in its decision of May 30, 1969, the Supreme Court stated that "the mistaken notion of the perpetrator regarding the person whom he intended to kill is irrelevant since the desired result and the one factually attained concerns one and the same object of protection and contains the element of one and the same crime." [20]

The pertinent Criminal Code provisions dealing with the circumstances which exclude guilt read as follows:

Sec. 14 (1) Ignorance of the factual circumstances which belong to the elements of the crime, exclude the intent connected with this crime.

(2) This provision also refers to negligently committed acts if the ignorance of the factual circumstances is not due to negligence.

Furthermore, the Code declares the act is committed without guilt in two other instances: (a) if the perpetrator was not under the obligation to or could not foresee the occurrence of the generally dangerous results. (Sec. 15), of the so-called "accidental act" or (b) if he was acting in execution of "an illegal official order" (Sec. 16).

In all these instances, the lack of criminal "guilt" may be used as a defense.

Question 11. There are no analogues to the differentiation between crime and jurisdiction in the Bulgarian Criminal Code.

Question 12. The extraterritorial applicability of the Bulgarian Criminal Code is the subject of separate report, a copy of which is attached.

QUESTION 12

The Communist Government established in Bulgaria after September 9, 1944 introduced a new Criminal Code of February 13, 1951, drafted along the line of Soviet doctrines in this field. This Code was entirely replaced by another on April 2, 1968,[a] which also incorporated various criminal provisions scattered throughout a number of legislative acts.

The questions of the applicability of the Code regarding crimes committed within and without the territory of the People's Republic of Bulgaria are dealt with in accordance with the traditional principles and Communist teachings related to this area.

The territoriality principle is reflected in Section 3(1) of the Code which prescribes that it applies to all criminal offenses committed within the territorial limits of the country by any person regardless of his citizenship.

Based on the personality principle, the Bulgarian Criminal Code also applies to Bulgarian citizens for their crimes committed abroad, as explicitly stated in Section 4(1); however, a Bulgarian citizen may not be extradited to a foreign state for criminal prosecution or serving of a sentence (Sec. 4(2).

The spokesman of the present government of Bulgaria in the field of criminal law science, Professor Ivan Nenov, explains this provision on the basis of the Communist doctrine that "Bulgarian citizens must, in their behavior, always and everywhere comply with the socialist requirements—with the rules of Communist morals and socialist law." [b] In further clarification he states that the nature of the crime and the type of penalty as well as the question whether the crime affects the interests of the Bulgarian state and its citizens or that of a foreign state and its nationals, are irrelevant. Moreover, it is not important, he states, whether the act constitutes a crime under the law of the place where it occurred.[c]

Based on the protective principle, the Bulgarian Criminal Code is also applicable to foreign nationals for their criminal acts committed outside the jurisdictional territory of Bulgaria, but only if these offenses are of a general nature and affect the interests of the Bulgarian state or its citizens (Sec. 5). The above-mentioned criminal law expert, Ivan Nenov, questions the possibility for the application of this provision in regard to foreign nationals who committed a crime abroad. "This principle," he emphasizes, "has a practical significance when the criminal perpetrator, a foreign national, is found within the territorial jurisdiction of the domestic law of Bulgaria against whom, in case of a sentence in absentia, the execution of the penalty could be directed." [d]

However, in the cases specified in Sections 4 and 5 the preliminary detention and the penalty served abroad are to be deducted from the Bulgarian one. If the penalties in both countries are of a different nature, the penalty served abroad is to be taken into consideration by the Bulgarian court when determining its penalty (Sec. 7).

Based on the universality principle, the Bulgarian Criminal Code is also applicable extraterritorially to foreign nationals for their crimes committed abroad if these acts are directed against the peace and mankind and affect the interests of another state or foreign nationals (Sec. 6 (1)).

Finally, Section 6 (2) of the Code contains a provision which opens the possibility for an application of the Bulgarian Criminal Code to foreign nationals committing other crimes abroad, namely, if such jurisdiction is provided by an international treaty to which Bulgaria is a party.

The problems of the territorial and extraterritorial application of the Bulgarian Criminal Code may be summed up as follows:

(1) This Code is applicable to Bulgarian citizens for their crimes regardless of the place of commission, e.g., in the country or abroad.

(2) It is applicable to foreign citizens (a) for their crimes committed in Bulgaria; (b) for all crimes committed abroad if interests of the Bulgarian state or Bulgarian citizens are affected; (c) for crimes committed abroad if these acts are directed against the peace and mankind; and (d) for other crimes committed abroad if an international treaty, to which Bulgaria is a party, so prescribes.

APPENDIX: TRANSLATION FROM BULGARIAN

Criminal Code of the People's Republic of Bulgaria, Durzhaven Vestnik No. 26, April 2, 1968

General Part

Chapter One. Purpose and Score of Application of the Criminal Code.

Subchapter One. Purpose of the Criminal Code. * * *

Subchapter Two. Scope of Application of the Criminal Code.

Sec. 3. (1) The Criminal Code shall apply with respect to all crimes committed within the territory of the People's Republic of Bulgaria.

(2) The question of responsibility of foreigners who enjoy immunity in regard to the criminal jurisdiction of the People's Republic of Bulgaria, shall be decided in accordance with the rules of the international law accepted by it [Bulgaria].

Sec. 4. (1) The Criminal Code shall apply to Bulgarian citizens also for their crimes committed abroad.

(2) A Bulgarian citizen shall not be extradited to a foreign state for adjudication or serving the penalty.

Sec. 5. The Criminal Code shall apply also to foreigners who committed crimes of general character abroad which affect the interests of the People's Republic of Bulgaria or of a Bulgarian citizen.

Sec. 6. (1) The Criminal Code shall apply also with regard to foreigners for committing abroad a crime against the peace and mankind, which affect the interests of another state or a foreign citizen.

(2) The Criminal Code shall apply also to other crimes committed by foreigners abroad when this is provided by an international treaty, to which the People's Republic of Bulgaria is a party.

Sec. 7. In the cases of Sections 4 and 5 the preliminary detention and the penalty served abroad shall be reduced (prispadat). When both penalties are of different kind, the penalty served abroad shall be taken into consideration for the determination of the penalty by the [Bulgarian] court.

Sec. 8. The sentence of a foreign court for a crime, to which the Bulgarian Criminal Code applies, shall be taken into consideration in the cases established by an international treaty, to which the People's Republic of Bulgaria is a party.

Question 13. Conspiracy as an individual crime is treated in Section 109, Chapter One of the Special Part of the Criminal Code which deals with the most serious crimes against the People's Republic of Bulgaria (treason, high treason, etc.). It reads as follows:

[d] Id., p. 128.

Section 109 (1) Whoever organizes or leads an organization or group whose objective is to commit crimes against the People's Republic [is punished by between 3 and 12 years of imprisonment].

(2) Whoever is a member of such an organization or group [is punished by up to 10 years of imprisonment].

(3) If the organization or group is established by the instructions or assistance of a foreign state [is punished by between 10 and 15 years of imprisonment].

(4) A participant in [such] an organization or group who voluntarily surrenders to the authorities before the commission of another crime by this [organization or group] or himself, shall not be punished.

In a decision of 1969, the Supreme Court analyzed the crime described in Section 109, par. 3, by stating that "there are two hypotheses in the elements of this crime; the first exists when the organization or group is established upon the instructions of a foreign state or foreign organization; the second, when the organization or group is created with the assistance of the foreign state or foreign organization. In the first the idea and initiative for the creation derives from the foreign state while in the second case the idea and initiative are given by the individual persons acting within the territory of the People's Republic of Bulgaria." [21]

Question 14. The problem of "felony-murder" rule does not exist in Bulgarian criminal legislation.

Question 15. The Bulgarian Government represents a sovereign nation composed of a single political unit, and has exclusive jurisdiction over riots, mass demonstrations and similar offenses without jurisdictional limitation in any form. In other words, there is only one criminal jurisdiction over the entire territory for all crimes committed there by any person, regardless of nationality.

Provisions dealing with the problems of riots, inciting to riots, arming rioters, engaging in a riot, disobedience of public safety orders, etc., are contained in two chapters of the Special Part of the Criminal Code, Chapter One. "Crimes against the People's Republic;" and Chapter Ten. "Crimes against the Order and Public Peace."

Question 16. The Bulgarian Criminal Code does not include any provision designed to outlaw private armies; however, there are a number of provisions which prosecute paramilitary activities. Thus, in the first place, since the possession and use of firearms and explosives, on the basis of special legislation, are exclusively a licensed matter, the special Subchapter I. "Crimes Committed in a Generally Dangerous Manner or with Generally Dangerous Weapons" (Secs. 337–339) in Chapter Eleven. "Generally Dangerous Crimes," makes it a crime and punishes every manufacture, repair, sale, transport, export and import of firearms, explosives and ammunition "without having the right to do that by law or license issued by the proper agency of the Government" or not "within the authorization given by the license." Also, whoever comes into possession "in whatever manner" of such firearms, etc., or transfers them to another, "without having a license to do so," is subject to severe penalties.

Secondly, every conspiracy to use weapons for political purposes falls under the provisions of Chapter One, "Crimes against the People's Republic."

Question 17. With reference to "crimes without victims," e.g., crimes in which the victim either consents or is a willing customer of the defendant, the Bulgarian Criminal Code contains provisions dealing with prostitution (Sec. 155), homosexual activity (Sec. 157), and obscenity (Sec. 159) in Subchapter VII. "Lewdness," of Chapter Two. "Crimes against the Person;" gambling (Sec. 227) in Chapter Ten. "Crimes against the Order and Public Peace;" drugs, poisons, etc. (Sec. 354) in Subchapter III. "Crimes against the Public Health" of Chapter Eleven. "Generally Dangerous Crimes."

Prostitution. While there is no specific provision concerning engaging in prostitution, the Code punishes any person who induces a female person to prostitution or to lewd acts or to sexual relations, as well as whoever systematically provides dwellings to various persons for sexual relations or lewd acts, by imprisonment of up to 5 years; also the condemned person may be forced to resettle in another place.

Homosexual Activity. The Code punishes homosexual activity only when there is use of force, threat or influence based on a position of dependence or supervision; when an adult commits such activity with a minor or infant; or with the purpose of material advantages or induces other people because of such advantages, or promises them. Thus, the Code seems to exclude from punishment homosexual relations between consenting adults.

Obscenity. Whoever produces, disseminates, displays, projects or sells works, printed matter, pictures, films, or other objects of a pornographic nature is punished by a fine of 500 leva and the objects in question are subject to confiscation.

Gambling. Whoever engages in gambling or participates in such a game is punishable by correctional labor or a fine of up to 1,000 leva; the money and other objects connected with gambling are confiscated.

Drugs. Whoever, without a license, acquires, possesses, sells, or delivers poison or drugs placed under the licensing regime, is punished by imprisonment of up to 2 years or a fine of up to 300 leva.

Question 18. Three provisions (Secs. 337-339) in Chapter Eleven, "Generally Dangerous Crimes," Subchapter I. "Crimes Committed in a Generally Dangerous Manner or with Generally Dangerous Weapons" deal exclusively with the offenses connected with firearms and explosives. It must be emphasized [as also mentioned elsewhere in this report, answer to question number 16] that firearms and explosives are subject to a very strict regime provided by special legislation.

Section 337 punishes every person who manufactures, processes, repairs, trades, transports, imports or exports explosives, firearms or ammunition, without having the right to do that by law or license issued by the proper agency of the administration, or does so not in accordance with the authorization issued to him.

Section 338 makes it a crime and punishes those who do not take the necessary measures for protection, especially those prescribed by regulations, ordinances or instructions when keeping, carrying, transporting, or repairing explosives, firearms and ammunition. If damage, injuries, or death occur on account of this negligence, the penalty is severer.

Finally, Section 339 punishes every person who obtains possession of firearms or explosives or delivers them to another without the proper license.

Question 19. The Bulgarian Criminal Code lists 11 different kinds of penalties (Sec. 37 (1); however, Section 37 (2) also provides for the "death penalty executed by a firing squad" as a "temporary and exceptional measure" for "the most serious crimes which jeopardize the foundations of the People's Republic, as well as for other especially dangerous intentional crimes."

A survey of the crimes for which a death penalty is prescribed reveals 27 cases:

(a) Chapter One. "Crimes against the People's Republic:" Sections 96, 97, 99, 100, 102 (2), 104, 106;

(b) Chapter Two. "Crimes against the Person:" Section 116;

(c) Chapter Eleven. "Generally Dangerous Crimes:" Sections 340 (2) "b", 342 (2) "c", 349 (2);

(d) Chapter Thirteen. "Military Crimes:" Sections 372, par. I and par. III, 376, 377, par. II, 382, 383, par. III, 386, par. I, 397, 399, 400;

(e) Chapter Fourteen. "Crimes against Peace and Mankind:" Sections 409, 410, 411, 412, 415, 416.

The death penalty is imposed by the same court before which the trial was conducted; no separate proceedings to determine the sentence in a capital or any other case is possible under the present Bulgarian Criminal Procedure Code.

Question 20. The Bulgarian Code of Criminal Procedure solves the problems of multiple proceedings and trials in the following manner. According to Section 145, as early as in the preliminary investigation, the proceedings involving several connected crimes may be conducted in a joint investigation. The examining magistrate may, however, with the permission of the public prosecutor, divide the investigation when there is reason to assume that it will be conducted more expediently in this way. When a person is accused of committing several crimes, the trial court adjudicates each one separately (Sec. 211).

The Criminal Code further provides that if a person committed several crimes by one act or if he committed several separate crimes, before a sentence has entered into force for any one of them, the court, after determining a penalty for each crime, shall impose the severest penalty among them. The penalties for compulsory resettlement, public reprimand, and deprivation of rights are always added to the fixed severest penalty (Sec. 23). When the penalties imposed are of one and the same kind, the court may increase the severest penalty by one-half maximum; but the established penalty should not exceed the term of the individual penalties, nor the maximum term provided for the respective type of penalty (Sec. 24).

People's Republic of China

Although it follows the civil law system, which is characterized by codified law, the People's Republic of China to date has not promulgated substantive or procedural codes to supplant those of the Nationalist Chinese Government which the Communist Chinese abrogated upon assumption of effective control of the Chinese mainland in 1949. Nor have the Communist Chinese enacted a great number of individual criminal statutes. There are, for example, no statutes governing such common crimes as murder, rape, or arson, unless it can be demonstrated or construed that these crimes were committed for counter-revolutionary purposes, in which case they would fall under the Regulations of the People's Republic of China Governing the Punishment of Counterrevolutionaries either expressly or by analogy to a specified crime. In many instances, the existing criminal laws of the People's Republic of China (PRC) are loosely constructed and vaguely worded. A formula which one encounters frequently in these criminal laws is "punishment according to the degree of guilt."

Despite the dearth of enacted criminal law and the sketchiness of that which does exist, certain features of the Communist Chinese criminal law and legal system merit examination, although we freely concede at the outset that adapting these features to the American scene would present formidable difficulties. We here will consider two notable features: the educative role of the criminal law and the rehabilitation and reform of nonproductive elements and criminals. Before considering each of these features separately, it is helpful to touch upon the link between them. This link is what in Communist China amounts to a profound faith in the capacity of the official ideology, when properly expounded and received and appropriately combined with basic economic changes, to transform the individual into a being approaching the ideal "Maoist man," that is, an individual who spontaneously, consistently, and without internal conflict places the interests of the socialist collective above his own selfish interests. One perhaps might say more precisely that the "Maoist man" is one who sincerely is convinced that, in the long run, the interests of the collective and the interests of the individual are so inextricably bound together as to be indistinguishable. To the end of bringing every Communist Chinese citizen as close to the ideal "Maoist man" as possible, the Communist Chinese have placed relentless stress upon universal knowledge and acceptance of the official ideology. They have expected not only outward conformity to their policies, but also genuine, internal acceptance; the Communist Chinese citizen typically has been denied the "right of silence."

To understand fully how the vision of the Maoist man links the educative role of the criminal law and the rehabilitation and reform of nonproductive elements and criminals, one must know something of the fundamental principles of the Marxist philosophy espoused by the Communist Chinese and the manner in which they relate these fundamental principles to law and crime.

In the Marxist view, any given society can be divided into an economic base and a superstructure erected upon that economic base. The nature of the economic base is determined by its predominant mode of production. In the United States, for example, the capitalist mode of production is said to prevail, while in the People's Republic of China the mode of production is socialist. Included in the superstructure erected upon the economic base are such phenomena as religion, philosophy, politics, ideology, and law. The content of the various components of the superstructure is a reflection of and is determined by the economic base. In a society where the capitalist mode of production obtains, the religion, philosophy, etc. will necessarily also be capitalist. The content of these various components of the superstructure is in effect decreed by the class of society which economically is in the dominant position in that society, and the content is calculated to maintain and strengthen the power of the dominant class. One's class membership is determined by one's relation to the mode of production, that is, in general terms, in all pre-socialist societies, by whether one is an exploiter or one of the exploited. One's world view further is derived from one's class membership. As one of the exploiters, the capitalist cannot help but have the various attitudes belonging to the capitalist class as a social entity. The Marxist position is in effect that the individual is the product of his environment, environment being understood in terms of class membership.

According to classical Marxist analysis, changes in the superstructure are the product of changes in the economic base. The Communist Chinese have accepted this classical Marxist position, but have placed great emphasis upon there being a time lag between changes in the economic base and changes in the superstructure as the superstructure is reflected in the thinking of the various individuals comprising the society in question. The socialist mode of production now prevails in the PRC. The prevalence of the socialist mode of production there, however, does not insure that every individual in Communist Chinese society will have absorbed the world view proper to a socialist economic base. There inevitably will be residues of the world view belonging to the previous economic base. Residues of feudal and bourgeois thinking remain in the PRC. The Communist Chinese attempt to eradicate these residues by systematically inculcating socialist ideology. Their extreme emphasis upon the efficacy of ideological education in effecting the individual's transition to the world view proper to the socialist mode of production and upon the impact of this transition upon production has laid them open to the charge from some quarters of harboring the heretical view that ideological influences prevail over economic factors. To some, the Communist Chinese appear to be attempting to influence the economic base through the superstructure rather than letting the economic base determine the superstructure. We need not here decide upon the putative apostasy of the Communist Chinese, but only to emphasize their pronounced reliance upon ideological education in advancing socialism.

The Communist Chinese approach both law and crime in terms of the Marxist framework sketched above. Not only in the capitalist state, but equally in the socialist state, law, as a component of the superstructure, is an instrument which the ruling class uses in maintaining and enhancing its power. As such, law is far from being a supra-class phenomenon impartially formulated to attain or approach the abstract standard of "justice." All law is the law of a particular social class. It is difficult to distinguish between law and policy, both of which are formulated by the ruling class to serve its own ends. The Communist Chinese themselves speak of policy as being the "soul" of law. Knowledge of the law of the PRC thus becomes as much a part of the ideological education of the Communist Chinese citizen as knowledge of the regime's concrete policies and its abstract Marxist theory. Study of state law plays its part in the growth in the individual of the proper world view. More specifically, study of the criminal law of the PRC provides the citizen with an understanding of the types of behavior characteristic of the socialist man and the types of behavior found in the man whose thinking is still contaminated to varying degrees with residues of bourgeois or feudal ideology or with residues of the thinking appropriate to him when he was one of the exploited. The criminal is, indeed, a person whose thinking for various reasons is so contaminated with such residues as to prevent his realizing the identity of his interests with the interests of the socialist collective; not seeing this identity, he places himself at odds with the state and the Communist Party, both of which are seen as carrying out the will of the people in a socialist state. By the time that communism is realized in the PRC, there will be no crime and no backward thinking. Until that time, the regime is obligated to punish, and often punish severely, actions which are contrary to the interests of the regime, that is, contrary to the interests of the people. In addition to punitive functions, the Chinese Communists have taken upon themselves the tasks of eradicating the backward thoughts which lie behind criminal behavior. In their view, they are eradicating the backward thinking which leads to crime primarily by eliminating its environmental sources through the creation of socialism in the PRC. As an auxiliary measure, however, they concentrate intense efforts upon rehabilitating non-productive elements and reforming criminals by a program which combines labor with intensive ideological education.

The Educative Role of the Criminal Law

An important treatise on the criminal law of the People's Republic of China authored by a group of Communist Chinese professors of law stresses that one of the main tasks of the criminal law of their country is "to educate the citizens to observe law self-consciously."[1] By "self-consciously" in this formulation is intended an attitude in which the citizen voluntarily adheres to the law and does so with full, conscious understanding of the fact that his adherence is to the mutual advantage of himself and the society in which he lives. The Communist Chinese attempt to cultivate this attitude in the populace by various methods, most of which can be included under the rubric of propaganda.

The Communist Chinese take as a fundamental approach to legal documents the perhaps not so evident principle that the citizen must understand the content of a legal document before he can self-consciously apply it to his own life. In part to assure their being understood by the common man, legal documents in the PRC are written in plain language and a simple style. In a discussion of how to write decisions, a handbook issued by the secretariat of the Peking Municipal People's Court states some principles which apply equally to the texts of Communist Chinese criminal laws. The statement reads:

> A decision is a document meant for the public. It should be so written as to be understood not only by the litigants but also by people not involved in the case. Therefore, not only must the facts be clearly presented in decisions, but the language used must be in a popular style. Ordinary stereotyped expressions for legal documents should be avoided. A successfully written decision must be easily understood by those who are able to read general material. It should also be easily understood by those who listen to the reading of the document.[2]

Accustomed as he is to complex documents written in technical legal language, the Westerner perhaps cannot help looking askance upon Communist Chinese legal documents, in which it appears to him that plainness and simplicity have been carried many times to the point of sloppiness. Nonetheless, one cannot totally reject the notion that legal documents should be intelligible to the average citizen who is held responsible for adherence to their contents.

The Communist Chinese authorities take full advantage of their control of all the media in the country to bring about awareness of the provisions of state laws. Discussion of a particular law may precede its promulgation or even its final drafting by several months. Typically, discussion in the media begins with pointing out a problem or a situation constituting an obstacle to the progress of socialism. Gradually is created the impression of the necessity of action, often legal, to remedy the problem or situation. At an appropriate time the text of a draft legal measure often is introduced for widespread, organized popular discussion. The regime at times goes through the motions of accepting criticism, limited in scope, of this draft. Sometime later, the final version of a draft so discussed and criticized will be promulgated, following which there is further discussion of the manner in which the statute in question is in the interests of the people, that is, the way in which it will advance or protect socialism.

In the case of a criminal statute, the regime often makes public examples of some of those punished under its provisions. If formal trials precede the meting out of punishment, the trials will be featured in media reports. Particularly in the early days of the Communist government, mass attendance at these trials often was solicited.

The Communist Chinese press also devotes considerable attention to reports of those criminals who have reformed in the process of their punishment. Typically, the person so reformed testifies to his past evils, describes his new life and his new way of thinking, and expresses his gratitude to the regime for having helped him to effect a transformation. Members of his family sometimes also outpour their amazement at the "new man" and their gratitude to the regime.

The educational role of the criminal law is carried out in two ways other than those discussed above under the general heading of propaganda. One of these ways is that of encouraging the citizens to assume some responsibility for enforcement of the criminal law. Citizens are urged to observe others conscientiously and to report any violations known to them. During the excesses of the Cultural Revolution, some citizens apparently went beyond observation and reporting to actual detention and meting out of punishment.

Another approach is that of bringing the average citizen into the judicial process as a "people's assessor." Modeled after similar participants in the Soviet judicial process, the "people's assessor" is a layman elected to share the bench with the judge in the trying of certain types of cases and to have equal voice with the judge in deciding questions of both law and fact. In principle the ratio between assessors and judges for each case is two to one and decisions are reached by majority vote. Active participation by the people's assessors in the judicial process is said by the Communist Chinese to yield many benefits, among them increased popular respect for the law and the courts. The media, as one would expect, have given considerable publicity to the experience of various lay assessors in sitting on the bench.

One can say that the aim of all the matters discussed under the educational role of the law is prevention of crime. As it also can be argued that one of the primary purposes of having a published criminal code is prevention of crime, one well may ask why the Communist Chinese have promulgated no criminal code and enacted so few criminal statutes. The reasons for the absence of a criminal code and a poverty of criminal statutes in the PRC are numerous and complex. Here it is instructive to touch upon only two among these reasons. First, it appears to us justifiable to assume that the Communist Chinese leadership is sincere in its belief that fundamental social and economic reforms will do incomparably more to reduce crime than it could be hoped that any piece or corpus of criminal law would do. They appear to us to pay more than lip-service to the Marxist tenet that crime is an environmental product. Secondly, their approach to crime and the criminal law is perhaps colored by traditional Chinese philosophy. In traditional China a distinction was maintained between the concept of li (variously translated as morality, ethics, propriety) and the concept of lü (law). Li were the principles which guided and found expression in the conduct of the gentleman in all his dealings with others. Through his education he had absorbed li into the very core of his being. This absorption of li made lü (law) unnecessary and perhaps even irrelevant to the conduct of the gentleman. To adopt a term from the modern Chinese Communists, one could say that the gentleman "self-consciously" did what was moral, correct, and proper in every situation. With him there was no question of legality or illegality. But the uneducated, those who were not gentlemen, did not have li within them. If the state was to be properly governed, lü were essential because the mass of the people otherwise would have no guidelines for their behavior.

One can regard the Communist Chinese, through their intensive efforts in ideological education, as attempting to instill their own form of li in all the citizens of the PRC. The "little red book" of Mao's thought which has figured so prominently in the life of the Communist Chinese citizen in recent years is perhaps the Communist Chinese equivalent of the Confucian Analects, the principal source of traditional li. If every citizen can come self-consciously to follow the li of socialist life, if every citizen can become a "gentleman," there will be no need of law. Perhaps this traditional attitude underlies the faith the Communist Chinese appear to have in the Marxist vision of communism's being the stage of society in which there will be no state and no law, but in which there will not be anarchy.

REHABILITATION THROUGH LABOR

We have here to consider the Decision of the State Council of the People's Republic of China Relating to Problems of Rehabilitation Through Labor, promulgated by the State Council, August 3, 1957, during the anti-rightist campaign which followed on the heels of the Hundred Flowers period of relative liberality in Communist China.

When the Communist Chinese assumed effective control of mainland China in 1949, they were confronted with sizeable social, political, and crime problems, particularly in the cities, problems which had been aggravated by the dislocation attendant to long years of war. To cope with these problems, they put into practice various procedures resembling those finally given a statutory basis in the above Decision. In his The Criminal Process in the People's Republic of China, 1949-1963: An Introduction, Jerome Cohen alludes to these antecedents of the Decision:

> Rehabilitation through labor grew out of a variety of experiments that took place in the years immediately preceding its formal enactment. Beginning with the early 1950's, many government and Party cadres who were suspected of serious political deviations and of perhaps even harboring counter-revolutionary sentiments were sent to "new life schools" in which they were involuntarily confined while undergoing examination and indoctrination. In some places by 1956 the name of such schools had been changed to "rehabilitation through labor," reflecting the greater relative emphasis that had come to be placed upon physical labor in their "curriculum."

During its earliest years, the PRC also resorted to similar measures to meet the serious threat to public order that was posed by the prevalence of prostitutes, petty thieves, black marketeers, opium addicts, vagrants, and other social parasites.[3]

The effectiveness of these antecedent measures, which one Western lawyer has characterized as "a ruthless solution of a social problem,"[4] were apparent to the Chinese themselves and to many of the foreign visitors, who frequently commented upon the marked diminution or absence of visible signs of petty criminal activity and the environment conducive to such activity.

The Decision of the State Council of the People's Republic of China Relating to Problems of Rehabilitation Through Labor makes various categories of persons subject to certain sanctions, which, although involving confinement and subjection to a stringent regimen of "rehabilitation," are not characterized as criminal sanctions. The constitutional basis of these non-criminal sanctions is Article 100 of the Constitution of the People's Republic of China of September 20, 1954, which reads:

> Article 100. Citizens of the People's Republic of China must abide by the Constitution and the law, uphold discipline at work, keep public order and respect social ethics.[5]

The various categories of persons subject to the Decision's sanctions are, in general, characterized by non-productivity. These categories are:

1. The following kinds of persons shall be provided shelter and their rehabilitation through labor shall be carried out:

(1) Those who do not engage in proper employment, those who behave like hooligans, and those who, although they steal, swindle, or engage in other such acts, are not pursued for criminal responsibility, who violate security administration and whom repeated education fails to change;

(2) Those counterrevolutionaries and antisocialist reactionaries who, because their crimes are minor, are not pursued for criminal responsibility, who receive the sanction of expulsion from an organ, organization, enterprise, school or other such unit and who are without a way of earning a livelihood;

(3) Those persons who have the capacity to labor but who for a long period refuse to labor or who destroy discipline and interfere with public order, and who [thus] receive the sanction of expulsion from an organ, organization, enterprise, school, or other such unit and who have no way of earning a livelihood;

(4) Those who do not obey work assignments or arrangements for getting them employment or for transferring them to other employment, or those who do not accept the admonition to engage in labor and production, who ceaselessly and unreasonably make trouble and interfere with public affairs and whom repeated education fails to change.[6]

A person subjected to rehabilitation through labor was not charged with any crime and was not tried by any judicial body. The procedures for making a person liable to rehabilitation through labor are described in section 3 of the Decision:

> 3. If a person must be rehabilitated through labor, the application for rehabilitation through labor must be made by a civil affairs or a public security department; by the organ, organization, enterprise, school, or other such unit in which he is located; or by the head of his family or his guardian. The application shall be submitted to the people's council of the province, autonomous region, or city directly under the central authority, or to an organ that has been authorized by them, for approval.[7]

A person's confinement under the provisions of the Decision is an administrative action which can be initiated by various individuals or groups having contact with him. Those confined apparently had little or no recourse to appeal of the administrative action.

The Decision sketches in general terms in section 2 the nature of the regimen to which those being rehabilitated were to be subjected:

> 2. Rehabilitation through labor is a measure of a coercive nature for carrying out the education and reform of persons receiving it. It is also a method of arranging their getting employment.
> Persons who receive rehabilitation through labor shall be paid an appropriate salary in accordance with the results of their labor. Moreover, in the exercise of discretion a part of their salary may be deducted in order to provide for the maintenance expenses of their family members or to serve as a reserve fund that will enable them to have a family and an occupation.
>
> During the period of rehabilitation through labor, persons who receive it must observe the discipline prescribed by organs of rehabilitation through labor. Those who violate this discipline shall receive administrative sanctions. Those who violate the law and commit crimes shall be dealt with in accordance with law.
> As for the aspect of administering education, the guideline of combining labor and production with political education shall be adopted. Moreover, discipline and a system shall be prescribed for them to observe in order to help them establish [in their minds] the concepts of patriotic observance of law and of the glory of labor, learn labor and production skills, and cultivate the habit of loving labor, so that they become self-supporting laborers who participate in socialist construction.[8]

The period of confinement is left unstated in the Decision, which provides only that:

> 4. If during the period of rehabilitation through labor a person who receives it behaves well and has the conditions for getting employment, he may, with the approval of the organ of rehabilitation through labor, separately [independently] get employment. If the unit, head of the family, or guardian that originally made the application for the person's rehabilitation through labor asks to take him back so that it can assume responsibility for disciplining him, the organs of rehabilitation through labor may also, giving consideration to the circumstances, approve the request.[9]

The implication seems to be that a person will be confined until he has been rehabilitated, though what constitutes the criteria of the rehabilitated state is vague. Cohen reports that "several former public security officers who have left China since the spring of 1962 have said that shortly before that time the government issued instructions that limited the term of rehabilitation through labor to three years."[10]

The Decision at many points thus seems to invite abuse, and various sources confirm that such abuse has occurred, notably in the form of forced confinement and "rehabilitation" of persons guilty only of an objectionable affinity to "bourgeois thinking," i.e., rightists. The Communist Chinese authorities and press, however, have consistently held to the view that rehabilitation through labor is a laudable and highly effective program. It is possible, however, that some of the abuses in the work of reforming vagrants described during the Hundred Flowers period in some official Instructions of the Ministry of Interior of the PRC also apply to the program of rehabilitation through labor, of which the work of reforming vagabonds was a precursor. The abuses noted in these official Instructions include the following:

(1) During the initial period some places were not clear as to the scope of the classification "vagrant," and investigation work was not thorough enough—this led to some errors in providing shelter;

(3) In arranging for vagrants to participate in labor and production some places did not sufficiently comprehend and implement the guideline of combining reform with placement and they only concerned themselves with present production problems and did not care about the needs of long-term placement;

(4) Also, some places executed the work too mechanically in the direction that considered agriculture to be paramount in placement and reform, and they placed on farms vagrants who were not suited to participate in agricultural production;

(5) Also, some places were not reasonable enough in the work of disciplining vagrants and in compensating them for their labor.[11]

REFORM THROUGH LABOR

The second statute to be considered is the Act of the People's Republic of China for Reform through Labor (September 7, 1954), which is made applicable in its Article 1 to "all counterrevolutionary and other criminal offenders."[12] The sanctions described in this document are criminal ones, as opposed to the non-criminal ones described in discussion of the previous Decision on rehabilitation through labor, and they are made applicable to offenders whose cases have already been adjudged. Such offenders are to be held in detention houses, prisons, or reform through labor discipline groups in accordance with the provisions of the following articles:

Article 8. Detention houses shall be [used] primarily for confining in custody offenders whose cases have not been adjudged. . . .

Article 13. Prisons shall be [used] primarily for holding counterrevolutionary offenders and other important criminal offenders whose cases have already been adjudged, who have been given suspended death sentences or life imprisonment, and for whom the execution of sentence by labor outside of prison would be inappropriate.

Article 17. Reform through labor discipline groups shall hold counterrevolutionary offenders and other criminal offenders whose cases have already been adjudged and for whom labor outside of prison is appropriate.[13]

With the possible exception of those confined in detention houses whose cases have not been adjudged, these three classes of offenders are subjected to reform through labor regimens comprised of (a) labor, often physical in nature; (b) political and ideological education; and (c) a "carrot-and-stick" system of rewards and punishments. We shall discuss these three aspects of the reform regimen individually after recording the following observation of Jerome Cohen:

"Both inside and outside the People's Republic reform through labor is the most publicized aspect of the criminal process in China. Chinese publications have claimed that a blend of thought reform techniques and compulsory labor has achieved remarkable success in the correction and rehabilitation of criminal offenders. Some foreign observers have enthusiastically endorsed these claims. Others have indicted the system of penal administration for having cruelly subjected millions of prisoners to the worst of the abuses that are associated with the term "forced labor."[14]

A. Labor

The labor in which counterrevolutionary and other offenders engage during their punitive period apparently has been varied, though the emphasis perhaps has been upon gross physical tasks. The Act itself specifies that those in prisons shall engage in "compulsory labor" and that those in reform through labor discipline groups shall engage in "planned participation in agriculture, industry, construction work, and other such production" and finally that "provinces and cities shall establish reform through labor discipline groups on the basis of actual needs."[15] The Act also stipulates that: attention shall be paid to the cultivation of production skills and labor habits of offenders. During reform through labor attention shall be paid to the full utilization of technical skills of offenders who have them.[16]

Article 52 of the Act states in part that: the time of actual labor for offenders generally shall be fixed at nine to ten hours each day. With seasonable production it may not exceed twelve hours. The time for sleep generally shall be fixed at eight hours.[17]

In a Peking prison which he visited, Edgar Snow found that there were three prison factories (a hosiery mill, a mill for plastic articles, and a machine and electrical shop). Meng Chao-liang wrote in 1958 in the Communist Chinese journal Cheng-fa yen-chiu [Political-Legal Research] that:

Reform through labor agriculture is largely established along rivers, in lake regions, in saline or alkaline regions, and in dry regions with extremely inconvenient transportation. It has encountered great difficulties in technology and material supplies. The cadres who engaged in reform through labor work lead the offenders to scarcely populated, barren land. They eat simple food and sleep in the open. By means of hoes and ploughs they surround the lakes with fields, dig ditches for removing the alkali, open rivers and canals and ultimately conquer the rivers, lakes, salt, alkali, and dryness, reform nature, open up a large amount of barren land, and produce much food, cotton, and livestock.

* * * * * * *

In the last few years various work teams have participated in the construction of many well-known railroads and water utilization projects. House construction work teams were mainly [formed] for the purpose of serving basic construction of reform through labor production.[18]

In this statement and others of a similar tone the Communist Chinese obviously do not shut their eyes to the fact that offenders constitute a ready source of cheap labor to be used to the economic advantage of the regime.

The official argument of the regime sees the labor of offenders as being mutually beneficial, for, while it has economic significance to the regime, it has a profound psychological significance to the laboring offender. In the words of Meng Chao-liang, "reforming nature not only makes the vast [number of] cadres happy about their victory, it also makes a great majority of the criminals recognize the truth that labor creates the world."[19] From recognition of this truth, the laboring offender ideally progresses to recognition of the Marxist principle that it is through his labor that man also creates himself. Work, that which was once forced effort, is supposed to become voluntary once he realizes its profound significance to nature, society, and himself. The Communist Chinese tend to glorify labor, particularly physical labor, as something with intrinsic value in and of itself, as opposed to the view that regards a skill as a technique acquired by the individual which is very helpful to his adjustment and success in life.

B. Political and ideological education

Much has been written about the Communist Chinese techniques of political and ideological education and about the apparent success of these techniques in many cases. The first paragraph of Article 26 of the reform through labor Act gives a very sketchy outline of these techniques with reference to offenders:

Article 26. In order to expose the essence of crime, to eliminate criminal thoughts, and to establish new concepts of morality, collective classes, individual conversations, assigned study of documents, organized discussions, and other such methods shall be regularly and systematically used to educate offenders about admitting their guilt and observing the law, about current political events, about labor and production, and about culture.[20]

Communist Chinese descriptions of the techniques of political and ideological education in the case of offenders stress that the process begins with somehow bringing the offender to the point of admitting his own guilt, of seeing his punishment and reform as a good thing, and of adhering to the rules applicable to his life in confinement. Once he has admitted his guilt, he is encouraged to probe fully the question of why he became a criminal; such probing is done in terms of both the individual, specific factors and events in his life which were operative in his criminal behavior, and the general, societal influences so operative. He is encouraged to confess to all his "evil crimes" and to expose others he knows to be guilty. The progress of the regime in eliminating as fully as possible the societal factors which provided nourishment for his criminal tendencies is paraded before him in the form of personal testimony in the prison by outsiders, including members of his own family in some cases and former criminals who have reformed and now are leading an exemplary, new life; and in the form of organized visits to personally observe evidence of progress. Meng Chao-liang writes that "as a result of their observations many criminals, after comparing the new China with the old one, have been so moved as to cry bitterly and to express their determination to correct their past wrongs and to become new persons."[21] The possibility of any offender's becoming a new man is constantly held before the prisoner. He is systematically schooled in the official ideology and the official interpretation of current affairs and policy.

Westerners commenting upon the techniques of ideological and political education in Communist China have divergent views. Many emphasize that the effectiveness of these techniques stems in large part from the mobilization of intense group pressure upon the individual who has been stripped of his various psychic defenses and whose conscious and unconscious guilt has been systematically exploited. The ideological and political education of offenders in confinement is sometimes viewed as merely an intensified extension of the techniques applied to almost the whole of the Communist Chinese population. Much emphasis is placed upon the painfulness of the process of political and ideological education when this process involves careful scrutiny and minute dissection of one's whole life history under intense pressure from the group to which one belongs to bring one's thought and one's understanding of one's whole life into conformity with the prevailing philosophy.

In contrast to these views, one Western psychiatrist, while recognizing both the painfulness and the group pressure, sees the "humanitarian, socialist morality" of Communist Chinese penal personnel as a major factor in the reform of criminals and gives expression to the various attitudes toward the prison and the penal function that are included in this morality. He concludes that "the fact that the prison keepers lived by the same ethical principles which they were attempting to teach the prisoners was undoubtedly the largest single factor in the re-education of so many delinquent individuals."[25]

C. Rewards and punishments in the penal setting

In its Articles 67 through 72 the Act of the People's Republic of China for Reform Through Labor states various punishments which may be inflicted on the offender if, while serving his sentence, he fails to adapt to the reform regimen. These Articles read:

Article 67. In order to enable offenders to establish their merit and atone for their crimes, a reward and punishment system with clearly defined rewards and punishments shall be put into effect.

Article 69. In any one of the following situations offenders may, on the basis of the different circumstances of each case, be given warning, demerit, confinement to quarters or other such punishment: (1) They hinder the reform of other offenders; (2) they do not take care of or they damage instruments of production; (3) they are lazy or deliberately work slowly; (4) they engage in other acts that violate the rules of administration.

Article 71. On the basis of the seriousness of the circumstances of each case, organs of reform through labor shall [decide whether to] recommend that the local people's court sentence, in accordance with law, offenders who commit any one of the following crimes while they are being held by those organs: (1) Rioting or committing deadly acts or inciting others to commit deadly acts; (2) escaping or organizing escapes; (3) destroying construction work of important public property; (4) openly resisting labor despite repeated education; (5) engaging in other acts that seriously violate the law.

Article 72. When major counterrevolutionary offenders, habitual robbers, habitual thieves, and other offenders who, during the period of their reform through labor, do not labor actively but repeatedly violate prison rules, and the facts prove that they still have not reformed and that there is a real possibility that they will continue to endanger the security of society after release, before their term of imprisonment expires organs of reform through labor may submit to the people's security organ in charge the sugestion that their reform through labor be continued; after the suggestion is reviewed by the public security organ and after the offenders are sentenced by the local people's court in accordance with law, their reform through labor shall be continued.[26]

This last article thus holds forth the possibility of an offender's confinement continuing even after the expiration of his original sentence if he has given good reason to the view that he has failed to reform.

The incentives to reform, i.e., rewards for good behavior, are described in Articles 68 and 70, as follows:

Article 68. Offenders in any one of the following situations may, on the basis of different behavior, be given a commendation, material reward, merit mark, reduction of sentence, conditional release, or other such reward:

[25] Ibid., p. 617.
[26] Ibid., p. 619.

(1) They habitually observe discipline, diligently study, and really demonstrate that they have repented and reformed;

(2) They dissuade other offenders from unlawful conduct, or information given by them denouncing counterrevolutionary organizations and activity inside or outside prisons is confirmed through investigation;

(3) They actively labor and fulfill or overfulfill production tasks;

(4) They have special accomplishments in conserving raw materials and taking care of public property;

(5) They diligently study technical skills and specially demonstrate inventiveness, creativity, or [ability in] teaching their own technical skills to others;

(6) They eliminate disasters or major incidents and avoid loss [to the people];

(7) They engage in other acts that are beneficial to the people and the state.[27]

Article 70. The rewards and punishments prescribed in Articles 68 and 69 shall be announced and given after review and approval by a responsible officer of the organ of reform through labor. But, for reduction of sentence or conditional release, a recommendation of the organ of reform through labor must be submitted to the people's public security organ in charge for review and then sent to the local provincial or city people's court for approval, announcement and execution.[28]

A special type of incentive to reform in the case of those guilty of capital crimes is the suspended death sentence, to our knowledge, a unique feature of the Communist Chinese system. It is discussed in the Lectures on the General Principals of Criminal Law in the People's Republic of China as follows:

Furthermore, in our practice of struggle against counterrevolutionaries, we have also created a doctrine, i.e., "two years of suspension for a death sentence, execution pending the result of forced labor performed by the convict."

This provides a flagrant counter-revolutionary the opportunity to repent and to reform himself if immediate execution of his sentence is not necessary. After two years of suspension, whether his sentence should be finally executed or not will be decided by his achievements in labor reform. If during the period of suspension he has made concrete achievements in labor reform, sufficiently showing his hearty repentance, his death sentence may be reduced to life imprisonment or long-term imprisonment through definite procedures.

On the other hand, if he has refused to accept reform, his death sentence should be executed right after the expiration of that period. The practice in the past years has shown that most of the counter-revolutionaries who had been sentenced to death but were granted two years of suspension demonstrated their determination to reform themselves during the period of suspension. Consequently, they were commuted to life imprisonment or long-term imprisonment. This doctrine has not only insured healthy development of the movement of suppressing counter-revolutionaries, but has highly demonstrated the spirit of revolutionary humanitarianism in our criminal law and the state's policy of "uniting suppression with clemency." [29]

Cuba

The Spanish Penal Code of 1870, extended to the Island of Cuba in 1879,[1] remained in force during the independence of that country in 1901 until the year 1938. At this time, it was repealed by the Code of Social Defense, enacted pursuant to the provisions of Decree Law 802 of April 4, 1936,[2] in force since October 8, 1938.

The Code is divided into four parts or Books. Book I contains general provisions of substantive penal law; Book II refers to specific felonies (delitos); Book III contains specific misdemeanors (contravenciones); Book IV governs the application of security measures. Matters concerning criminal procedures as well as execution of sanctions are not part of the Code; they are regulated by special statutes.

I. PRINCIPAL FEATURES OF THE CUBAN CODE OF SOCIAL DEFENSE OF 1936

Book I:

A. Concept of the penalty.

The penalty-punishment theory under the Spanish Code of 1870 has been replaced, under the new Code, by the penalty-treatment theory which is based principally on the idea that it is necessary to defend society. Under the latter theory, the imposition of a sanction is justified only when the fundamental laws of the social order are violated, such as in the commission of a misdemeanor or any other act which produces an alteration in the social order, although not of a "grave" nature.

In order to leave no doubts that this was the intention of the lawmaker, the original name Penal Code, no longer fitting to the new Code, was changed to Code of Social Defense.

Book IV contains regulations on security measures destined precisely to defend society and to avoid the repetition and consequences of crime. These security measures are not considered penalties per se.

An interesting point is that at the time the Cuban Code of Social Defense entered into force; i.e., in 1938, no country in the world had adopted a penal code bearing such a name. Only the Mexican state of Yucatan had its Code of Social Defense enacted and in force at this time (April 25, 1938), although as aforementioned, the Cuban Code was enacted earlier in 1936, although enforced two years later.

B. Danger to society as fundamental criteria for sanctioning.

In order to determine the sanction for the commission of a felony (delito) or misdemeanor (contravención), the danger the criminal represents in society must be considered; that is, the extent of his anti-social behavior, the fear he inspired, his capabilities of causing damage or of placing the social order in danger or disruption. Professor Ferri used to say that "a grave crime committed by a less dangerous criminal and a simple crime, on the contrary, may reveal the symptoms of an abnormal or very dangerous personality." Therefore, when sentencing, judges shall apply the sanctions, taking into account these fundamental circumstances. In order to accomplish this, the law must grant judges sufficient flexibility with regard to the length and manner of imposing a sanction. The Cuban Code adopts this criterion and grants judges a wider flexibility than the previous Code regarding the imposition of a sentence. This, on the one hand, allows a more severe sanctioning procedure against habitual delinquents or those more dangerous to society either by congenital or acquired tendencies; on the other hand, it allows a less severe procedure against a great majority of occasional or less dangerous offenders.

C. Criminal liability.

Under the theory of social defense as opposed to retributive justice by the State, legal liability (imputabilidad) derives from moral liability. The Code adopts this criterion, not only because it is absolutely inseparable from the idea of social defense or danger of the criminal, but also because the lawmakers agreed with Professor Ferri that this should bring positive benefits to the administration of criminal justice.

This principle is found in Article 18, which states that "No one may be sanctioned for the commission of an act provided by the Code, unless the action or omission which determined said act was desired by the agent who at the same time wanted to cause or foresaw the results of his act or omission."

D. Criminal liability of juristic persons.

The Code establishes, in addition to the criminal liability of juristic persons, the criminal liability of those natural persons involved in the commission of a punishable act by juristic persons.

E. Political crimes.

They are defined in Article 21 of the Code as "any crime which violates a right or a political interest of the state or a political right of the citizens."

When, in addition, the criminal act violates any other right, or that the commission of a political crime concurs with the commission of any other crime, the rules on concurrence of crimes shall be applicable.

F. Consummated and frustrated crimes.

The concepts of frustrated crime and tentative [to commit a crime] disappear. They are replaced by a distinction between consummated crime (delito consumado) and frustrated crime (delito imperfecto). The criminal forms of frustrated and tentative crime fall into the latter form.

G. Concealment of the commission of a crime.

Concealment of the commission of a crime (encubrimiento) became a crime against the administration of justice.

H. Exempting and justifying circumstances.

Among the first ones we found:

(1) Insanity and mental alienation. The old concept of insanity is suppressed. Instead, the definition of Professor Sanchiz Banus adopted by Article 8, Section I of the Penal Code of the Spanish Republic which includes transitory insanitary, is adopted. Determination of insanity is vested in doctors.

(2) Drunkenness and temporary insanity. Drunkenness that is complete, accidental, nonhabitual and not preconceived may be considered grounds for exemption from criminal liability. The same may be said of temporary insanity that is complete, accidental, nonhabitual, not preconceived and not caused by the absorption or injection of narcotic substances.

(3) Minority. For the purposes of criminal liability, the Code sets minority age as up to twelve years.

(4) Deaf-mutes. They are exempt from criminal liability, thus following the Spanish Penal Code of the Republic (Article 3, Section VIII).

(5) Physical force and intimidation. Together with physical force, the Code includes intimidation as grounds for exemption from criminal liability.

(6) Error of law. This becomes an exempting circumstance, only with regard to the commission of misdemeanors (contravenciones) by aliens who have been in the country for a short period of time.

Among the second ones, there are:

(1) State of need; that is, in case an individual acts in self defense, provided a) that he is unjustly attacked and b) that for his protection, he rationally employs an adequate way of defending himself.

(2) Stealing as caused by hunger or starvation (hurto famélico). To be applicable, however, the amount of goods stolen should not exceed that amount which is strictly indispensable for the immediate subsistence of the culprit, that property does not suffer any unnecessary damages, that there is no duress or intimidation of the victim, that the act does not reveal that the agent is dangerous, that he is not a vagabond, an alcoholic, a beggar or a drug addict.

Among the circumstances that may modify criminal liability, we find the following:

(A) Attenuating circumstances. Here we find some new attenuating circumstances such as repentance, influence of the environment, fatigue caused by work, mental unbalance in women due to menopause, pregnancy, menstruation or a pathological condition caused by childbirth, and old age which is fixed at 60 years.

(B) Aggravating circumstances. Among those the Code mentions the use of automobiles, vessels, aircrafts or any similar medium capable of achieving the impunity of the agent by insuring his rapid escape from the site of the crime.

Book II: Felonies (delitos).

This book of the Code deals with specific crimes (delitos). It is based on the principle that crime as an act committed against the law (acto antijuridico) constitutes a violation of criminal law. The classification of punishable acts is made, therefore, in accordance with the rights violated by the commission of an illegal act.

Death penalty. It is established for certain crimes such as piracy when it is accomplished by homicide or abandonment of the victim without facilities to survive. Also, for those persons who for the purpose of stealing cause a vessel to list or sink and consequently, someone dies. It is also applicable to the commission of the crime of murder and parricide, including in the latter the murder of one's mother, father or child or any legitimate or illegitimate ascendant, descendant or spouse. Death penalty is also applicable to cases of homocide caused by the use of explosives.

Commission of a crime while practicing a sport. This crime is included in the provisions of Article 471-A of the Code. Where the injury is caused with intention to violate the rules of the game, it is punishable. Should the referee or umpire consent to the breaking of the rules of the game in question, he shall be brought to trail as an accomplice.

Book III: Misdemeanors (contravenciones).

These are minor violations of the law committed without malice or the more or less marked characteristics of those violations which constitute a felony (delito). Penalty for the commission of misdemeanors (contravenciones) cannot exceed the term of six months in jail.

Book IV: Security measures.

Security measures are applicable to individuals who commit an act which the law qualifies as a crime, regardless of the fact that the individual may not be criminally liable (inimputable) or that he may not be punishable. They are also applicable to those individuals who have symptoms of a permanent dangerous condition which particularly inclines or may incline them to commit a crime, even though the commission of said crime has not occurred.

Security measures may be applicable for an undetermined period of time until the purposes of cure, instruction, education or rehabilitation (rehabilitación) of the individual is achieved.

In order to apply security measures, the following criteria should be followed:

(1) They shall be applicable only to socially dangerous persons who have committed a crime, regardless of the fact that they are not criminally liable. They also shall be applicable to persons who have not committed a crime but evidently reveal permanent symptoms of being dangerous to society.

(2) The law regulates the cases where a socially dangerous person may be subject to security measures.

(3) Security measures shall be decreed following previous determination of the dangerous status of the person who committed a crime.

(4) Generally speaking, any person who is believed to be a potential criminal shall be reputed as socially dangerous.

II. CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

As aforementioned, criminal procedure is not regulated by the Code of Social Defense but by the Law on Criminal Procedure enacted in Spain, pursuant to the provisions of Royal Decree of September 14, 1882, and later extended to Cuba and Puerto Rico by Royal Decree of October 19, 1888. It became enforceable in these islands on January 1, 1899. It is still in force in the Republic of Cuba.

Basically, we may say that the preliminary handling of a criminal case involving the commission of a felony (delito) is conducted in an Instruction Court (Juzagdo de Instrucción). It takes place after the police turn the matter over to the judicial authorities (within 24 hours after detention of the individual). This preliminary proceeding is conducted in secret and has the elements of crime investigation assigned to the judicial branch, terminating in the indictment or release of the accused. Trial is held in provincial courts (Audiencias) before no fewer than 3 judges (magistrados). No jury is involved. Parties to the trial are: the accused or person under indictment (procesado), the attorney for the defense, the public prosecutor (Fiscal) and in certain cases a private prosecutor (acusador particular) who represents the rights of the injured party. Trial may end in a verdict declaring the accused guilty or not guilty. Sentencing in the first case then follows.

An appeal of the sentence may be filed before the Supreme Court, only on arguments that the lower court decision violated the provisions of the Law on Criminal Procedure (quebrantamiento de forma) or substantive provisions of penal law (infracción de ley). An appeal on questions of fact is not admissible.

The Supreme Court, in the first case, may order the lower court to start a new trial; in the second case, the upper court may amend the sentence issued by the lower court and increase or decrease the sanction, as the case may be, or even absolve the accused.

Cases involving misdemeanors (contravenciones) are heard before a judge (Juez correccional). Likewise, no jury is involved. After hearing the charges, the defense and evaluating the evidence submitted to him, the judge renders his decision. It is non-appealable. The sentence cannot exceed the term of six months in jail.

III. EXECUTION OF SANCTIONS

Matters concerning execution of sanctions are governed by a special statute known as Law on Execution of Sanctions of April 4, 1936,[3] enforceable as of October 8, 1938, which is the same date set forth for the enforcement of the provisions of the Code of Social Defense.

This law creates a technical body known as the Superior Council of Social Defense (Consejo Superior de Defensa Social), charged with the execution of sanctions and security measures involving deprivation of liberty. It exercises broad technical and administrative powers.

Consequently, the classification of inmates with regard to the kind of treatment that shall be applicable to them becomes essential. This is the keystone of the Cuban penitentiary system. It is based on the premise that the Administrative Organ of a Penitentiary has the right to determine the moment the sanction of deprivation of liberty shall cease, within the limits set forth by the Court in the corresponding sentence. Therefore, the base for the individualization of the execution of the sanction is really the undeterminable sentence, which has as a corollary the conditional liberty of the inmate.

Corrective treatment. The law adopts a system of correction based on compulsory studies and work.

Classification of penal establishments. They are divided into two groups: Institutes of Repression and Institutes of Prevention. The former function as prisons where persons penalized to deprivation of liberty are committed; the latter are the centers where the execution of the security measures established by the Code of Social Defense are enforced.

Probation officers. The law also makes provisions for probation officers, with powers and functions similar to those of Probation and Parole officers in the United States. They are civil officials subject to the administration of the penitentiary and are charged with the observation, care and supervision of those individuals placed on probation.

Since the Code of Social Defense was conceived on the theory of penal-treatment, it thus follows that a penitentiary must be, in effect, a reformatory; i.e., a social institution. The culprit is considered to be arrested from society, not as a penalty, but for the purposes of his instruction, reeducation, rehabilitation, discipline and regeneration.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Question 1:

The Czechoslovak Criminal Code of November 29, 1961,[1] as amended, has 301 sections and is divided into three parts: Part One, General Part (Secs. 1-90), Part Two, Special Part (Secs. 91-295), and Part Three, Transitional and Final Provisions (Secs. 296-301).

Part One consists of the following chapters: The Purpose of the Penal Code; The Foundations of Criminal Liability; The Applicability of Penal Laws; Penalties; The Extinction of Criminal Liability and Punishment; Protective Measures; Special Provisions Concerning the Prosecution of Juveniles; and General Provisions.

Part Two has the following chapters: Crimes Against the Republic; Economic Crimes; Crimes Against the Public Order; Crimes Causing Common Danger; Crimes Grossly Violating Good Civil Relations; Crimes Against the Family and Youth; Crimes Against Life and Health; Crimes Against Liberty and Human Dignity; Crimes Against Property; Crimes Against Humanity; Crimes Against Military Service; and Military Crimes.

Part Three has one chapter, entitled "Transitional and Final Provisions."

Question 2:

The numbering of the sections of the Code is consecutive. If an amendment to the text is made, the wording of the affected section is changed and the number remains the same; if an additional section is needed, then the number of sections is extended by adding the letters a, b, c, etc., after the section where the new material most appropriately belongs.

Question 3:

In order to be a crime, an act must have been committed intentionally, unless the present Code expressly provides that an act committed through negligence is punishable as a crime (Sec. 3, Subsec. 3).

The present Code makes use of two kinds of culpability: "intent" (Sec. 4), and "negligence" (Sec. 5). The following is the text of Sections 4 and 5 of the Code:[2]

Sec. 4.—A crime shall be [considered to have been] committed intentionally, if the offender

(a) wished to violate or endanger in a manner specified in the present Code an interest protected by the Present Code, or

(b) knew that his action could cause such violation or danger and, in the event of causing it, accepted the result.

Sec. 5.—A crime shall be [considered to have been] committed through negligence, if the offender

(a) knew that he could, in the manner specified in the present Code, violate or endanger an interest protected by the present Code, but without adequate reasons depended on not causing such violation or danger, or

(b) did not know that his action could cause such violation or danger although, considering the circumstances and his personal situation, he should have known it.

The intent may be direct (knowledge is required—Sec. 4, letter (a)) or indirect (volition is required—Sec. 4, letter (b). In both forms of intent, the offender must have known that by his act he might violate or endanger an interest protected by the present Code in a manner specified in the present Code; however, in the case of direct intent, the offender directly wished to violate or endanger such an interest, whereas in the case of indirect intent; the offender did not wish to cause the violation or endangerment of such interest directly, but realized that such a violation or endangerment would take place. The intent must be established by the court on the basis of the facts and evidence.[3]

Section 5 recognizes two kinds of negligence, which the theory terms 'conscious' and 'unconscious' negligence.[4]

Conscious negligence is present when the offender knew that he might violate or endanger said interest; however, he did not understand that he would cause such a violation or endangerment, but trusted without adequate reasons that his act would not cause it. There is a lack of volition in the person of the offender which makes the difference as regards indirect intent.

Unconscious negligence is present when the offender did not know that his action could cause such a violation or danger. The difference between an unintentional violation or danger (i.e., not a criminal case) and unconscious negligence is that the offender should have known it considering the circumstances and his personal situation.

Guilt must be established, not innocence. Section 2, Subsection 2, of the Code of Criminal Procedure reads:[5] "No person prosecuted in penal proceedings shall be viewed as being guilty until his guilt has been pronounced in a judgment which has become legally valid."

Question 4:

The "proximate cause" between conduct and result is not expressly mentioned in the Code; however, in the chain of causation, such proximity must be established in order to find the offender guilty. The proximate cause is present if the result could not have taken place without the offender's action. If his action is one of the proximate causes of the result, then it is necessary to establish a so-called degree of causation in bringing about the result. Of course, the offender is criminally liable only if he caused the result intentionally or by negligence.[6]

Question 5.

Insanity is dealt with in Section 12, Subsection 1 of the Code, entitled "Insanity" which reads as follows:

(1) A person who, due to mental disorder, was unable at the time of the crime to recognize its danger to society or to control his action shall not be criminally liable for the crime.

Insanity is not defined in the Code. However, the mental disorder must be such that the offender was unable to recognize the danger of his act to society or to control it. The quesion of insanity is a legal question which must be decided by the court on the basis of the facts found.[7]

If the offender was insane at the time when the crime was perpetrated, he is not criminally liable. An insane person may not be prosecuted, found guilty or be convicted. The prosecution must be stayed and if insanity was established during the main trial, the sentence must call for an acquittal.

The procedural aspects of insanity are handled in the Code of Criminal Procedure in the following manner:

In the preparatory proceedings, which are carried out by the Office of the Public Prosecutor or by an investigating agency, the public prosecutor stays the criminal prosecution, if the accused was not criminally liable at the time of the crime because of insanity (Sec. 1.2, Subsec. 1, letter (e) of the CCP).

In the judicial proceedings, the presiding judge may order a preliminary review of the indictment, if he is of the opinion that the accused was insane (Sec. 186, Subsec. 1, letter (c) of the CCP), and after having reviewed the indictment, the court must stay the prosecution, if the accused was found insane (Sec. 188, Subsec. 1, letter (d) of the CCP).

The court must acquit the defendant if he is not criminally liable due to insanity (Sec. 226, letter (d) of the CCP).

The psychiatric examination of the accused is regulated by Sections 116 and 117 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. They read as follows:

Sec. 116.—(1) If the mental health of the accused must be examined, two expert witnesses from the field of psychiatry shall always be called to do so.

(2) If the psychiatric examination cannot be carried out otherwise, the court and, in preparatory proceedings, the prosecutor, or, with the prosecutor's approval, the investigating organ, may order that a person accused of a crime be observed in a medical institution or, if the accused is in custody, in a special department of the penal institution. This decision may be contested by complaint which shall have dilatory effect.

(3) If the expert witnesses find that the accused shows signs of insanity or lessened sanity, they shall at the same time express their opinion whether his freedom would be dangerous.

Sec. 117.—Psychiatric observation shall not last longer than two months; the opinion shall be submitted within this term; at the warranted request of the expert witnesses, the court and, in preparatory proceedings, the prosecutor or, with the prosecutor's consent, the investigating organ, may extend the term, but not longer than by one month. The extension of the term may be contested by complaint.

The Criminal Code provides for protective therapy as a protective measure for a person who commits an otherwise criminal act and is not criminally liable because of insanity and his continued stay at large would be dangerous.

This protective therapy may be ordered in addition to a penalty or if the punishment is waived. It shall be provided as a rule in a medical institution and shall continue as long as its purpose so requires. Release from protective therapy may be ordered only by the court. The execution will be stopped by the court if the circumstances for which it had been ordered change before its commencement (Sec. 72 of the Code).

Protective therapy may also be ordered for an offender who commits a crime in a state of impaired sanity (or a state approaching insanity) and his stay at large is dangerous. Impaired sanity is a state in which, due to mental disorder at the time of the crime, the ability of the offender to recognize that his act is dangerous to society or the ability to control his action was substantially decreased.[8] Such persons are criminally liable; however, the court may waive punishment if it is of the opinion that the protective therapy which it is simultaneously ordering will ensure the offender's rehabilitation and the protection of society better than a penalty (Sec. 25 of the Code). The court will also take the state of reduced sanity into consideration when determining the type and extent of penalty. Section 32 of the Code reads as follows:

[7] Id. at 68.
[8] Id. at 104–105.

Sec. 32.—(1) If the offender committed the crime in a state approaching insanity and did not induce himself into such state, even through negligence, by having taken an alcoholic beverage or a drug, the court shall take this circumstance into consideration when determining the type and extent of penalty.

(2) If the court holds that in view of such an offender's state of health the purpose of the penalty can be achieved by a lesser penalty paralleled by protective therapy (Sec. 72), it shall reduce the term of imprisonment below the minimum term, not being bound by the restriction listed in Section 40.

At the trial, if the court finds that there are grounds for ordering protective therapy with respect to the defendant, it may be ordered even in the absence of a motion by the prosecutor. If the court requires further evidence for its decision which cannot be immediately produced, the court will reserve the decision concerning protective therapy for a public session (Sec. 230 of the CCP).

Question 6:

A person who induced in himself a state of insanity, even through negligence, by taking an alcoholic beverage or a narcotic drug, is not criminally liable (Sec. 12, Subsec. 2 of the Code). The reason given by the official Statement Accompanying the Bill on the Criminal Code for such liability when a crime was committed in a state of self-induced drunkenness is "a consistent fight against alcoholism." [9]

In some instances the circumstance that the crime was committed under the influence of alcohol will bring a higher sentence (for instance, when an offender committed a crime while performing his duty in his employment, occupation, position or office, Sec. 180, Subsec. 2, letter b; or Sec. 224, Subsec. 2 of the Code) or will be considered as a common aggravating circumstance.

There are other restrictions in the Code concerning intoxication. The provision of Section 25 on a waiver of punishment in case of a state approaching insanity in connection with protective therapy (see above) does not apply, "if the offender had induced in himself the state approaching insanity, even through negligence, by taking an alcoholic beverage or a drug" (Sec. 25, second sentence).

The state approaching insanity caused by intoxication will not be taken into consideration in determining the type and extent of the penalty (see above).

If an offender addicted to the excessive consumption of an alcoholic beverage or narcotic drug commits a crime while drunk or in a similar state of intoxication (chronic alcoholism, morphinism, and similar cases), the court may order protective therapy (Sec. 72, Subsec. 2, letter b).[10]

Question 7:

Self-defense, duress (extreme necessity) and the justified use of weapons are spelled out in Sections 13, 14, and 15 of the Code: the principles are stated in general terms. As to necessary defense, the Code specifies that an otherwise punishable act by which a person averts a directly threatening or continuing attack on any interest protected under the Code shall not be considered a crime. However, it is not a necessary defense, if the defense was clearly out of proportion to the nature and danger of the attack. Extreme necessity is defined as an otherwise punishable act by which a person averts a danger directly threatening an interest protected by the Code. However, it is not an extreme necessity, if under the given circumstances, the danger could have been otherwise averted or if the resulting consequence is clearly as serious or even more serious than the one which had threatened. And finally, the justified use of a weapon is not a crime, if the person used the weapon "within the scope of the authority provided by the respective legal regulations."

Question 8:

The Czechoslovak Criminal Code deals only with "criminal acts." Misdemeanors, that is acts which do not reach the same degree of danger for society

---

[9] Id. at 67 and 69–73.
[10] Id. at 223.

as do criminal acts, are now handled in a special Law on Misdemeanors of December 18, 1969, No. 150 Sb.

Question 9:

The provisions on sentencing are in Chapter Four (Secs. 23–64). Sections 58–60 deal with a suspended sentence which is a suspension on probation of the execution of a penalty, and Sections 61–64 handle the release of a convicted person on parole, and suspension of the execution of an unexpired penalty prohibiting a convicted person from engaging in a specific activity. Probation is a form of suspension of a sentence.

A person so released is under the supervision of a public organization (Trade Union organizations; Youth organizations) which takes reponsibility for his good behavior.

The Code provides for determinate sentences of imprisonment stating, as a rule, the maximum, or the minimum and the maximum terms of imprisonment, for instance, "up to one year," or "six months to three years."

The Code provides for "imprisonment of especially dangerous repeaters," in Sections 41 and 42. After the definition of especially dangerous repeaters, the maximum term of imprisonment set by the Code is raised by one third for them. The court must impose a penalty in the upper half of this term. However, the maximum term of imprisonment may not exceed fifteen years even after the increase.

The minimum term of imprisonment is not set in the Code; however, the maximum term is fifteen years (Sec. 39, Subsec. 1).

The system of release on parole is established in Sections 61–64. The court may release a convicted person on parole after he has served one half of the prison term (two-thirds for the crimes enumerated in Sec. 62) to which he had been sentenced, if he has demonstrated by his model behavior and his honest attitude toward work that he has reformed and he may be expected to lead an orderly life of a working man in the future, or if the court accepts the guarantee offered by the public organization for completing his reform. When releasing a convict on parole, the court sets a probation period of from one to 7 years. The court may impose suitable restrictions on the parolee designed to make him lead an orderly life of a working man; it may also order him to compensate according to his ability for the damage he caused by his crime.

Publicity to a conviction (Sec. 3007 of the Draft) is not mentioned in the Code.

Every judgment must include reasons in writing (Secs. 120 and 129 of the CCP). The judgments are subject to review on appeal by a higher court (Sec. 252 of the CCP).

The appellate court may increase as well as decrease a sentence. Both the government and the defendant may appeal a sentence (Sec. 246 of the CCP). However, a judgment to the detriment of the defendant may only be appealed by the prosecutor (Secs. 247, Subsec. 1 and Sec. 259, Subsec. 4 of the CCP).

Complaints against violations of the law and the respective proceedings are spelled out in Chapter 17 (Secs. 266–276 of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

The Code provides for a joint and supplementary sentence in Sections 35–38. If the court sentences the offender for two or more crimes, it imposes a joint penalty upon him according to the legal provision relating to the crime which is subject to the strictest punishment. The court imposes a supplementary penalty under the same principle, when it sentences the offender for a crime he had committed before the court of the first instance pronounced the sentence for another crime he had committed.

When imposing a supplementary penalty, the court at the same time voids the penalty imposed on the offender by the previous verdict. Consequently, if one but not all of the convictions in a joint sentence is reversed on appeal, the new sentence must repeal the previous sentence to the joint penalties and issue a new penalty.[11]

The supplementary penalty may not be less than the previously imposed penalty. If the court sentences an offender for a crime he had committed before the penalty imposed upon him by a previous verdict was executed, and imposes a penalty of the same type, such penalty, together with the unexecuted part of the previously imposed penalty, may not exceed the maximum rate permissible under the Code for this type of penalty.

In regard to the imposition of fines, the court may impose a pecuniary penalty in an amount ranging from 500 to 50,000 crowns as a separate penalty only in cases where the Code, in its Special Part, permits the imposition of this penalty and if, in view of the nature of the crime and the possibility of reforming the offender, no other penalty is necessary for achieving the purpose of punishment. The court may impose a pecuniary penalty in addition to another penalty, if, by his premeditated criminal activity, the offender acquired or tried to acquire pecuniary gain (Sec. 53 of the Code). When fixing a pecuniary penalty, the court takes into consideration the offender's personal and property situation; it does not impose a pecuniary penalty if it is clear that the penalty would be irrecoverable.

The execution of a pecuniary penalty is handled in Sections 341–344 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. As soon as a judgment requiring the payment of a pecuniary penalty becomes final, the presiding judge orders the convicted person to pay the penalty within fifteen days, warning him that otherwise the payment will be enforced. For serious reasons, the presiding judge may postpone the payment or allow the payment to be made in installments. The court waives the execution of a pecuniary penalty if it is apparent that its attempt at enforcement would be of no avail.

Question 10:

The Criminal Code does not regulate expressly the effect of a mistake in committing a crime. The principles underlying it can be interpreted from the provisions concerning guilt (Secs. 4, 5, and 6). Mistake of law is not a defense under the Code.[12] Mistake of facts, generally speaking, obviates the knowledge which is required for intent, and, therefore, there is no criminal liability.

Question 11:

The separation of the jurisdictional basis from the definition of the offense is not dealt with in the Codes.

Question 12:

Extraterritorial jurisdiction is regulated in Sections 17–20 of the Code. The provisions of this Code are applicable to all crimes committed within the territorial limits of the country (territoriality principle). They also apply to crimes committed abroad by a Czechoslovak citizen or stateless resident of Czechoslovakia (personality principle). The protective principle and the universality principle are spelled out in Section 19 by which the Code also applies to certain crimes committed abroad to the detriment of Czechoslovakia or society at large by an alien or a stateless person who is not a resident of Czechoslovakia; the crimes are enumerated therein. This law also applies in determining the punishability of a crime committed abroad by an alien or a stateless person who is not a resident of Czechoslovakia, if the crime is punishable also under the law in force on the territory where it was committed, and if the offender is apprehended on the territory of Czechoslovakia and is not extradited for criminal prosecution to a foreign state (the subsidiary universality principle).

Question 13:

The Code does not explicitly provide for criminal conspiracy. According to Sections 9 and 10, a crime may be committed either by one person, the offender, or by the joint action of two or more persons. In such a case, each one of them will be criminally liable as if he alone had committed the crime (accomplices). The Code defines a participant in a completed crime or in an attempt to commit a crime as a person who with intent organizes or directs the commission of the crime (the organizer), instigates another person to commit the crime (the instigator), or who assists another person to commit the crime, in particular by providing the means for doing so, removing obstacles, giving advice, strengthening the intent, or promising help after the crime has been committed (accessory).

Question 14:

The "felony-murder" rule is not dealt with in the Code. In order to commit a crime, intent is necessary.

Question 15:

In federated Czechoslovakia, there are Czech courts for the Czech Socialist Republic and Slovak courts for the Slovak Socialist Republic. The only courts common to both states are the Supreme Court of the Czechoslovak Republic and certain military courts.[13]

As to the provisions on rioting and mass demonstrations, the Code has similar provisions on sedition (Sec. 92), which is a crime committed by a person who, acting with the intent to undermine the socialist social and governmental system, territorial integrity or defensive capacity of the Republic or to destroy its independence, participates in forcible acts or mass disturbances against the Republic, its organs or public organizations of the working people, or engages in other especially dangerous activities against the foundations of the Republic or its important international interests.

Question 16:

The present Criminal Code has no provisions concerning para-military activities, because the unauthorized carrying of weapons is a crime under Section 185 (See Question 18 following). The right to carry or possess a weapon is subject to a license.

Question 17:

As to "crimes without victims," the Code for instance in connection with homosexuality (Sec. 244) states that a person who accepts or makes payment for sexual relations with a person of the same sex, or causes a public nuisance by sexual relations with a person of the same sex shall be held criminally liable. According to Section 203, a person shall be guilty of parasitism when he consistently avoids honest work and makes his living through prostitution, gambling, or in some other improper manner, and shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of up to two years. This text was changed in 1963 so that, instead of prostitution and gambling, a more general term was accepted, and the sentence was increased to three years.

Question 18:

The Code has a provision concerning firearms and explosives in Section 185 entitled "Unauthorized Arming:"

(1) Whoever, without being authorized,

(a) obtains for himself or another person or has in his possession a weapon of mass effect or parts essential for the use of such weapon, or

(b) accumulates, manufactures or procures for himself or another person weapons, ammunition or explosives, shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of up to three years.

(2) The offender shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of one to five years,

(a) if he commits the act described in paragraph 1 on a larger scale, or

(b) if he commits such act under a state of defense emergency.

Question 19:

The Czechoslovak law provides for capital punishment as an extraordinary penalty which a court may impose under the conditions spelled out in the Criminal Code, Sections 29 and 30. Under certain circumstances, the death sentence may be imposed, for instance, for high treason, sedition, terrorism, sabotage, espionage, common menace, and murder. The Code does not provide for separate hearings to determine the sentence in a capital case. However, the Code of Criminal Procedure (Secs. 316–319) provides that, if the judgment imposing a death penalty has become final, the presiding judge shall submit the files to the Supreme Court for a review. And only if the judgment has been unaffected by the review and the court has been advised that there has been no petition for pardon or that such petition has been rejected, may the death penalty be executed.

Question 20:

The Czechoslovak criminal procedural system provides for a joinder of prosecution. In Section 20, Subsection 1, the Code of Criminal Procedure spells out that joint proceedings shall be carried out with respect to all the crimes committed by an accused person and with respect to all others whose crimes are related. A similar provision applies to the investigation: if it is necessary to initiate an investigation of at least one criminal act, the investigation shall be made of all the criminal acts of the same accused and against all the accused whose crimes are related (Sec. 161, Subsec. 3).

[13] Law on Court Organization and Elections of Judges of February 26, 1964, No. 36 Sb., as amended. Republished in No. 13/1970 Sb., issue No. 5 of March 20, 1970.

Egypt

The history of modern Egypt starts with the accession of Mohammad Aly. Very little appears to be known as to the methods of administration of criminal justice under this monarch.

The occupation of Egypt by Napoleon is considered as the first in a series of events which gradually brought it into closer contact with Europe, and especially with France. French influence began to be apparent in substantive and adjective criminal law. The dominance of French culture in Egypt had led to the introduction of French law as the basis of the Mixed Codes—Civil, Commercial and Criminal. Turkey had also borrowed largely from French sources in her Penal Code, issued in 1858. There were, therefore, adequate precedents for recourse to the French Codes when the time arrived for the compilation of a Native Penal Code.[1] The Egyptian Penal Code, promulgated on November 13, 1883, was consequently little more than an abbreviated reproduction of the French Code of 1810.

There is sufficient similarity between the principles of criminal law in all countries to make such wholesale importation less objectionable than it might be thought. Time and experience would bring with them adaptation and improvement.

A penal code is never an exhaustive statement of the penal law. It professes to do little more than provide for the punishment of the graver offenses. To obtain a complete acquaintance with the penal law it would be necessary to study a number of supplementary laws and decrees making punishable various acts of an anti-social character, generally, though not always, less serious than those mentioned in the code. Such supplementary laws sometimes profess to be additions to or alterations of the code, but more frequently they are only supplementary thereto.

Between 1883 and 1904 a large number of laws and decrees of this kind were promulgated in Egypt. Many of these were superseded either by later laws or by the revised Code of 1904. The revised Penal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure were promulgated February 14, 1904, and came into force April 15, 1904. The revision was by no means complete. The General Part (Articles 1–69) of the Penal Code was rewritten and important alterations made in other respects. Continental codes were drawn upon, in particular the Italian Penal Code of 1889, and certain articles from the Indian Penal Code were also introduced.

In 1937 the Egyptian legislature promulgated a new penal code as Law No. 58 of 1937. This code was applied by the Native and the Mixed Courts until the latter were abolished and their jurisdiction transferred to the Native Courts.

The Penal Code of 1937 is still in force today, but it has gone through numerous amendments and many supplementary laws have been added to it. Egypt, through its Court of Cassation, has developed its own jurisdiction concerning many criminal law principles. This mass of jurisprudence is strictly based on the needs of the Egyptian society. Although certain articles of the Egyptian Code may resemble those of the French, Italian or Indian, their interpretation and implementation is strictly Egyptian.

Question 1. Structure:

The Egyptian Penal Code is divided into four books, each book is divided into chapters and sections, and each section contains the pertinent articles, as follows.

---

[1] The extraterritoriality in Egypt created a dual system of law and administration of justice—one the Mixed Courts which applied Mixed Codes on foreigners and Egyptians, and the other a Native Courts system which applied Native Codes promulgated for the purpose of applying such codes on Egyptian nationals only.

BOOK I. PRELIMINARY PROVISIONS

Chapter 1. General Principles. Articles 1–8 are concerned with the application of criminal law.

Chapter 2. Classification of offenses. Articles 9–12 classify offenses into three kinds: crimes, misdemeanors and contraventions.

Chapter 3. Punishment. Articles 13–38 classify punishment into criminal, correctional and contraventional, as well as substantive and subsidiary punishments. The substantive penalties are mentioned in Articles 13–23. The subsidiary penalties are enumerated in Articles 24–31. They are subsidiary because they cannot be imposed except together with a substantive punishment. Articles 32–38 discuss co-existent penalties or cumulative penalties.

Section 1. Under substantive penalties the following are listed: death, penal servitude (either for life or for a specific term), imprisonment, detention, fine, committal to a reformatory school, and surrender of the juvenile to his guardian.

Section 2. Under subsidiary penalties the following are listed: deprivation of rights and privileges, dismissal from public office, police supervision, and confiscation.

Section 3. This section discusses co-existent penalties under Articles 32–38.

Chapter 4. Principals and accessories; Articles 39–44.

Chapter 5. Attempt; Articles 45–47.

Chapter 6. Criminal conspiracy; Article 48.

Chapter 7. Recidivism; Articles 49–54.

Chapter 8. Conditional sentences; Articles 55–59.

Chapter 9. Acts done in exercise of a general right; Articles 60–63.

Chapter 10. Juvenile offenders; Articles 64–73.

Chapter 11. Pardon and amnesty; Articles 74–76.

BOOK II. CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS AGAINST THE PUBLIC INTEREST AND THEIR PUNISHMENT

Chapter 1. Crimes committed against the external safety of the State; Articles 77–85.

Chapter 2. Crimes and misdemeanors committed against the internal safety of the State; Articles 86–102.

Chapter 2 bis. Explosives; Articles 102A–102F (this whole section was added by Law No. 50 of 1949).

Chapter 3. Bribery and corruption; Articles 103–111.

Chapter 4. Malversation of public funds; Articles 112–119 bis.

Chapter 5. Misuse of official position; Articles 120–125.

Chapter 6. Employment of violence, etc., by public servants; Articles 126–132.

Chapter 7. Resistance and disobedience towards public authorities; Articles 133–137 bis A.

Chapter 8. Escape from custody and harboring fugitives; Articles 138–146.

Chapter 9. Breaking of seals and abstraction of papers from official custody; Articles 147–154.

Chapter 10. Unlawful assumption of titles, ranks, or office; Articles 155–159.

Chapter 11. Offenses relating to creeds; Articles 160–161.

Chapter 12. Damage to buildings, monuments, and other public things; Article 162.

Chapter 13. Offenses relating to means of communication; Articles 163–170.

Chapter 14. Offenses by means of the press; Articles 171–201 bis.

Chapter 15. Coinage and counterfeiting offenses; Articles 202–205.

Chapter 16. Forgery; Articles 206–227.

Chapter 17. Trade in contraband and forgery of postal and telegraph insignia; Articles 228–229.

BOOK III. CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS AGAINST INDIVIDUALS

Chapter 1. Homicide, wounds and blows; Articles 230–251 bis.

Chapter 2. Willful arson; Articles 252–259.

Chapter 3. Abortion, and the manufacturing, selling, and adulteration of drugs; Articles 260–266.

Chapter 4. Offenses against decency and morality (rape and indecent acts); Articles 267–279.

Chapter 5. Unlawful arrest, kidnapping, abduction, and abandonment of family; Articles 280–293.
Chapter 6. False evidence; Articles 294–301.
Chapter 7. Defamation, insults, and disclosure of secrets; Articles 302–310.
Chapter 8. Theft and extortion; Articles 311–327.
Chapter 9. Criminal bankruptcy; Articles 328–335.
Chapter 10. False pretense and abuse of confidence in respect to property entrusted; Articles 336–343.
Chapter 11. Interference with freedom of auctions and deception in trade; Articles 344–351.
Chapter 12. Games of chance and lotteries; Articles 352–353.
Chapter 13. Willful damage; Articles 354–368.
Chapter 14. Criminal trespass; Articles 369–373.
Chapter 15. Abstention from work in public utilities and interference with freedom of labor; Articles 374–375.

BOOK IV. CONTRAVENTIONS

Contraventions concerning:
Public roads; Article 376
Public safety; Articles 377–380
Public health; Articles 381–384
Public morals; Article 385
Public authorities; Article 386
Property; Articles 387–389
Weights and measures; Article 390
Persons; Articles 391–394
All contraventions listed in local and municipal decrees; Article 395.

Question 2. The numbering system:

The numbering is complete, no space is left blank, and additions are made by means of having the numbers of the provisions added to them as "bis" or "bis A" as it is shown in this Code.

Question 3. Mental elements:

The Egyptian Penal Code, like most European codes, depends on the jurisprudence and the decisions of higher courts on the question of the mental attitude of the offender towards the acts constituting the offense. However, the mental attitude is usually specified in the article which covers the offense. There are cerain general exceptions to criminal responsibility on grounds of justifiable actions, such as self defense; mental conditions, such as insanity and influence of drugs; and the acts of public officials under certain circumstances.

Commentators on the Egyptian Penal Code discuss, in this regard, what they call the elements which contribute towards the fixation of responsibility. They list these elements as:

(1) Knowledge of law; (2) knowledge of fact, and (3) intention and wrongful intention, which is referred to as malice. The offender has foreseen the act which constitutes the offense and he directs his mind towards its realization. This state of mind is expressed in the Code by the use of words such as "willfully," "wrongfully," and "intentionally."

Negligence is said to be a very vague term and consequently is difficult to define. However, the commentators use it to describe the state of mind of the man who is not aware of the possible consequences of his act, or is imprudent in determining what those consequences will be.

A distinction between "willful" omissions and "negligent" omissions is usually drawn in discussing this topic.

Question 4. Causal relationship:

The Egyptian Penal Code does not mention the "causal relationship between conduct and result" at all. However, commentators on the Code discuss this subject and cite decisions of the Egyptian Court of Cassation. It seems that the Egyptian legislature has left it to the discretion of the courts to interpret the "causal relationship" according to the circumstances of each case individually. The trend in many new penal codes of the world is toward including the principle of "causal relationship" in the code.

Question 5. Mental defect as a defense:

Article 62 of the Egyptian Penal Code provides:

No person shall be liable to punishment for any act committed at a time when he has lost power of appreciating the nature of his acts or of controlling them by reason of:

(1) Insanity or mental infirmity; or

(2) Intoxication caused by intoxicants of any kind administered to him against his will or without his knowledge.

The nature of insanity and its effect upon legal responsibility is a much-discussed and difficult question, particularly so because it is in part legal and in part medical.

The commentators on the Egyptian Penal Code include under insanity and mental infirmity lunatics, hypnotized persons, and persons who walk in their sleep. The Penal Code limits the irresponsibility of the insane to cases in which the disease or infirmity prevents the person from appreciating the nature of his acts or from controlling them. It does not say that wherever insanity exists there shall be irresponsibility. This article resembles those of several other countries, notably England, Italy and Germany, in that it provides the judge with tests by which he may determine whether the accused is legally insane, instead of making it necessary for him to decide the medical question as to whether the individual is technically insane.

The question has been much discussd as to whether it is advisable for the criminal law to define the conditions under which insanity frees one from responsibility. It is at least clear that the mere fact that the accused might be pronounced insane by medical experts ought not necessarily to free him. No authoritative definition of insanity has ever been given, and many forms of mental aberration are recognized by some as insane, though the ordinary citizen would be averse to treating them as affecting responsibility.

Criminal law is not concerned primarily with mental responsibility. It lays down rules excusing or exempting from penal liability those cases where the community recognizes that punishment would be unjust or useless, but where these rules do not apply it declines to permit the courts to deny liability because in their opinion circumstances or the mental peculiarities of the accused produced the crime. From this point of view it does not seem unreasonable for the law to demand that the medical evidence shall show, and that the judges shall find, that the insanity of the accused prevented him from knowing what he was doing or from controlling his acts. Only in such cases shall insanity be a defense.

The Egyptian Penal Code speaks of mental infirmity as well as of insanity, but does not indicate what it means by this distinction. Some commentators are of the opinion that mental infirmity was intended to include all temporary deprivations of intellectual power, such as somnambulism, delirium, epileptic seizures, etc., which do not constitute insanity, but produce for the time being the same effects. Whether this is the meaning of the term "mental infirmity" or not, it is considered quite certain that nobody is responsible for acts done under these conditions. The absence of any mental accompaniment frees the doer from responsibility. The Code further speaks of tests of irresponsibility, with reference to the intellect and the will. A defect of intellect arising from insanity, such as to prevent a person from appreciating the nature of his acts, frees him from responsibility. So also does a defect of will, which prevents him from controlling his acts.

The plea of insanity is no defense unless insanity at the time of the commission of the offense is proved, but a person may be insane when the offense is prosecuted, or he may be proved insane after conviction. Generally speaking, all persons found to be insane who have been accused of a criminal offense, convicted of a criminal offense, or acquitted of an accusation on the ground of insanity, are treated in the same way; that is, ordered to be detained as criminal lunatics in some establishment from which they may be released when they are deemed no longer to be dangerous. The Criminal Code of Egypt provides several complete provisions dealing with insane persons of all classes. Some of the cases dealt with are as follows:

(1) A person accused of an offense appears to be insane. He cannot, therefore, be tried. It may be desirable to intern him as a criminal lunatic by order of the investigating judge at the preliminary enquiry or by the order of the judge during trial, if his insanity does not become apparent until the trial has started.

(2) A person accused of an offense pleads that he was insane when he committed the offense or, without a plea, the probability arises that he was insane. If in this case the accused is sane at the time of the trial he can be tried, and the Court, admitting his plea, may acquit him and order his detention as a criminal lunatic.

(3) A person convicted of an offense may afterwards become insane or be proved insane:

a. It sometimes happens that a person sentenced to death is found afterwards to be insane. The executive authorities in such a case usually remit the death penalty and order detention as a criminal lunatic. Under the Egyptian Constitution the President of Egypt has the power to remit the death penalty and order detention.

b. A person undergoing imprisonment may exhibit signs of insanity. Power is given under Law No. 141 of 1944, concerning the detention of mentally sick persons not accused of any offense, that the prisoner is transferred to a hospital for the mentally diseased and detained for treatment until considered no longer dangerous, regardless of length of time.

Question 6. Drunkenness:

Section 2 of Article 62 of the Egyptian Penal Code speaks of intoxication as follows:

Intoxication caused by intoxicants of any kind administered to him against his will or without his knowledge.

The commentators on this section have interpreted this to cover all intoxicants such as alcoholic beverages and drugs, including opium, morphia, and cocaine.

Drunkenness or intoxication brought about by the use of drugs or alcohol is a kind of temporary insanity. Yet when brought about voluntarily, the intoxicated person is held responsible for his acts, even though he did not contemplate the crime before taking the drug. A man who willfully subjects himself to temptation can hardly request indulgence. The position is different when the drug was administered without his knowledge or against his will, and this is recognized by the above-cited Section 2 of Article 62. It is concluded that voluntary drunkenness is not regarded as entitling a person to exemption from responsibility for his acts, but involuntary drunkenness and diseases caused by voluntary drunkenness do constitute a title to such exemption. Certain writers on this matter prefer to hold the intoxicated person liable only so far as negligence. These writers hold that intention is not an element in the offense, since the state of temporary insanity excludes intention.

The state of temporary insanity produced by intoxication must be distinguished from the permanent state of mental disorder which long indulgence will bring about and which is just as much a ground for exemption from responsibility as are other forms of insanity. Before the stage of insanity is reached, however, the habitual drunkard has long lost all real control over his indulgence and should not be treated as a responsible person. He should be treated the same as the insane person.

Question 7. Acts done in exercise of general right:

Articles 60–63 of the Egyptian Penal Code speak of acts done in exercise of a general right as follows:

Article 60.—An act done in good faith and in the exercise of a right recognized by law does not come within the scope of the Penal Code.

This article is interpreted by the Court of Cassation to be a general statement of a well-recognized principle. A right to use force is clearly recognized by law according to this article. A right of correction of children and young people, for example, by persons having the authority of parents is justifiable under the law. Such right must be exercised in good faith and the punishment inflicted must be moderate, according to commentators on this article. A father who chastises his child beyond measure, and causes his death, would be liable to punishment for homicide by negligence at least.

Article 61.—No person shall be liable to punishment for an offense to the commission of which he was constrained by the necessity of preserving himself or another from a great and imminent bodily danger, to which he has not voluntarily given rise and which he could not avoid by any other means.

Constraint as a defense may be used in four different circumstances:

(1) Irresistible compulsion—in this case the person has been compelled to do the act by force used against him which he is powerless to resist.

(2) Threats—in this case the person has done the act when over-awed by threats made to him of some evil which will be done to him unless he complies.

(3) Attacks made by another—though it is possible to make use of the defense of constraint in the case of acts done in repelling attacks made upon oneself or another, it is more usual to make use of the plea of lawful defense.

(4) Necessity—the case of necessity arises when circumstances alone place a person in a situation in which a choice of acts is presented to him. He can, for example, only escape from some danger by committing an offense.

According to Article 62, the conditions of non-responsibility are as follows:

(1) There must be a danger threatening the doer or another.

(2) That danger must be great and imminent. The term "great danger" means in this article "danger of a great evil." Whether the threatening evil was of sufficient gravity to justify the act will be decided by the court according to its appreciation of the circumstances. In every case the danger must be great, and not merely great in proportion to the gravity of the offense committed.

The danger must also be imminent. Fear of future injury will not excuse the commission of an offense. Thus, threats, which serve as a defense under this article, must give rise to an apprehension of instant execution. They must produce instant alarm.

(3) The danger must be one of bodily evil. To destroy a neighbor's house in order to preserve one's own from fire may be a criminal offense unless it was done to save a life. But the Court would no doubt treat the circumstances as extenuating.

(4) The victim of the constraint must not have voluntarily brought about the danger which he seeks to avoid in committing the offense.

(5) The danger must be unavoidable except by commission of the offense.

Cases of constraint which fall under this Article must be distinguished from cases of lawful defense, dealt with by Articles 245–251, which will follow. Lawful defense is a form of constraint, and is allowed as a justification for the above-mentioned reasons. Lawful defense is, however, distinguishable from other modes of constraint in that the act which justifies a lawful act of defense is committed against the aggressor himself, the author of the constraint.

Article 61 speaks also of necessity. The evil which threatens a man does not, perhaps, arise from the threats of others used for the purpose of urging him to commit an offense. It may arise independently of such threats by the mere combination of untoward circumstances. In such a case a man will be impelled to injure another either in person or property in order to save himself or to succor some third party.

As it has been discussed by many writers on this matter, the real ground for exemption from criminal responsibility in all the cases involving constraint is that no social advantage can follow from the infliction of penalty. Law exists for the society, not the society for the law. The infliction of punishment is itself a social evil, and cannot be justified unless some greater social advantage may be expected to follow.

The history of criminal law shows that the State, as it increased in power, interfered first to regulate and afterwards to forbid the use of self-help, and that gradually the crime ceased to be regarded as private injury and partook more and more of the character of a public offense. Finally, the State now claims the exclusive right to punish crime and indeed is prepared also to punish any who derogate from its right by taking upon themselves that function of punishment which belongs to it alone.

The subject of lawful defense is dealt with in Articles 245–251. These articles are placed among those dealing with offenses against the person, and not in the General Part of the Code.

The effect of these articles may be briefly stated to mean that homicide, wounds or blows committed or inflicted in defense of person or property are not punished, although willful homicide can only be committed with impunity when the act to be repelled is of a specially grave character. In all cases the right is exercisable only when the protection of the law is not available and only exceptionally so when it is a representative of public authority carrying out the duties of his office who is opposed. The exercise of the right is definitely authorized in the case of all offenses against the person and certain specific offenses against property. These articles also state the measure of the violence to be employed. The court is given power to mitigate the ordinary penalty in cases in which the person defending himself used excessive violence in exercise of his right but has acted in good faith. In every case in which lawful defense is claimed as a justification it must be shown that the danger which threatened was imminent. Violence used to prevent the realization of threats is not justified. If, therefore, there is time to have recourse to the protection of the legal authorities, acts of self defense against the threatened evil are not permitted. Since violence can be used in self defense only and not by way of retaliation, or to remedy an injury already done, the right to use it ceases when the peril is past and the evil consummated.

The right of lawful defense extends, it would seem, not only to defense of our own person and property but also to the person and property of others. Of course, it may well happen that a person, whether defending himself or assisting in the defense of another, would be entitled to plead in words of Article 61, that he was constrained to commit an offense by the necessity of preserving himself or another from a great and imminent bodily danger. But the plea of constraint is often available in cases which clearly do not come within the conditions of lawful defense.

The subject of self defense is covered under Articles 245–251, as follows:

Article 245.—Whoever commits homicide, inflicts any wound or deals any blow in the exercise of the right of lawful defence of his person or property or of the person or property of another, shall be exempt from any penalty. The circumstances under which such right arises and the restrictions to which it is subject are defined in the following articles.

Article 246.—Subject to the exceptions hereinafter enumerated, the right of lawful defence of the person authorizes the employment of the force necessary to repel any act constituting an offence under any of Chapters II, VIII, XIII, and XIV of Book III or under Article 287, §(1) or Article 389, §(1) or §(3).

Article 247.—The right does not exist in cases in which there is time to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities.

Article 248.—The right of lawful defence does not excuse resistance to any representative of public authority who is acting in good faith and in his official capacity, even in a case where such representative is acting in excess of his powers, unless his acts cause a reasonable apprehension that death or serious wounds will result therefrom.

Article 249.—The right of lawful defence of the person can only justify willful homicide when the act to be repelled is:

(1) An attack which causes a reasonable apprehension that death or serious wounds will result therefrom; or
(2) Rape or indecent assault with violence; or
(3) Abduction.

Article 250.—The right of lawful defence of property can only justify willful homicide when the act to be repelled is:

(1) Some offence falling under Chapter II of Book III; or
(2) A criminal theft; or
(3) Entry into an inhabited house or its curtilage during the night; or
(4) An attack which causes a reasonable apprehension that death or serious wounds will result therefrom.

Article 251.—When a person in the exercise in good faith of the right of lawful defence, and with intent to inflict only such injury as such defence requires, nevertheless exceeds the limits of such right, he shall not be entirely exempt from any penalty.

Provided that in the case of crime the court may, if occasion requires, declare such person entitled to mitigation of sentence and sentence him to imprisonment instead of to penalty prescribed by law.

Question 8. Classification of offenses:

The Egyptian Penal Code follows the French Code, and many other penal codes which resemble the French Code, in classifying offenses. Articles 9–12 classify offenses as follows.

Article 9.—Offences are of three kinds:

(1) Crimes; (2) Misdemeanors; (3) Contraventions.

Article 10.—A crime is an offence punishable by any of the following penalties:

Death; Penal servitude for life; Penal servitude for a term; Detention.

Article 11.—A misdemeanor is an offence punishable by either of the following penalties:

Imprisonment which may exceed a week; Fine which may exceed [one Egyptian pound] £.E.1.

Article 12.—A contravention is an offence punishable by either of the following penalties:

Imprisonment not exceeding a week; Fine not exceeding [one Egyptian pound] £.E.1.

The basis of the classification is the gravity of the offense, resulting in severity of punishment. This mode of classification has been criticized as unscientific, since it suggests no essential difference in nature between the three classes. It is branded as a classification for convenience's sake. It is also argued in favor of adopting tripartite division, délits on the one hand, and contraventions on the other, the difference between the two classes being that the class of délits would include offenses punished with reference to the intention of the offender, and the class of contraventions, merely breaches of police regulations, would be offenses punished without reference to the intention.

Other writers claim that harm is done by rigid classification of offenses according to a scale of punishment.

Those in favor of classification say that it is also of importance in other connections. Among these are the following:

(1) Prescription of offenses; (2) Attempts; (3) Recidivism; (4) Conditional sentences; (5) Juvenile offenders.

The classification into crimes, misdemeanors, and contraventions is, therefore, fundamental to the Egyptian Code. Equally fundamental from the point of view of the arrangement of the Code is the distinction between "offences against the State" and "offences against the individuals." Another distinction of importance is that between military and common law offenses. And further distinctions which require noting are those drawn between political and non-political, flagrant and non-flagrant, simple and collective, and instantaneous and continuing offenses.

Question 9. Sentencing:

On sentencing of convicted defendants see the discussion under Questions 1 and 8 in addition to the following.

Articles 1–4 of the Egyptian Penal Code contain the provisions as to the persons to whom the Code applies. Article 5 determines the law to be applied.

Article 1.—This Code shall apply to every person who is guilty of the commission in Egypt of any offence falling under its provisions.

Article 2.—It shall further apply to every person: (1) who, by any act done outside Egypt, is a party, whether as principal or as accessory, to any offence committed either wholly or in part in Egypt; or (2) who is guilty outside of Egypt:

(a) of any crime against the safety of the State falling under Chapters I & II of Book II of this Code; or

(b) of any crime or falsification falling under Article 206 of this Code; or

(c) of any crime relating to coin falling under Article 202; or who participates in such counterfeit or debased coin or its introduction into Egypt and taking it outside of Egypt; or who makes an occupation of possessing and putting such coin into circulation in accordance with the provisions of Article 203 when such crime relates to coin legally current in Egypt.

Article 3.—Every Egyptian who is guilty of the commission outside Egypt of an act classified as a crime or misdemeanor by this Code shall be punishable in accordance with its provisions in the event of his return to Egypt, provided that such act is a punishable offence under the law of the country in which it has been committed.

Article 4.—No proceedings shall be instituted in respect of any offence committed or act done outside Egypt, except by the State representative.

No proceedings shall be taken if the person accused proves that he has been acquitted outside Egypt or that he has been finally convicted and has undergone his sentence.

Article 5.—Offences shall be punished in accordance with the law in force at the time at which they are committed.

Provided that if a law more favorable to the accused comes into force, after the commission of the offence, but before final judgment, such law shall alone be applied.

If a law comes into force after final judgment making the offence for which the offender has been sentenced a lawful act, an order for stay of execution shall be issued by the court.

However, if, during the proceeding of the trial or after sentencing for an offence in violation of a law that is a violation during a certain period of time, such a period ends, it shall not stop the proceeding nor shall it stop the execution of sentencing.

Artiele 6.—Sentences to the penalties prescribed by law are in all cases pronounced without prejudice to any right which the parties may have to restitution or damages.

Question 9. Suspension of sentences:

Suspension of sentences is referred to under Egyptian Code as conditional sentences, covered by Articles 55–59.

Artiele 55.—Whenever in a case of crime or misdemeanor sentence of fine or imprisonment for less than a year is passed on an offender against whom no previous sentence to a criminal penalty existed, the court may stay execution of the sentence, provided it satisfies itself as to the offender's morals, past behavior, age, or the circumstances under which the offence was committed, and that he will not violate the law again.

Such stay may be made complete to cover subsidiary penalties and to wipe out all criminal effects resulting from the sentencing.

Artiele 56.—The order for stay of execution shall be issued for a period of three years from the day on which such sentence becomes final.

The order for stay of execution may be revoked if, during the period mentioned in the Code the following occur:

(1) if the offender was sentenced to imprisonment for more than one month for an offence committed before or after the issuance of the order of stay of execution.

(2) if the defendant was sentenced, before the order of stay of execution, to a similar sentence mentioned in the previous sentence and the court was unaware of it.

Artiele 57.—The revocation of the order of stay of execution is issued by the court which ordered the stay of execution upon the application of the public prosecutor and after summoning the offender.

If the revocation of the order of stay of execution was based on a sentence passed after the issuance of the order, such revocation may be issued by the latter court which made the correction causing the revocation either by itself or upon application from the public prosecutor.

Artiele 58.—The revocation of the order of stay of execution involves the execution of the penalty imposed together with the execution of the subsidiary penalties and all other criminal effects suspended thereby.

Artiele 59.—At the expiration of the period of the stay of execution, if no order of revocation was issued, the offence is extinguished and the sentencing shall be deemed not to have been passed.

The Egyptian Penal Code is criticized for lack of supervision by the court over the future conduct of the discharged offender. The probation system in the United States is considered better because it secures some such supervision, despite being expensive. The Egyptian courts, perhaps realizing the dangers of their system in the absence of effective supervision, have not made much use of their powers under these articles.

Question 9. Determinate and indeterminate sentences:

The primary classification of punishments under the Egyptian Code is that into criminal, correctional, and contraventional, while a secondary classification is that of substantive punishments and subsidiary punishments. The substantive penalties are those mentioned in Articles 13–23, and the subsidiary penalties are enumerated in Articles 24–31. These are referred to as subsidiary because sometimes they follow as a necessary consequence from the infliction of the substantive penalty without needing to be expressly inflicted.

Substantive penalties are:

Article 13.—Every person sentenced to death shall be hanged.

Article 14.—The penalty of penal servitude consists of being employed for life in case of a life sentence, or during the term fixed by the sentence in case of a sentence for a term at such forms of labor of the most severe kind as shall be prescribed by the Government.

The period for which the penalty of penal servitude for a term is imposed shall not be less than three nor more than fifteen years, except in cases where the law specially provides otherwise.

Article 15.—Males and females who have completed their sixtieth year shall, when sentenced to penal servitude, serve their sentence in a central prison.

Article 16.—The penalty of detention consists of confinement, during the term fixed by the sentence, in a central prison and in being employed either in the prison or outside, at such forms of labor as shall be prescribed by the Government. Such terms shall not be less than three nor more than fifteen years, except in cases where the law specially provides otherwise.

Article 17.—When in criminal cases the circumstances of the case appear to be of such a nature as to merit leniency on the part of the court, the penalty may be mitigated as follows:

For the penalty of death may be substituted that of penal servitude for life or for a term;

For the penalty of penal servitude for life may be substituted that of penal servitude for a term or that of detention;

For the penalty of penal servitude for a term may be substituted that of detention or that of imprisonment for not less than six months;

For the penalty of detention may be substituted that of imprisonment for not less than three months.

Article 18.—The penalty of imprisonment consists of confinement either in a local or in a central prison during the term fixed by the sentence. Such term shall not be less than 24 hours nor more than three years, except in cases where the law specially provides otherwise.

Every person sentenced to simple imprisonment for a period not exceeding three months may, instead of being incarcerated during the term of his penalty, declare his option, under the condition laid down in the Code of Criminal Procedure, to undertake work outside the prison, unless he is expressly excluded from such option by the judgment of conviction.

Article 19.—Imprisonment is of two kinds:

Simple imprisonment;

Imprisonment with labor.

Persons sentenced to imprisonment with labor shall be employed, either in the prison or outside, at such forms of labor as shall be prescribed by the Government.

Article 20.—The court shall pass sentence of imprisonment with labor whenever the duration of the penalty imposed is one year or upwards, and in all other cases in which the law so directs.

It shall always pass sentence of simple imprisonment in cases of contravention.

In all other cases the court may pass sentence of imprisonment of either kind.

Article 21.—The duration of a penalty restrictive of liberty shall be computed from the day on which, after the sentence has become enforceable, the offender is detained in custody by virtue thereof. The period spent under preventive arrest shall be deducted.

Article 22.—The penalty of fine consists of the liability on the part of the person sentenced to pay the Treasury the sum fixed by the sentence. Such sum shall in no case be less than five Egyptian piasters.

Article 23.—When a person who has already been under preventive arrest is sentenced to a simple fine, such fine shall, so far as concerns its enforcement, be treated as reduced ten Egyptian piasters for each day spent under preventive arrest.

If sentence is one of imprisonment, as well as fine, and the period spent under preventive arrest exceeds the term of the imprisonment imposed, a like deduction, calculated on the amount of such excess, shall be made in respect of the fine.

Article 24.—Subsidiary penalties are: (1) deprivation of rights and privileges mentioned in Article 25; (2) dismissal from a public office; (3) police supervision; (4) confiscation.

Article 25.—Every person sentenced to a criminal penalty shall be deprived by operation of law of the following rights and privileges:

(1) He shall be incapable thereafter of employment by the State whether directly or as a farmer of taxes or concessionnaire, whatever the importance of the employment.

(2) He shall be incapable thereafter of holding a grade or of wearing a decoration.

(3) During the currency of his sentence he shall be incapable of giving evidence in a court of justice except by way of unsworn information given to the court.

(4) So long as he is in confinement he shall be deprived of the control and management of his property. He shall appoint, subject to the approval of the court, an administrator to control and manage his property. In default of appointment by him, an administrator shall be appointed by the civil tribunal of the district in which he resides, sitting in chambers, on the application of the State representative or of any interested party. The tribunal may require an administrator whom it appoints to give security. The administrator, whether appointed by the person sentenced or by the tribunal, shall be under the control of the tribunal for all purposes of his administration. The person sentenced shall be incapable of disposing of his property other than by Waqf [religious trust], except with the authorization of the civil tribunal. Every contract affecting his property made by him except as hereinbefore mentioned shall be void. The property of a person sentenced shall be restored to him as soon as he has served his sentence or has been set at liberty, and the administrator shall render him an account of his administration.

(5) If at the time at which he is sentenced either finally or in contumacy he is a member of a Majlis Hasby, of a provincial, municipal, or local commission or of any other public commission, his seat shall be vacated.

(6) If he has been finally sentenced to penal servitude, he shall be forever thereafter incapable of membership of any of the public bodies specified in paragraph 5 or of employment as an expert or as a witness to a document.

Article 26.—Dismissal from a public office consists in being deprived of such office and of the emoluments attaching thereto.

A person sentenced to dismissal, whether at the time of sentence he holds or has ceased to hold office, shall be incapable of being appointed to any public office or of drawing any salary from the Government during a period to be fixed by the sentence. Such period shall not exceed six years nor be less than one year.

Article 27.—Every public servant found guilty of a crime falling under any of Chapters III, IV, VI, and XVI of Book II of this Code who, by reason of extenuating circumstances, is sentenced to imprisonment shall, in addition, be sentenced to dismissal; the period to which such dismissal extends shall not be less than double the term of his imprisonment.

Article 28.—Every person sentenced to penal servitude or detention for a crime against the safety of the State, for a crime relating to coin, for criminal theft, for homicide falling under paragraph 2 of Article 234 of this Code, or for one of the crimes falling under Article 356 or Article 368 shall, upon the expiration of his sentence, be placed under police supervision for a period equal to the term for which he was sentenced, but so that such period of supervision shall not exceed five years.

Provided always that the court, in the judgment by which sentence is passed, may reduce the period of supervision or may declare that the person sentenced shall not be subjected thereto.

Article 29.—The effect of being placed under police supervision shall be to subject the person sentenced to all the provisions contained in the decrees dealing with such supervision. Any breach of the provision shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding one year.

Article 30—Upon a conviction for crime or misdemeanor the court may order the confiscation of any property which is the product of the offence, as well as of all weapons and implements which have actually been used in the commission of the offence or are apt for such use, without prejudice in all cases to the rights of innocent third parties.

In the case of property the manufacture, use, possession, sale or exposure for sale whereof constitutes an offence, the confiscation of such property shall always be ordered even when it is not the property of the accused.

Article 31.—In cases not falling under the above provisions the penalties of dismissal from a public office, of police supervision, and of confiscation may be imposed whenever the law so prescribes.

Article 32—When the same act falls within the definition of more than one offence the penalty prescribed for the offence involving the heaviest penalty shall alone be imposed.

Two or more offences committed with the same object and connected one with another in such a manner as to form a single transaction, are deemed to constitute a single offence involving the penalty prescribed for the most serious of the offences committed.

Article 33—Subject to the exceptions contained in Article 35 and Article 36, penalties restrictive of liberty shall be cumulative.

Article 34—When cumulative penalties are of different kinds they shall be undergone in the following order: (1) penal servitude; (2) detention; (3) imprisonment with labor; (4) simple imprisonment.

Article 35—The penalty of penal servitude shall, to the extent of its duration, be deemed to be a satisfaction of any other penalty restrictive of liberty imposed for an offence committed before sentence to such penal servitude was passed.

Article 36—When two or more offences have been committed before any of them has been tried, the aggregate duration of penal servitude shall not by reason of this cumulation of penalties exceed twenty years, that of detention or of detention and imprisonment shall not exceed twenty years, and that of imprisonment shall not exceed six years.

Article 37—Fines shall always be cumulative.

Article 38—Sentences of police supervision shall be cumulative, but so that the aggregate period thereof shall not exceed five years.

The Egyptian Penal Code does not have any provision or section similar to §3007 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code, nor does it provide for publicity to a conviction.

The principle of "persistent misdemeanants" under §3007 resembles the provision on recidivism in the Egyptian Code inasmuch as the punishment is increased when the repeater continues to commit crimes. The judges under these articles are given additional powers in this respect.

Article 49.—A person is said to be a recidivist: (1) who, having been sentenced to a criminal penalty, is found guilty of a crime or misdemeanor committed subsequent to the passing of such sentence, or (2) who, having been sentenced to imprisonment for a year or more, is found guilty of a misdemeanor committed subsequently within a period of five years from the expiration of his sentence or from the date at which such sentence is barred by prescription; or (3) who, having been sentenced for a crime or misdemeanor to imprisonment for less than a year or to fine, is found guilty of misdemeanor similar in nature to his former offence and committed within a period of five years from the passing of such sentence.

For the purposes of recidivism, theft, obtaining by false pretences, and abuse of confidence are deemed to be offences of a similar nature.

Article 50.—In the case of recidivism as defined by the preceding article, the court shall have power to impose a penalty in excess of the maximum prescribed by law for the offence, so nevertheless that such penalty shall not exceed twice such maximum.

Provided always that the duration of a sentence of penal servitude for a term of detention shall in no case exceed twenty years.

Article 51.—If a recidivist, who has previously been sentenced to two penalties restrictive of liberty, each of which was one year or more in duration, or to three such penalties, one of which at least was one year or more in duration, for theft, receiving stolen goods, obtaining by false pretences, abuse of confidence or falsification or attempt to commit any of such offences, is found guilty of any misdemeanor of theft, receiving stolen goods, obtaining by false pretences, abuse of confidence or falsification, committed subsequent to the last of the former convictions, the court may sentence him to penal servitude for a period of not less than two nor more than five years instead of applying the provisions of the preceding article.

The judgment in every trial in a criminal court must be pronounced, or the substance of it explained, either immediately after the termination of the trial or at some subsequent time. Notice of this is given to the parties or their advocates, and if the accused is in custody, he will be brought up to hear the judgment delivered. Every judgment is written and must contain the point or points determined, specify the offense and the provision or provisions of the Penal Code or any other law under which the accused is convicted, and the punishment to which he is sentenced.

Criminal sentences are subject to appeal to a higher court. If the higher court considers there are sufficient grounds for interfering it will exercise the following powers:

(1) In an appeal from an order of acquittal, the court may reverse such order and may direct that further inquiry be made or that the accused be retried or committed for trial, as the case may be, or may find him guilty and pass sentence on him according to law.

(2) In an appeal from a conviction, the court may:

(a) Reverse the finding and sentence or acquit or discharge the accused, or order him to be retried by a court of competent jurisdiction;

(b) Alter the finding, maintaining the sentence, or with or without altering the finding, increase or reduce the sentence;

(c) Alter the nature of the sentence with or without such reduction or increase and with or without altering the finding.

Every individual organization, public or private, including the Government or one of its agencies, may appeal a sentence.

The standards required by the Code for sentencing review are provided for in the Code. For concurrent and consecutive terms of imprisonment, see Articles 32–38.

The Egyptian Penal Code does not have any provisions similar to §3001(2) (see Article 22).

Criminal procedure codes, or sometimes criminal codes, provide for executions issued on the goods of the person sentenced to a fine, both for the fine and the costs. The more usual method of execution is by means of detention of the person. In Egypt the enforcement of pecuniary penalties payable to the State may be so carried out, and consequently a sentence to a fine may, alternatively, be a sentence to imprisonment. The imprisonment wipes out the fine at a fixed rate but does not discharge the offender from costs, restitution or damages.

It is, however, most undesirable that the prisons should be filled with persons serving short terms of imprisonment in lieu of payment of fines. In order to avoid this it is provided in many codes that the person liable to detention for non-payment of fine may declare his option for work outside the prison and by such work may wipe out not only the fine but any sum due to the State by way of fine, restitution, damages or costs—not, however, amounts due to the civil claimant.

Question 10. Mistake of law

It is an accepted principle among commentators on criminal law that every person is deemed to know the criminal law. Ignorance of the rules of criminal law is not admitted as a good defense to a criminal prosecution. It may, if the blunder is reasonable, be regarded by the court as a good ground for inflicting a milder punishment.

A person is presumed, unless the contrary is proven, to have knowledge of any material fact, if such fact is a matter of common knowledge. The justice and convenience of this rebuttable presumption cannot be doubted. Some commentators have gone further and declared that people are presumed to know facts which are matters of common knowledge or which they had the means to ascertain had they not wilfully neglected to enquire. In any case, it is not likely that a criminal court would treat seriously a defense heard upon ignorance of a fact of common knowledge if the means for ascertaining the truth were easy to obtain. It would certainly be up to the defense alleging ignorance to explain why the offender did not make use of them. Otherwise he will be presumed to have done so.

It is said that ignorance of fact, unlike ignorance of law, may be and at times is an effective defense to a criminal charge. Frequently the court cannot arrive at any conclusion as to whether the prisoner intended to commit the wrong or was guilty of criminal negligence, unless it is satisfied as to the knowledge of fact which he possessed.

The Egyptian legislator has left this matter to the consideration of the courts to determine in each case whether the offense consists merely in the doing of the act or whether the accused must be proved both to have done the act and to have been aware that the conditions were present which made the act criminal.

Question 11. Separation between jurisdiction of courts and definition of offense

The judicial organization of Egypt, as well as most of the continental countries and those influenced by the European legal systems, provides in its criminal procedure code or code for the judicial organization of the country provisions discussing the court system and the jurisdiction of each court, including its Constitution. On the other hand, the definition and classification of an offense is provided for in the penal code.

The general rule is that criminal courts have jurisdiction over all offenses committed on national soil. The Egyptian Code of Criminal Procedure does not distinguish between civil and criminal courts. A court in Egypt has dual jurisdiction, civil and criminal. Judges sitting in civil and commercial cases sit also in criminal cases. The Constitution and jurisdiction of the Egypt criminal courts is provided for by Law No. 56 of 1959, concerning judicial power.

Question 12. Extraterritorial jurisdiction

Articles 1–3 of the Egyptian Penal Code, as discussed under Question #9, provide for the territorial application of the Penal Code. The general rule recognized in modern states is that the criminal law of a state applies to all persons committing crimes within its territory.

Despite the fact that criminal law is in principle territorial, there are certain exceptions to the application of the principle to be noted. In certain cases the state applies the opposite principle, viz., that the criminal law of the state applies to nationals of the state irrespective of the territory in which the offense may have been committed. Many states apply their criminal law to aliens who commit certain classes of crimes outside their territory.

The Egyptian Penal Code devotes Chapter I of Book II, Articles 77–85 to crimes committed against the safety of the State outside the Egyptian territorial boundaries. These articles and their numerous divisions and subdivisions spell out in detail all such offenses.

Section 209 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code compares very favorably with other codes.

Question 13. Criminal conspiracy

Criminal conspiracy under the Egyptian Penal Code is provided for by Article 48 as follows.

Article 48—There is criminal conspiracy [criminal accord] when two or more persons conspire to commit crimes or misdemeanors or to prepare or facilitate their commission. The conspiracy is criminal whether the object with which the crimes or misdemeanors are to be committed is lawful or not.

When a criminal conspiracy is directed toward or contemplates the commission of crimes, the conspirators are punishable with detention; when it is directed toward or contemplates the commission of misdemeanors, they are punishable with imprisonment.

Those who instigate a criminal conspiracy or take a directing part therein are punishable with penal servitude for a term in the first case mentioned in the preceding paragraph and with detention in the second case.

However, if the purpose of the conspiracy was only to commit crimes or misdemeanors punishable with a penalty lighter than the penalties mentioned in the preceding paragraphs then the penalty shall be the one provided for by the law for such misdemeanors or crimes.

Provided that every person guilty of conspiracy who, before the commission of the crimes or misdemeanors and before the commencement of any legal proceedings, gives information to the authorities of the existence of the conspiracy and of the members thereof shall be exempt from the penalties provided by this Article.

The idea of conspiracy under the Egyptian Code, as it is clear from this Article, is not limited to conspiracies to commit political offenses. It extends to all conspiracies to commit crimes or misdemeanors. The legislator employed the word "accord" which is said to be understood, in its widest sense, as comprising not only agreements drawn up in writing, but also mere verbal agreements, provided that they contain all the elements required by the law to render them criminal. To make the "accord" criminal it must have been entered into with a view to the commission of or preparation for offenses. It is not, however, necessary that any determinate crimes should be proved to have been resolved upon. A general criminal intention suffices.

The Egyptian article, although based on the French Penal Code articles, is wider in its coverage, since it makes punishable an arrangement with a view to the commission of a misdemeanor as well as one with a view to the commission of a crime. Thus an arrangement to commit an offense may be punishable although the attempt to commit the same offense by one individual would not be so.

The use of the same word "accord" in both Article 40(2) and Article 48 might lead to the conclusion that every arrangement which would, had an offense followed, been punishable as accessory conduct under Article 40(2) might, if no offense actually resulted, be punishable as a conspiracy under Article 48. But according to a decision of the Court of Cassation "the nature of the agreement is different in the two cases. Some degree of organization, however slight, and a certain permanence of agreement are necessary to constitute a criminal conspiracy, whereas complicity requires neither of these elements."

Article 40.—A person is concerned as an accessory in the commission of an offence: (1) who instigates to the commission of the act constituting the offence, provided that the act is the consequence of such instigation; or (2) who is a party to an arrangement having its object the commission of the offence, provided that the offence is the consequence of such arrangement; or (3) who knowingly supplies weapons or other implements or means employed in the commission of the offence, or in any other manner aids the principal or principals concerned in the offence in the preparation, facilitation, or commission thereof.

Question 14. Felony-murder

In Egypt the pronouncement of the death penalty is never obligatory. If extenuating circumstances are found to be present, the court can always substitute penal servitude for life. And unless murder was accompanied by one of the aggravating circumstances mentioned in Articles 230, 233 and 234(2) of the Penal Code, a sentence of penal servitude for life or for a term must be pronounced. The aggravating circumstances which justify the death penalty under the Egyptian Penal Code are (1) premeditation, (2) lying in wait, (3) poison, (4) simultaneous commission of another crime, and (5) correlation of the murder with misdemeanor.

Simultaneity and correlation of willful homicide with another offense is a cause for aggravation of the punishment of willful homicide. This is provided by the second paragraph of Article 234. If there is simultaneity of the homicide with another crime, the punishment is death; if there is correlation of the homicide with a misdemeanor, the punishment is death or penal servitude for life.

Article 234 states that the homicide must have been preceded, accompanied, or followed by another crime. The word "crime" is here used in its technical sense as in Article 10 of the Code. In Egypt attempt to commit a crime is a crime. Therefore, if the homicide is committed simultaneously with an attempt to commit a crime, the aggravation applies. Under Article 234 the homicide must be willful in every case, while other countries rule it may aggravate an unintentional homicide and punishes it as if it had been willful because it was committed during the commission of another crime.

The following is the translation of the pertinent articles.

Article 230.—Willful homicide committed with premeditation or after lying in wait shall be punished by death.

Article 233.—Poisoning is willful homicide committed by means of any substance capable of causing death more or less swiftly. However the same may be employed or administered, poisoning shall be punished by death.

Article 234.—Willful homicide committed without premeditation or lying in wait shall be punished by penal servitude for life or for a term.

Nevertheless, the penalty shall be that of death if the willful homicide has been preceded, accompanied, or followed by another crime. The penalty shall be that of death or penal servitude for life when the object of the homicide is to prepare, facilitate, or actually commit a misdemeanor, or to assist the escape or immunity from punishment, of any person concerned in the commission of a misdemeanor, whether as principal or accessory.

Article 235.—When a homicide entails the punishment of death for the person committing it any accessory shall be punished by death or by penal servitude for life.

Question 15. Not applicable to Egypt.

Question 16. Para-Military Activities

The foreign codes consulted, in particular the Egyptian and Libyan, do not have a provision or provisions similar to §1104, Para-Military Activities. They all have provisions under offenses against the internal safety of the State which cover such activities and more. Some countries, in addition to the provisions found in their penal codes, have enacted certain laws covering similar grounds under names such as subversive activities, spies, espionage, etc.

The Egyptian Penal Code provides in Article 87, as amended, the following:

Whoever attempts by force to overthrow or change the Constitution of the State, the form of the government of the Republic, shall be punished with penal servitude for life or for a term. If the offence has been committed by an armed band, the person who organized the band or placed himself at its head or held command in it shall be punished with death.

The Libyan Penal Code provides in Article 196 the following:

Whoever, by force or in any other unconstitutional manner, attempts to alter the Constitution of the State or the form of the government, shall be punished by imprisonment for life or by imprisonment for a period of not less than five years.

If the offence is committed by an armed band, whoever raised the armed band or assumed leadership thereof in whatsoever manner shall be punished by death.

These and many other similar provisions are provided in either the penal codes or special legislation for the protection of the state.

Question 17–A. Drugs

The Egyptian legislators have provided several elaborate acts concerning drugs, which are separate from the Penal Code.

Question 17–B. Abortion

Abortion is treated under Chapter 3 of Book 3, Articles 260-264, as follows.

Article 260.—Whoever willfully procures the miscarriage of a woman with child by means of blows or other violence shall be punished by penal servitude for a term.

Article 261.—Whoever procures the miscarriage of a woman with child whether with or without her consent by administering to her any drugs or by the use or indication of any means capable of causing miscarriage shall be punished by imprisonment.

Article 262.—Every woman who knowingly consents to take such drugs or to employ or allow the employment of any of the means above-mentioned, and actually miscarries, shall be punished by the like penalty.

Article 263.—If the offender is a physician, surgeon, or pharmaceutical chemist, he shall be senteneed to penal servitude for a term.

Article 264.—Attempt to procure abortion shall in no case be a ground for prosecution.

The subject of abortion under Egyptian law has been related to both homicide and blows and wounds. It is related to homicide as involving suppression of a possible human life, although it is remarked that abortion consists not in destroying the life of the foetus but "in the intentionally causing the premature expulsion of the product of conception."

From another point of view the offense of procuring miscarriage is related to wounds and blows. An act done for the purpose of abortion is dangerous in itself to the health of the woman and may produce death or bodily injury, or, without having the intended effect, it may cause some ailment or death. It is clear that for prosecution under these articles, intent to procure miscarriage is essential.

It should be remembered that attempts to procure miscarriage are not punishable under the head of "blows and wounds."

Question 17–C. Gambling

Gambling is provided for in the Egyptian Penal Code under Chapter 12 of Book 3, Articles 352-353, as follows.

Article 352.—Whoever keeps a house or place for games of chance to which the public has access shall be punished, with the person who keeps the bank in the said house, by detention and by fine not to exceed one thousand Egyptian pounds; all money and equipment found in the gambling places shall be confiscated by the authorities.

In 1957 the Minister of the Interior published Decree No. 37 of 1957 providing a long list of games, forbidding them and categorizing them as games of chance.

Article 353.—Whoever offers for sale a lottery without government permission shall be punished with the same penalties; all money and equipment used shall be confiscated by the authorities.

Question 17–D. Offenses against decency and morality

Under the Egyptian Penal Code, offenses against decency and morality include indecent assault, habitual instigation to debauchery, and adultery.

Article 267.—The crime of rape shall be punished by penal servitude for life or for a term.

If the offender is an ascendant of the person upon whom the crime has been committed, if he is one of the persons who is entrusted with her education or supervision, or who is in a position of authority over her, or if he is her paid servant or the paid servant of one of the persons above referred to, the penalty shall be that of penal servitude for life.

Rape is said to consist of an illegal natural connection between persons of different sexes contrary to the will of one of the parties. Unnatural connection by violence is punishable not as rape but as indecent assault under Article 268.

Article 268.—An indecent assault accompanied by violence or threats shall, whether completed or not, be punished by penal servitude for a period of not less than three nor more than seven years.

If such assault is committed on a child who has not completed his or her sixteenth year, or if it is committed by one of the persons specified in the second paragraph of Article 267, the penalty may extend to the maximum fixed for penal servitude for a term.

When both these factors are present the penalty shall be that of penal servitude for life.

Article 269.—Whoever commits an indecent assault unaccompanied by violence or threats on a child who has not completed his or her eighteenth year, shall be punished by imprisonment.

If the assault is committed on a child who has not completed his or her seventh year, or if it is committed by one of the persons specified in the second paragraph of Article 267 the penalty shall be that of penal servitude for a term.

The offense of indecent assault dealt with under these two articles covers a wide variety of indecent acts. As rape is limited to natural intercourse, acts of sodomy, whether committed on male or female, are indecent assaults. This term, while it covers such grave improprieties as these, also includes assault of a much less serious character, such as touching a woman's clothes in an improper manner, if the touching is indecent in character. There must always be an assault, because indecent acts done in the presence of another do not constitute an assault. While exposure is not in itself an assault, in the case of children the offense is constituted if the accused induced them to touch him improperly though no act was done of the person of the child.

The indecent act is punishable under these articles whatever the offender's objective may have been. It is not required that he have a carnal or even an obscene purpose. Consent to indecent acts, except in the case of underage children, is a good defense.

The term assault under these articles implies a measure of force. Yet the Code distinguishes between "assault with violence" and "assault without violence." The latter is committed when the indecent act is committed upon the person of a child who is underage with his or her consent. In this case the child is regarded as incapable of consenting.

Under the Egyptian Code one may say that rape, sodomy, and indecent assaults are lumped together and are not separately punishable. There is no distinction drawn in each case between the commission of the act under circumstances in which the victim could not resist [force, threats of death, state of unconsciousness]; and those in which consent has been exacted by threats of a less overwhelming kind; or by deception as to the nature of the act; or where the person was insane or mentally infirm.

Article 269.—Whoever is found in a public street inducing bypassers to commit prostitution, shall be punished by detention for a period not exceeding seven days.

Whenever the offence is repeated within one year from the date of sentencing, the offender shall be sentenced to detention for a period not exceeding six months and with fine not exceeding fifty Egyptian pounds followed by putting the offender under police surveillance for a period equal to his detention.

Articles 270-272 were abolished by Law No. 68 of 1951, concerning prostitution.

Question 18. Firearms and explosives

Provisions pertaining to firearms and explosives in Egyptian criminal law are found both in the Penal Code and in separate acts.

Chapter 2 bis of Book II of the Penal Code, entitled "Explosives" was added to the Code by Law No. 50 of 1949. The following is the translation of these articles.

Article 102A.—Whoever, without a license, keeps, manufactures, possesses or imports explosives shall be punished by penal servitude for life or for a term.

Shall be considered as explosives any materials used in making explosives which are described as such by a decision from the Minister of Interior, as shall be considered explosives any kind of device, machines or tools used for their manufacture or explosion.

Article 102B.—Whoever uses explosives for the purpose of committing the crime mentioned in Article 87, political assassination, destruction of establishments devoted for public utilities, public benefits, public meetings or any other structure used by the public, shall be punished by death.

Article 102C.—Whoever uses or attempts to use explosives in such a way that he will expose the life of the people to danger, shall be punished by penal servitude for life.

If such explosion caused the death of any person the penalty shall be death.

Article 102D.—Whoever uses or attempts to use explosives in such a way that he will expose the property of others to danger shall be punished by penal servitude for a term.

If such explosion caused damage to such property the penalty shall be penal servitude for life.

Article 102E.—As an exception to the provisions of Article 17, in applying the above-mentioned articles no mitigation of penalties is permitted below the one immediately following the first penalty provided for the offence.

Article 102F.—Whoever violates the requirements of Article 102A shall be punished with detention.

The laws pertaining to firearms and ammunition are more detailed and have been amended several times with their schedules. However, articles pertaining to the same subject in Libya are part of the Libyan Penal Code, which seems to carry very lenient penalties. These articles are as follows:

Article 477.—Whoever, without license, manufactures arms or brings them in any manner for sale, or collects them for trade or manufacture, shall be punished by penalty of detention for a period not exceeding one year and of a fine not exceeding fifty pounds.

Article 478.—Whoever has in his possession arms or ammunition and does not inform the authorities of the same shall be punished by a penalty of detention for a period not exceeding six months or a fine not exceeding ten pounds.

Article 479.—Whoever disobeys a lawful order issued from the competent authority to deliver up arms or ammunition in his possession during a specified period therefor shall be punished by a penalty of detention for a period not exceeding one year or of a fine of between ten and twenty pounds.

Article 480.—Whoever carries arms outside his dwelling place or its appurtenances without license to do so from the authorities shall be punished by a penalty of detention for a period not exceeding one year.

The penalty shall be increased by not more than one third if the act is committed in a place of meeting or assembly or by night in an inhabited quarter.

Article 481.—In the circumstances provided for by the preceding articles the person convicted may be subjected to measures of security.

Article 482.—Whoever, although licensed to carry arms, does any of the following acts shall be punished by a penalty of fine not exceeding twenty pounds: (1) delivers an arm to a juvenile of less than fourteen years of age, or to a person incapable or inexperienced in the use of arms or permits such persons to carry the same; (2) fails to take the necessary precautions to prevent any of the persons mentioned in the preceding number from easily reaching or gaining possession of any arms under his control; (3) carries a loaded gun in a place of meeting or assembly.

Article 483.—This article concerns fireworks, and is not related to this discussion.

Article 484.—For the purposes of the preceding provisions the expression "arms" shall mean: (1) firearms and any others prepared for the purpose of injuring others; (2) bombs and any kind of device or container for holding explosive materials, or explosive materials themselves, and asphyxiating gases or gases used in war or any injurious gases.

Question 19. Capital punishment

The Egyptian Penal Code provides for capital punishment in Chapter 3 of Book I, Article 13, under classification of punishment as one of the substantive penalties.

In the absence of extenuating circumstances death is inflicted as a punishment for many offenses under the Egyptian Penal Code. Under other articles of the Code the court has an option between death and penal servitude for life in certain events. Capital punishment is inflicted by hanging according to Article 13. Execution is private and its formalities are provided for by the Code of Criminal Procedure, promulgated by Law No. 150 of 1950.

Capital punishment in Egypt is inflicted for grave offenses against the State and for murder. The punishment is considered preventive in form but reparatory in spirit.

Question 20. Prosecution for multiple related offenses, etc.

This question has been already partially answered under Question No. 9, by Articles 32-38. However, a further discussion is provided here on multiple offenses.

Book I, Chapter 3, Section 3, Articles 32-38 are concerned with co-existent penalties. A person who has committed an offense for which he has not yet been tried should not be able to escape from the penalty for its commission merely by committing some other and more serious offense. If "A" commits several thefts successively for which he might, if detected, have been separately punished, he should, on detection, be liable to punishment for all of them cumulatively. If only one of these thefts was at first discovered, and for this one "A" was tried and punished, it would be ridiculous to treat his conviction as wiping out all liability for any other less or equally serious offense committed prior thereto. If, therefore, he is prosecuted for all of the offenses simultaneously, his liability for punishment for each is not affected. This principle is enunciated in Article 33, to which I shall return shortly. Before dealing with it, however, reference must be made to the more complicated situation for which provision is made by Article 32.

Article 32.—When the same act falls within the definition of more than one offence the penalty prescribed for the offence involving the heaviest penalty shall alone be imposed.

Two or more offences committed with the same object and connected one with another in such a manner as to form a single transaction, are deemed to constitute a single offence involving the penalty prescribed for the most serious of the offences committed.

The commission of an offence frequently involves acts of preparation or acts of execution which, taken by themselves, also constitute a substantive offense. Thus every theft with violence involves violence which might constitute an offense punishable separately from the theft. Also, most thefts involve a criminal trespass. Obtaining property by false pretenses, if accompanied by means of a forged document, also involves an uttering of the forgery, and if the offender is himself the author of the forged document, he is also liable for forgery. Or, to cite another example, a forged writing may be, by reason of the forgery, defamatory, and its publication constitutes the offense of defamation in addition to the offense of forgery.

French writers distinguish between the cases in which one and the same act gives rise to liability to more than one punishment because it constitutes at once more than one offense (concours idéal), and the more common case in which the offender has committed several different acts, each of which is a separate offense (concours matériel). Thus, if a man strikes another with intention to kill, and incapacitates but does not kill, his victim, his act is punishable (a) under Article 240 by imprisonment and (b) under Articles 234 and 46, as an attempt to commit willful homicide, by penal servitude for a term or detention.

Article 32, paragraph 1, provides that in such cases of concours idéal the penalty prescribed for the offense involving the heaviest penalty should alone be imposed. This is in effect saying that the offense must be treated as a whole and is not to be subjected to a subtle analysis so as to bring different aspects of it under different qualifications. It must be regarded by the court in that aspect alone in which it constitutes the greatest danger to society. The same principle inspires the second paragraph of the article. The case suggested is a form of concours matériel. The best example is perhaps that of forgery and uttering, but it is punishable separately. If the forger has also uttered, he has committed two offenses, but as they are so connected with one another as to form a single transaction, he is to be punished only for the more serious. It is frequently by no means easy to say whether the series of offenses committed are so connected as to form a single transaction. The Egyptian legislator has left its solution to the determination of the court in each case as it arises.

This second paragraph, therefore, establishes an exception to the ordinary rule of cumulation of penalties. Separate offenses have indeed been committed, and the only reason that the penalties set for them should not be cumulated is that they are the manifestation of one single criminal intention. This, more than even practical simultaneity in time, should be taken into consideration in determining whether the different acts do constitute a single transaction. If it is clear that in the mind of the offender the acts had a common purpose, the provisions of Article 32, paragraph 2, are satisfied. It is not enough, and it need not even be relevant, that they were committed at the same time.

It may sometimes be difficult to decide which is the heaviest penalty. Between criminal and correctional penalties no question can arise. Between different correctional penalties the court must presumably inflict that which justifies the longest period of imprisonment. French writers accept the view that subsidiary penalties such as confiscation, closing of an establishment, and the like, are attached to the offense itself and may, therefore, be inflicted independently of the penalty. The French law follows the rule that penalties can never be cumulated. Imprisonment, according to French writers, absorbs fine, unless the fine is of the nature of damages.

The provisions of Article 32 could not be satisfactorily applied unless the court trying the accused had wide powers of altering the "qualification" of the offense of which he was accused. These powers in Egypt are given to the court by the provisions of Article 308 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Under this article the court is also empowered to modify or increase the gravity of the charge contained in the committal order, and, even in the judgment of conviction, to alter the description of the offense constituted by the facts alleged in the committal order, without any preliminary amendment of the charge. This is, however, subject to certain provisions in favor of the defense. Thus, if the facts are at first wrongly qualified and the court is of the opinion that they establish a graver offense than that of which the prisoner is accused, the "qualification" will be altered and the accused may then be convicted of the offense involving the heaviest penalty. But if a conviction has already been obtained on these facts for some less serious offense, the person so convicted cannot be again brought to trial on the same facts differently qualified. Nor if he has been once acquitted at the first trial, can he be tried again, for this would be to put him in jeopardy twice for the same act. The conviction or acquittal settles the matter once and for all. It is res judicata.

The rule laid down in Article 32 does not exist in all countries. However, it is an admitted principle of criminal procedure that a man once convicted or acquitted on an indictment cannot be tried a second time for an offense of which he might have been convicted on the first indictment. He is then entitled to plead autrefois convict or autrefois acquit, as the case may be. Thus, if a man has been acquitted on a charge of obtaining property by false pretenses, he cannot be afterwards prosecuted for theft on the same facts, since he might have been convicted on the indictment for false pretenses, even though it was shown that the offense committed was really theft. On the other hand, if a person has been acquitted of theft, he can be afterwards prosecuted on the same facts for obtaining property by false pretenses on an indictment for theft.

Article 33.—Subject to the exceptions contained in Article 35 and Article 36, penalties restrictive of liberty shall be cumulative.

Article 34.—When cumulative penalties are of different kinds they shall be undergone in the following order: (1) penal servitude; (2) detention; (3) imprisonment with labor; (4) simple imprisonment.

Article 35.—The penalty of penal servitude shall, to the extent of its duration, be deemed to be a satisfaction of any other penalty restrictive of liberty imposed for an offence committed before sentence to such penal servitude was passed.

The principle here is that punishments are cumulative. However, it would be useless to prosecute for a misdemeanor discovered after, but committed before, a conviction for a crime for which a sentence of penal servitude has been passed. It is true that in cases in which a fine might be imposed for the misdemeanor the fine would not be absorbed by the previous sentence of penal servitude. The Egyptian rule of cumulation of penalties appears to be sounder in principle than other countries' rule of non-cumulation. The mitigation of its application provided by Article 35, coupled with the wide discretion possessed by Egyptian judges in fixing the period of imprisonment, makes it possible for them to treat the commission of another offense as no more than an aggravating circumstance justifying, perhaps, the infliction of a maximum penalty, but not necessitating the actual infliction of a more than normal punishment for the lesser offenses. The practical effect of Article 35 is also to make lesser penalties restrictive of liberty run concurrently with a single penalty of penal servitude.

Article 35 has, however, a restrictive scope. The sentence of penal servitude absorbs other penalties only. Thus a sentence of penal servitude is not a satisfaction of another sentence to the same penalty. The two sentences are cumulative. And the sentence of penal servitude only absorbs "to the extent of its duration." Five years' penal servitude only absorbs five of a ten year's sentence to detention. It is also interesting to observe that only penal servitude can absorb; detention does not absorb imprisonment. Moreover, it is only penalties for offenses committed before the sentence of penal servitude was pronounced which suffer absorption.

Article 36.—When two or more offences have been committed before any of them has been tried, the aggregate duration of penal servitude shall not by reason of this cumulation of penalties exceed twenty years, that of detention or of detention and imprisonment shall not exceed twenty years, and that of imprisonment shall not exceed six years.

Article 37.—Fines shall always be cumulative.

Article 38.—Sentences of police supervision shall be cumulative, but so that the aggregate period thereof shall not exceed five years.

Ethiopia

QUESTION 1

The Penal Code of the Empire of Ethiopia of 1957 was drafted by Professor Jean Graven, Former Dean of the Faculty of Law of the University of Geneva and now President of the Court of Cassation of Switzerland. The Code contains 792 articles and is divided into three parts: Part I, General Part; Part II, Special Part; and Part III, Code of Petty Offenses. The Code is divided into "Books," of which there are eight, numbered consecutively. Each book is subdivided into "Titles," which in turn are subdivided into "Chapters" which contain sections in which the individual articles are found. The articles are numbered consecutively throughout the Code.

The traditional European "tripartite division" of offenses, according to the assumption of their different natures, into felonies, misdemeanors and petty offenses, has been abandoned. All offenses are, first of all, simply called "offenses" so that the general principles applicable to all offenses may be stated in Part I, the General Part, of the Code. Book I "Offenses and the Offender," includes the first 84 articles and covers general principles of criminal law and its scope, including subjects such as time limitations, jurisdiction, extradition, conflicts of laws, attempt, participation, criminal responsibility and irresponsibility, criminal intent, negligence and accident, justification, necessity, self defense, mistake, and other topics of general application. Because Ethiopia lacked a highly developed legal profession, and because of the ideal of accessibility of the law to every citizen, as much doctrine as possible was included in the Code. In drafting the Code, these motives of education and accessibility were kept in mind, together with the guiding principles of most codifications, namely clarity, completeness and compactness. Adding to the completeness of the Ethiopian Code is the inclusion of military offenses together with other crimes.

Book II, entitled "The Criminal Punishment and Its Application," covers all phases of sentencing and extends from Article 85 to Article 247. Books I and II comprise the General Part of the Code (Part I).

Part II, the Special Part of the Code, extends from Article 248 through Article 689. These articles define each crime and give the punishment for each. The Special Part contains Books III through VI as follows: Book III, "Offences Against the State or Against National or International Interests"; Book IV, "Offences Against the Public Interest of the Community"; Book V, "Offences Against Individuals and the Family"; and Book VI, "Offences Against Property."

Part III of the Code, the Code of Petty Offenses, is a code within a code and contains two Books. These are Book VII, the General Part, and Book VIII, the Special Part. The Books, as usual, are broken down into Titles and Chapters containing the individual articles, numbers 690 through 792.

Petty offenses differ from ordinary offenses in that their punishments are less than those prescribed for ordinary offenses. Petty offenses are punishable by fines of from one dollar to three hundred dollars or a jail sentence of one day to three months. Included within the category of petty offenses are violations of rules and regulations promulgated by a competent authority, as well as those offenses which are specifically included in the Special Part of the Code of Petty Offenses. The trials of petty offenders are held before a lesser court or magistrate than the trials of the ordinary offenders. It should be pointed out that having a code within a code is a unique approach to codification. A more traditional approach would be to have the general part of the Code of Petty Offenses integrated into the general part of the entire code.

One experienced student of comparative law has traced the influence of the Italian Penal Code upon the Ethiopian Penal Code and reached the following conclusion:

The new Ethiopian Penal Code is based upon well-tried principles and practices of leading Continental countries both as to crimes in general and in particular, and penology. It enacts new provisions as to international offenses. Upon the framework of the excellent Italian Penal Code it imposes Anglo-American ideas of constitutional privileges and rights which formed the basis of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights.[1]

QUESTION 2

A code whose inspiration is found in the European tradition of codification is drafted with consecutive numbering of the articles throughout the entire code. This numbering scheme gives a unity to the general and the particular codal provisions. Leaving blank numbers is felt to create confusion and fragmentation, which are the opposites of the goals of clarity and conciseness which should guide the draftsmen of such a code. If gaps are left in the numbering system, some will never be used because they will not be in the needed locations. Others will be quickly used up, leaving future enactments to be numbered differently anyway.

Traditional European-style codes retain the original numbering system until the code is revised or superseded. New statutory provisions are added through the device of additions under existing articles so that an article may come to have several paragraphs. Numbering of new provisions can be achieved through the use of decimal points or letters of the alphabet. For example, "Article 120A—Flogging," was added as a secondary punishment between "Article 120—General principles applicable to secondary punishments" and "Article 121—Caution, reprimand, admonishment and apology." This method helps to retain the unity of the code.

QUESTION 3

Chapter II of Title I, Book I of the Ethiopian Penal Code is entitled "Criminal Guilt." "Criminal Guilt" corresponds with the proposed Code's term "Culpability." The Ethiopian Code lays down in three articles the mental elements necessary for criminal conduct.

Article 57. Principle: Criminal Fault And Accident

(1) No one can be punished for an offence unless he has been found guilty thereof under the law.

A person is guilty if, being responsible for his acts, he commits an offence either intentionally or by negligence.

(2) No one can be convicted under criminal law for an act penalised by the law if it was performed or occurred without there being any guilt on his part, and was caused by force majeure, or occurred by accident.

Nothing in this Article shall be a bar to civil proceedings.

Article 58. Criminal Intention

(1) A person intentionally commits an offence when he performs an unlawful and punishable act with full knowledge and intent.

Criminal intention exists also when the offender, being aware that his act may cause illegal and punishable consequences, commits the act regardless that such consequences may follow.

(2) An intentional offence is punishable save in cases of justification or excuse expressly provided by law (Arts. 64-78).

(3) No person shall be convicted for what he neither knew of or intended, nor for what goes beyond what he intended either directly or as a possibility, subject to the provisions governing negligence.

Article 59. Criminal Negligence

(1) A person is guilty of a criminal negligence act where, by a criminal lack of foresight or imprudence, he acts without consideration or in disregard of the possible consequences of his act.

A person is guilty of criminal negligence when he fails to take such precautions as might reasonably be expected in the circumstances of the case and having regard to his age, experience, education, occupation and rank.

(2) Offences committed by negligence are liable to punishment only if the law so expressly provides by reason of their nature, gravity or the danger they constitute to society.

The Court shall assess sentence according to the degree of guilt and the dangerous character of the offender, and according to his realisation of the possible consequences of his act or his failure to appreciate such consequences as he ought to have done.

Article 57 states the general principle that a person is guilty of criminal conduct if, having legal capacity, he commits an offense either intentionally or negligently. The next two articles state the mental elements necessary to constitute criminal intent or criminal negligence. The two articles are respectively entitled "Criminal Intention" and "Criminal Negligence." In Article 58(1), two types of criminal intent are recognized. First, a person intentionally commits an offense when he performs an unlawful and punishable act (various crimes are listed and defined in the Special Part of the Code) with full knowledge and volition. ("Volition" seems more appropriate here than "intent," since we are defining "intentionally." The Code was drafted originally in French, and the word was "la volonté.") In the United States, this type of criminal intent is often termed "specific intent." It corresponds to "intentionally" in §302(1)(a) of the proposed Code.

The second sentence of Article 58(1) establishes the second type of criminal intention. This second and less than specific intent has been called "indirect intention" or dolus eventualis. It corresponds to the term "knowingly" in §302(1)(b) of the proposed Code. In cases of indirect intention, the offender's intent to do an unlawful act is fully developed, but not his knowledge that the result would follow. The usual illustration is that A, desiring to destroy B's property, sets fire to B's house while B is inside. Knowing that B is at home, A foresees the possibility of harm to B. Injury to B would be treated by Article 58, as the result of criminal intent rather than negligence. A more lenient view might place it in the negligence category.

Criminal negligence is defined by the first sentence of Article 59(1). ("A criminal negligence act" could be better rendered into English as "a criminally negligent act" or simply "criminal negligence.") The basic idea is presented that through lack of foresight or due to poor judgment, the offender has carried out the prescribed act.

The Ethiopian Penal Code uses the defendant's state of mind to determine guilt or innocence. Article 59(2) makes the punishment of negligence exceptional and restricts it to cases where it is justified. The degree of guilt is a guide to the assessment of the sentence in negligence cases under Article 59(2).

The kinds of "Culpability" proposed in the draft code compare unfavorably with the provisions of the Ethiopian Code. Sections 302(c) and 302(d) of the proposed Code can be combined into a single provision under the concept of criminal negligence. This is possible because its concepts of both engaging in conduct "recklessly" and engaging therein "negligently" involve the same element of "a gross deviation from acceptable standards of conduct." This approach has been accomplished successfully for thirty years in at least one American jurisdiction (see "The Louisiana Criminal Code—a comparison of prior Louisiana Criminal Law." Dale E. Bennette, 5 La. L. Rev. 6 at page 11. [Dec. 1942]).

QUESTION 4

Causation is handled by the Ethiopian Code in a single article, as follows:

Article 24. Relationship of Cause and Effect

(1) In cases where the commission of an offence requires the achievement of a given result the offence shall be deemed to have been committed only if the result achieved is the consequence of the act or omission with which the accused person is charged.

This relationship of cause and effect shall be presumed to exist when the act or omission within the provisions of the law would, in the normal course of things, produce the result charged.

(2) Where there are concurrent causes or in the case of an intervening cause whether due to the act of a third party or to a natural or fortuitous event, this relationship of cause and effect shall not apply when the extraneous cause was in itself sufficient to produce the result.

If, in such a case, the act or omission with which the accused person is charged in itself constitutes an offence he shall be liable to the punishment specified for such an offence.

The modified "but for" or sine qua non test of §305 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code imposes a broader criminal responsibility than the Ethiopian Penal Code. Under the latter, when a concurrent extraneous cause is in itself sufficient to produce the result, the accused is exonerated, whether or not his conduct might have been sufficient in itself. He is given the benefit of the doubt in such cases, whereas the proposed Federal Code is expressed in the conjunctive to require both a concurrent cause sufficient to produce the result and that the accused's conduct was clearly insufficient.

QUESTION 5

The Ethiopian Penal Code, Book I, Title III, "Conditions of Liability to Punishment in Respect of Offences," contains a Chapter on criminal responsibility. Articles 48, 49, and 51 provide for defenses of irresponsibility and limited responsibility and for expert medical opinion.

Article 48. Criminal Responsibility and Irresponsibility

(1) The offender who is responsible for his acts is alone liable to punishment under the provisions of criminal law.

A person is not responsible for his acts under the law when, owing to age, illness, abnormal delay in his development or deterioration of his mental faculties, he was incapable at the time of his act, of understanding the nature or consequences of his act, or of regulating his conduct according to such understanding.

(2) The Court may order in respect of an irresponsible person such suitable measures of treatment or protection as are provided by law. (Art. 133–135).

Article 49. Limited Responsibility

(1) He who owing to a derangement of his mind or understanding, an arrested mental development or an abnormal or deficient condition was not, at the time of his act, fully capable of understanding the nature and consequences thereof or regulating his conduct according to such understanding shall not be liable in full to the punishment specified for the offence committed.

The Court shall without restriction reduce the punishment. (Art. 185).

(2) In addition to a penalty the Court may order such appropriate measures of treatment, correction or protection as are provided by law. (Art. 133–135).

Article 51. Doubtful Cases, Expert Examination

(1) When there is a doubt as to the responsibility of the accused person, whether full or partial, the Court shall obtain expert evidence and may order an enquiry to be made as to the character, antecedents and circumstances of the accused person.

Such evidence shall be obtained when the accused person shows signs of a deranged mind or epilepsy, is deaf and dumb or is suffering from chronic intoxication due to alcohol or drugs.

(2) The expert or experts shall be appointed by the court under the ordinary rules of procedure. The Court shall define their terms of reference and the matters to be elucidated.

The expert evidence shall describe the present condition of the accused person and its effect upon his faculties of judgment and free determination. It shall, in addition, afford guidance to the Court as to the expediency and the nature of medical treatment or safety measures.

(3) On the basis of the expert evidence the Court shall make such decision as it thinks fit. In reaching its decision it shall be bound solely by definite scientific findings and not by the appreciation of the expert as to the legal inferences to be drawn therefrom.

Articles 133–135 are found in Book II, Section II, "Measures Applicable to Irresponsible Persons and Offenders with a limited Responsibility."

Article 133. Principle

After having decided (Art. 51) whether the offender is irresponsible (Art. 48) or whether he is of a limited responsibility (Art. 49), the Court shall apply the following provisions having regard to the circumstances and requirements of the case.

Article 134. Confinement

(1) If the offender, by reason of his condition, is a threat to public safety or order, or if he proves to be dangerous to the persons living with him, the Court shall order his confinement in a suitable institution.

(2) If he is in need of treatment, he shall either be treated in the institution in which he is confined or be transferred to an appropriate institution in accordance with Article 135. Proper provision may be made for his safe custody.

Article 135. Treatment

(1) Where an offender is suffering from a mental disease or deficiency, deaf-and-dumbness, epilepsy, chronic alcoholism, intoxication due to the abuse of narcotics or any other pathological deficiency and requires to be treated or placed in a hospital or asylum the Court shall order his treatment in a suitable institution or department of an institution.

(2) Where the Court is satisfied that the offender is not dangerous and can be treated as an out-patient, it shall order accordingly.

The Court shall then order the offender be kept under proper supervision and control either by the medical expert in charge of the case or by some other competent authority. An order made under this Article may be revoked and the Court may require such reports as it considers necessary.

Other pertinent codal provisions for cases involving insanity defense are found in Articles 136 and 137.

Article 136. Duration of Confinement or Treatment

(1) The competent administrative authority shall carry out the Court's decision concerning treatment and confinement.

Treatment and confinement shall be of indefinite duration but the Court shall review its decision every two years. When the offender is cured, the administrative authority with the consent of the Court may release the offender.

As soon as, according to expert opinion, the reason for the measure has disappeared the administrative authority shall, after having referred the matter to the Court and upon its decision, put an end to the measure ordered.

(2) When the Court is satisfied that the treatment or confinement may be suspended, it may on the request of the administrative authority order accordingly.

The Court shall release the offender to the supervision of a selected charitable organization for not less than one year and shall in addition impose such conditions as may be necessary (Art. 210).

(3) Any order made under this Article may at any time be revoked where public safety or the condition of the released person so requires.

If the probation period is successfully undergone, the release shall be final.

Article 137. Effect of Limited Responsibility Upon Penalty

(1) Where an offender is of limited responsibility, a mitigated penalty as provided by law (Art. 49) may be imposed by the Court.

The Court may when it is necessary make an order under Art. 134 or 135 and the enforcement of the penalty shall be suspended.

(2) Upon termination of the measure ordered the Court shall, upon a report made by the Management of the institution or the responsible authority of the charitable organization, decide whether the enforcement of the penalty is still necessary and determine the extent to which the period of confinement or treatment shall be deducted from the sentence unserved.

The court shall take into account the gravity of the offence committed, the antecedents and character of the offender, the effect the internment or treatment had upon his condition and the likelihood of his permanent recovery.

(3) No penalty shall be enforced where the Court considers it inexpedient so to do.

The Ethiopian Penal Code's provisions on criminal responsibility, it will be noted, immediately precede its provisions on criminal guilt. Both responsibility and guilt are necessary elements of any criminal conduct. The offender must be responsible for his acts and he must act either intentionally or negligently. Responsibility is a condition precedent to the fulfillment of the requirement as to guilt. In Ethiopia sanity is a prerequisite to guilt.

For a finding of total irresponsibility the mental condition must render the defendant incapable of understanding or self control at the time of the act. This is substantially the same provision contained in §503 of the proposed code. If the court determines that the accused is irresponsible, then "measures" (medical treatment or confinement) are applied in lieu of punishment.

Although the provisions for limited responsibility may be found in many codes, it may be easily criticized on the ground that it is not possible to evaluate diminished responsibility accurately. On the other hand, the court must order medical treatment whenever it is clearly needed, and the court is thus given the flexibility necessary to deal with diminished responsibility in an enlightened way.

QUESTION 6

Alcohol and drug intoxication do not diminish responsibility under the Ethiopian Penal Code.

Article 50. Intentional or Culpable Irresponsibility

(1) The provisions excluding or reducing liability to punishment shall not apply to the person who in order to commit an offence intentionally put himself into a condition of irresponsibility or of limited responsibility by means of alcohol or drugs or by any other means. The general provisions of this Code are applicable in such a case.

(2) If an offender by his own fault has put himself into a condition of irresponsibility or of limited responsibility while he was aware, or could and should have been aware, that he was exposing himself, in such a condition, to the risk of committing an offence, he shall be tried and punished under the ordinary provisions governing negligence if the offence committed is punishable on such a charge. (Art. 59).

(3) In the case of an offence which was neither contemplated nor intended and was committed in a state of complete irresponsibility into which the offender put himself by his own fault, Article 485 of the Special Part of this Code relating to offences against Public Safety shall apply.

For cases involving criminal negligence (see answer to Question #1) as an element of the offense, intoxication is handled in the same manner as the American method. For cases described in §(3) of Article 50—unpremeditated irresponsible acts—there is a special sentencing provision limiting the term of imprisonment to a maximum of one year.

Article 485. Disturbances Resulting From Acts Committed in a State of Culpable Irresponsibility.

Whosoever, being deliberately or through criminal negligence in a state of complete irresponsibility due to drunkenness, intoxication or any other cause, commits while in such a state an act normally punishable with imprisonment for at least one year, is punishable with fine or with simple imprisonment not exceeding one year, according to the degree of danger or gravity of the act committed.

The provision of Article 51 (see answer to Question #5) concerning the use of expert witnesses applies to cases involving alcohol or drugs as well as to those involving a question of sanity or other afflictions of the nervous system.

In cases of confirmed alcoholism, the provisions of Article 48 or Article 49 can supersede the provisions of Article 50. In such a case, confinement and medical treatment would be the disposition rather than a jail sentence, once the disease and the causal relationship to the act were established to the satisfaction of the court.

QUESTION 7

The self defense provision of the Ethiopian Penal Code is a generalized statement covering self defense, defense of others, and defense of property.

Article 74. Self-Defence

An act done under the necessity of self-defence or the defence of another person against an imminent and unlawful assault or a threat of an assault directed against a legally protected belonging shall not be punishable if the assault or threat could not have been otherwise averted and if the defence was proportionate to the needs of the case, in particular to the danger and gravity of the assault and the importance of the belonging to be defended.

The limitations placed on self defense are found in the next article of the Code.

Article 75. Excess in Self-Defence

(1) When a person in repelling an unlawful assault exceeded the limits of self-defence by using disproportionate means or going beyond the acts necessary for averting the danger, the Court shall, without restriction, reduce the penalty (Art. 185).

(2) The Court may impose no punishment when the excess committed was due to excusable fear, surprise or excitement caused by the assault.

(3) In the case of acts exceeding strict self-defence he who repelled the assault shall remain civilly liable for the injury caused by his excess.

Use of force by persons in charge of minors is regulated by a special article.

Article 548. Maltreatment of Minors

(1) Whosoever, having the custody or charge of an infant or a young person under fifteen years of age, deliberately neglects, ill-treats, over-tasks or beats him in such a way as to affect or endanger gravely his physical or mental development or his health, is punishable with simple imprisonment for not less than one month. The Court may in addition deprive the offender of his family rights.

(2) The right to administer lawful and reasonable chastisement is not subject to this provision (Art. 64).

QUESTION 8

As indicated in the answer to Question #1, there is a group of offenses which are called "petty offenses." They are treated as minor offenses for which lesser penalties are prescribed. Otherwise all crimes are classified only to the extent that related types of offenses are placed together under a "title" and "chapter" in the Code. For sentencing, each article which defines an offense sets the punishments which may be imposed.

QUESTION 9

There are many provisions relating to sentencing which elaborate upon the mandate of Article 86.

Article 86. Calculation of Sentence

The Court shall determine the penalties and other measures in conformity with the provisions of the General Part of this Code and the special provisions defining offences and their punishments.

The penalty shall be determined according to the degree of individual guilt, taking into account the dangerous disposition of the offender, his antecedents, motive and purpose, his personal circumstances and his standard of education, as well as the gravity of his offence and the circumstances of its commission.

In the Special Part of the Code, which defines each offense, each article contains the appropriate sentence for each crime. However, some sentences refer to general articles concerning "fines" or "simple imprisonment," or a combination of the two. A fine may range from one dollar to five thousand dollars (Article 88) and simple imprisonment, from ten days to three years (Article 105).

"Rigorous imprisonment" (Article 107) is normally for a period of one to twenty-five years, but where it is expressly so laid down by law it may be for life. A sentence of rigorous imprisonment is always stated in terms of a specific maximum such as "punishable with rigorous imprisonment not exceeding five years." By the same token, simple imprisonment is for some crimes extended beyond three years by specific provisions or limited to a maximum, for example, six months, which falls within the simple imprisonment range of ten days to three years.

An interesting feature of the Ethiopian Penal Code is that the court may place the offender on probation without a conviction being entered on the police record. If he does not break the conditions of his probation, the conviction is never entered (Article 195). However, the court may elect to enter a conviction and pass sentence before ordering the sentence suspended and the offender placed on probation (Article 196). Where probation has been undergone and secondary penalties or measures which had been pronounced without suspension have been carried out, the court must order the deletion of the police record entry. Secondary punishments include flogging, caution, reprimand, admonishment and apology, and deprivation of rights (Articles 120-122).

There is also provision for a "conditional release" upon recommendation of the management of the correctional institution (Article 207). The court must then fix a period of probation which must be between two and five years.

Probationers are placed under the supervision of a charitable organization. These organizations, which may be public or private, receive the assistance and are under the control of the State. There is also provision for appointment of a probation officer (Article 215).

In Ethiopia, the judge is given a wide range of sentencing powers in an effort to individualize the sentence. Article 86, entitled "Calculation of Sentence," (see above) sets out the criteria to be applied by the court in its assessment of the sentence.

Once the sentence is passed and the offender imprisoned, the possibility of parole is based upon the system of "conditional release" previously mentioned. Conditional release is the suspension of a penalty of incarceration for good conduct where there are possibilities of rehabilitation. This concept presupposes that part of the sentence has been served in accordance with the seriousness of the offense. The court, upon recommendation of the director of the correctional institution, may grant the prisoner his freedom under the condition that he will not abuse it and that he will use it for purposes of rehabilitation (Articles 206–212). The conditions upon which anticipatory release may be granted are set forth in Article 207.

Article 207. Conditions for Release

The Court may, on the recommendation of the Management of the institution order conditional release:

(a) if, during the requisite period of performance of the penalty or the measure entailing loss of liberty, the offender, by his work and conduct, gave tangible proof of his improvement; and

(b) if he has repaired, as far as he could reasonably be expected to do, the damage found by the Court or agreed with the aggrieved party; and

(c) if the character and behaviour of the offender, as well as the living conditions he may expect to find upon his discharge, warrant the assumption that he will be of good conduct when released and that the measure will be effective.

If the released person is of good behavior until the expiration of the period of probation, his release is final and his penalty extinguished. The minimum period of probation is five years in the case of the release of a prisoner sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for life. It is usually for a period of from two to five years (Article 209).

There are special provisions for dealing with "dangerous felons." In certain enumerated instances (Article 81), called "general aggravating circumstances," or "ordinary aggravation" (Article 188), the court must increase the sentence which it would normally impose. The court is still bound by the maximum sentences specified for each crime.

Article 81. General Aggravating Circumstances

(1) The Court shall increase the penalty as provided by law (Art. 188) in the following cases:

(a) when the offender acted with treachery, with perfidy, with a base motive such as envy, hatred, greed, with a deliberate intent to injure or do wrong, or with special perversity or cruelty;

(b) when he abused his powers, or functions or the confidence, or authority vested in him;

(c) when he is particularly dangerous on account of his antecedents, the habitual or professional nature of his offence or the means, time, place and circumstances of its perpetration, in particular if he acted by night or under cover of disturbances or catastrophes or by using weapons, dangerous instruments or violence;

(d) when he acted in pursuance of a criminal agreement, together with others or as a member of a gang organized to commit offences and, more particularly, as chief, organizer or ringleader;

(e) when he intentionally assaulted a victim deserving special protection by reason of his age, state of health, position or function, in particular a defenceless, feeble-minded or invalid person, a prisoner, a relative, a superior or inferior, a minister of religion, a representative or a duly constituted authority, or a public servant in the discharge of his duties.

(2) When the law, in a special provision of the Special Part, has taken one of the same circumstances into consideration as a constituent element or as a factor of aggravation of an offence, the Court may not take this aggravation into account again.

Article 188. Ordinary Aggravation

In general cases of aggravation provided by law (Art. 81) the court shall determine the penalty within the limits specified in the relevant provision of the Special Part, taking into account the nature and the multiplicity of grounds of aggravation, as well as the degree of guilt of the offender, if necessary by going to the extent of imposing the maximum sentence enacted. Such maximum is binding upon it.

In addition, the court must give written reasons for finding extenuating or aggravating circumstances which are not expressly provided for by the Code (Article 83). Some aggravating circumstances are included in the definition of the crime. In such cases, the aggravated crime will carry the greater penalty. For example, "aggravated homicide—homicide in the first degree" (Article 522) carries greater penalties than "homicide in the second degree" (Article 533), and the difference stems from the manner in which the offense is carried out.

Aggravated homicide is punishable with rigorous imprisonment for life, or death. There is a compulsory death sentence where the offender has committed murder in the first degree while serving a sentence of rigorous imprisonment for life. The motive of this law is obviously to find a means of controlling the behavior of convicts serving life sentences.

A comparison of the penalties for homicide by negligence (Article 526) with those of §1603, negligent homicide, shows that the Ethiopian Penal Code imposes a less severe penalty.

Article 526. Homicide by Negligence

(1) Whosoever, by criminal negligence, causes the death of another, is punishable with simple imprisonment or fine.

(2) Simple imprisonment shall not exceed five years where the homicide is caused by a person who has a special professional duty to safeguard life.

Likewise, although "extenuated homicide" (Article 524) is roughly equivalent to manslaughter under §1602 of the proposed Federal Code, it carries a much milder sentence of simple imprisonment not exceeding five years. In the area of unintentional homicide, the committee should ask what reasonable purpose is served by the imposition of lengthy prison sentences.

The Ethiopian Penal Code contains mandatory minimum prison sentences for some offenses. For example, there is an article making it a crime to fail to give aid to others in certain circumstances. If the offender was under an obligation to provide such aid, then there is a mandatory minimum imprisonment.

Article 547. Failure To Lend Aid to Another

(1) Whosoever intentionally leaves without help a person in imminent and grave peril of his life, person or health, when he could have lent him assistance, direct or indirect, without risk to himself or to third parties, is punishable with simple imprisonment not exceeding six months, or fine.

(2) Simple imprisonment shall be in addition to the fine, and shall be from one month to one year, where:

(a) the victim has been wounded by the offender himself no matter in what circumstances or by what means; or

(b) the offender was under an obligation, professional or contractual, medical, maritime or other, to go to the victim's aid or to lend him assistance.

The Ethiopian Penal Code contains an article on publicity for judgments. It is not, however, limited in its applicability to convicted organizations.

Article 159. Publication of the Judgment

(1) Whenever the general interest or that of the accused or of the injured person so requires the Court shall order the publication of the judgment or parts thereof.

Such publication shall be ordered as a matter of course when it serves the public interest; it shall be effected only on request when it serves private interests.

Where an accused person is convicted he shall be liable for the costs of such publication. In case of acquittal they shall be borne by the complainant or informer or, failing such, by the State.

(2) The Court shall determine the conditions under which the publications shall take place and their number, according to usage, the circumstances of the case and expediency.

Publication may be effected by means of posters in a public place, notices issued in an official or a privately owned gazette, or by the town-crier.

Another article gives the court authority to order the offender to make a public apology to the victim of the offense.

Article 121. Caution, Reprimand, Admonishment, and Apology

(1) Where the court considers that an appeal to the honour of the offender will have beneficial effects on the offender and on society at large, it may in open court, either during the trial or in its judgment, caution, admonish or reprimand the offender.

The Court may also order the offender to make a public apology to the person injured by the offence, or to the persons having rights from such injured person.

(2) The Court may apply any of the punishments mentioned in this Article instead of the principal punishment where it is specifically laid down by law that such punishments apply to minor offences; or where extenuating circumstances are present (Art. 79 and 80); or where the law provides for a free mitigation of the punishment (Art. 185); or where enforcement of the sentence is postponed (Art. 196).

There is a section in the Ethiopian Code called "Measures against Recidivists and Habitual Offenders." Such persons are sent to special institutions where they are "interred" and are subject to stricter supervision than ordinary facilities can offer. Applicable articles on this subject are as follows.

Article 128. Internment

(1) Where an offender who has served several sentences involving loss of liberty and who shows an ingrained propensity to evil doing, misbehavior or incurable laziness, or habitually derives his livelihood from crime, is convicted for a further offence punishable with imprisonment not exceeding five years the Court shall order internment in place of any other penalty of loss of liberty.

(2) Internment may be ordered where the new offence is intentional and denotes the dangerous disposition of the offender, notwithstanding that it is not serious or not of the same kind as the previous offences.

Article 129. Conditions of Enforcement

(1) Internment shall be undergone in an institution, labour colony, or place of relegation used for such purpose.

Persons interned shall perform the work assigned to them.

(2) Conditions in such institutions shall be analogous to those applied in penitentiary institutions in general (Art. 109–111) subject to such restrictions or stricter measures of supervision as may be justified.

Particulars of such measures shall be laid down in regulations.

Article 130. Duration

(1) Internment shall be ordered without fixing its duration. But no offender shall be kept to internment for less than two years or more than ten years. Internment shall always be subject to conditional release.

The period of remand shall not be taken into consideration (Art. 114).

(2) At any time after two years of internment have been completed the Court, having regard to the gravity of the case may, on the recommendation of the Director of the institution where the offender is interned, order his conditional release on the usual conditions (Art. 206–212).

In addition, there is an article which provides for increased penalties in cases where a sentence has been previously served by the offender for the same offenses.

Article 193. Aggravation in Case of Recidivism

(1) Where an offense is committed after a sentence has been served in whole or in part in respect of a former offence (Art. 83 (b)), the Court shall aggravate the penalty and is not bound by the provisions of the Special Part of this Code. It may exceed the penalty provided for the offence, having regard to the circumstances of the new offence, the degree of guilt and the danger represented by the offender and is bound solely by the general maximum specified for the kind of penalty imposed.

(2) Nothing in this Article shall affect the provisions relating to internment in cases specified under Article 128 of this Code.

As previously discussed, a court in Ethiopia may find extenuating or aggravating circumstances which are not mentioned in the Code. In such cases, the court's reasons must be stated in writing.

Article 83. Other Circumstances

The Court shall give reasons for applying extenuating or aggravating circumstances not expressly provided for in this Code and shall state clearly its reasons for taking this exceptional course.

Article 84. Cumulation of Extenuating and Aggravating Circumstances

(1) If there exists both extenuating and aggravating circumstances the Court shall take both into consideration in determining the sentence.

(2) In the event of concurrent aggravating and extenuating circumstances the Court shall first fix the penalty having regard to the aggravating circumstances and then shall reduce the penalty in light of the extenuating circumstances.

Sentences may be reviewed on appeal by a higher Ethiopian court. The powers of appellate courts are stated in the Criminal Procedure Code of The Empire of Ethiopia of 1961.

Article 195. Powers of Court of Appeal

(1) At the hearing of an appeal the court of appeal shall dismiss the appeal where there is no sufficient ground for interference.

(2) Where it considers that there is sufficient ground for interference, the court of appeal may:

(a) on an appeal from an order of acquittal or discharge reverse such order and direct that the accused be retried by a court of competent jurisdiction or find him guilty and sentence him according to law; or

(b) on an appeal from conviction and sentence:

(i) reverse the finding and sentence and acquit the accused; or

(ii) with or without altering the finding, maintain, increase or reduce the sentence;

(c) on an appeal from conviction only reverse the finding and sentence and acquit the accused;

(d) on an appeal from sentence only maintain, increase or reduce the sentence.

(3) Where the court of appeal confirms the conviction but alters the sentence or vice versa a second appeal shall lie only in respect of the conviction or sentence which has been altered.

Sentencing for concurrent offenses is governed by the provisions of Article 82(1)(a), which defines "material concurrence" (when the offender successively committed several offenses, whatever their nature) and "notional concurrence" (when the act simultaneously contravenes several criminal provisions). Generally, only one penalty, the most severe, is allowed. In these cases, "the penalty shall be aggravated under the relevant special provisions [Articles 189–193]." The major provisions are as follows.

Article 189. Circumstantial Aggravation in Case of Concurrent Offences

(1) In case of material concurrence of offences (Art. 82(a)) the court shall determine the penalty on the basis of the general rule set out hereafter, taking into account, for the assessment of the sentence, the degree of guilt of the offender:

(a) where capital punishment is provided for one of the concurrent offences this penalty shall override any other penalties entailing loss of liberty;

(b) in case of several penalties entailing loss of liberty being concurrently applicable the court shall pass an aggregate sentence as follows: it shall impose the penalty deserved for the most serious offence and shall increase its length taking into account the provisions of the law or the concurrent offences; it may, if it thinks fit, impose a penalty exceeding by half the basic penalty without, however, being able to go beyond the general maximum fixed by law for the kind of penalty applied;

(c) in case of concurrence between a penalty entailing loss of liberty and a fine the court may impose both penalties taking into account the various provisions applicable or the concurrent offences; it may not exceed the general maximum prescribed by law for each kind of penalty;

(d) in cases where several fines have to be applied the Court shall impose a single fine the amount of which shall not exceed the aggregate amount of the separate fines, nor the general maximum amount provided by law, save in cases where the offender acted for gain (Art. 90).

(e) where the court orders the forfeiture of the property owned by the offender it may not, in case of concurrence, impose a fine either as principal or as secondary penalty.

(2) Any secondary penalty or preventive, corrective or safety measure may be applied even though its application is justified under only one of the relevant provisions or in respect of only one of the concurrent offences.

Article 192. Simultaneous Breach of Several Provisions

Where by one and the same act the offender committed a breach of several criminal provisions (notional concurrence Art. 82(a)), the Court may aggravate the penalty according to the provisions of Art. 189 where the offender's deliberate and calculated disregard for the law justifies aggravation; it shall be bound to do so in cases of aggravation expressly provided by law (Art. 63(2)).

In other cases, the Court may only impose the maximum penalty prescribed by the most severe of the relevant provisions.

Under Article 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code, supra, the appellate court may impose an appropriate sentence in the case of a partial reversal.

The Ethiopian Penal Code has a special provision for economic crimes which has a broader application when the court finds that the offender had an economic motive for commission of any crime.

Article 90. Motive of Gain as an Aggravating Circumstance

(1) Without prejudice to any special provision of the law prescribing a higher maximum, where the offender has acted with a motive of gain or where he makes a business of crime in a way that he acquires or tries to acquire a gain whenever a favourable opportunity presents itself, and where it appears to the Court that, having regard to the financial condition of, and the profit made by, the offender, it is expedient so to do, it may impose a fine which shall not exceed ten thousand dollars.

The amount of the fine shall always be in addition to the confiscation of the profit made.

(2) Notwithstanding that no provision is specifically made in the Special Part of this Code, where although gain is not an essential element of an offence, the offender was motivated by gain in the commission of such offence, the Court may impose a fine in addition to imprisonment or other punishment provided by law.

The Ethiopian Penal Code contains provisions for the collection of fines and includes conversion of the fine into simple imprisonment upon default of payment. An alternative means of collection is the conversion of the fine into labor for the State at a certain rate, the minimum of which is provided by law. The amount to be earned per day by the offender's labor is set by the court in each case. The ability of the offender to pay is the criterion to be applied.

Article 91. Recovery of Fine

(1) Where the offender cannot pay the fine forthwith the court may allow a period of time for payment; such period may extend, according to circumstances, from one to three months.

(2) Where, having regard to the circumstances of the offender, it appears to the court that it is expedient so to do, it may direct the payment of the fine to be made by installments within a period not longer than two years.

In fixing the amount and the date for payment of each installment, the court shall take into consideration the actual means of the offender.

Article 92. Conversion of Fine Into Labour

In default of payment of the fine in the manner aforementioned, the Court may allow the offender to settle the fine by doing work for the State or for any public authority and in such case the period within which the fine is to be settled shall be determined.

The Court shall fix an amount, which in no case shall be less than one dollar for each day's work and in fixing such amount it shall have regard to the circumstances of the offender and particularly to his average daily earnings.

Article 93. Security or Surety for the Payment of Fine

Whenever a fine is not paid forthwith, the court may require the offender to produce such security or sureties as is sufficient to ensure the payment of the fine within the stated period.

The security or sureties shall be determined having regard to the circumstances of the case, the condition of the offender and the interests of justice.

Article 94. Conversion of Fine Into Simple Imprisonment in Default of Payment.

(1) The fine, or any part thereof, which remains unpaid within the stated period may be levied by the seizure of the offender's goods.

(2) If there are no goods liable to seizure or if such seizure will cause hardship to the offender or to his family, the fine or any part thereof which remains unpaid shall be converted into simple imprisonment.

The period of simple imprisonment shall be at the rate of one day for such amount as may be specified in the judgment having regard to the personal and financial condition of the offender.

In no case shall simple imprisonment exceed two years.

(3) Simple imprisonment shall terminate when the offender pays the fine or part thereof which is still due. Simple imprisonment shall also terminate when the offender provides a security or surety which, in the opinion of the Court, is sufficient.

It should be mentioned that the Ethiopian Penal Code contains legislation geared to expedite compensation for damages caused by an offense, including a provision that a part of the fine or of the "yield" derived from the conversion of the fine into work is to be appropriated to the benefit of the victim of the crime. The State pays the compensation and the claim is assigned to the State, which enforces it. The compensation scheme is set forth in two articles.

Article 100. Compensation for Damages Caused by an Offence

(1) Where an offence has caused considerable damage to the injured person or to those having rights from him, particularly in cases of death, injuries to the body or health, defamation, damage to property or destruction of goods, the injured person or the persons having rights from him shall be entitled to claim that the offender be ordered to make good the damage or to make restitution or to pay damages by way of compensation

Such claim shall include any expenses in hospital or expenses for medical treatment to such amount as may be assessed by expert evidence.

(2) The right to sue, the conditions under which an award is to be made, and the right to and extent of the restitution, damages and indemnification shall be governed by the provisions of the civil law on such matter.

The court shall hear evidence and the submission of both parties and shall make an order according to its findings and where the parties have reached an agreement which in the opinion of the court is just, it shall make an order accordingly.

The payment of any sum due on such order may be secured by the seizure of goods of the offender, not being goods which are necessary for his livelihood or for the exercise of his trade or profession.

(3) For the purpose of establishing his or their claim, the injured person or the persons having rights from him may be joined as parties in the criminal proceedings.

The conditions, form and manner of such joinder shall be governed by the provisions laid down in the Criminal Procedure Code.

In cases of a complicated nature or where the circumstances of the case make it expedient so to do, particularly where an inquiry has to be held in connection with the offense or where it is necessary to have the report of experts, the court sitting in Criminal Court may remit the case for decision by the civil court.

Article 101. Compensation to Injured Party

(1) Where it appears that compensation will not be paid by the offender or those liable on his behalf on account of the circumstances of the case or their situation, the court may order that the proceeds or part of the proceeds of the sale of the articles distrained, or the sum guaranteed as surety, or a part of the fine or of the yield of the conversion into work, or confiscated family property be paid to the injured party.

(2) The granting of such compensation shall not be awarded except upon express application. It shall be proportionate to the extent of the damage suffered and to the needs of the injured party and the members of his family and shall be limited as a maximum to the amount of the damage as assessed by the Court or agreed by the parties.

(3) The claim of the injured party who has been compensated shall be assigned to the State which may enforce it against the person who caused the damage.

QUESTION 10

Mistake of law and ignorance of law are not defenses in Ethiopia. The court is directed to impose no punishment in justifiable cases.

Article 78. Mistake of Law and Ignorance of Law

(1) Ignorance of the law is no defence.

The Court shall, without restriction, reduce the punishment (Art. 185) applicable to a person who in good faith believed he had a right to act and had definite and adequate reasons for holding this erroneous belief.

The Court shall determine the penalty taking into account the circumstances of the case and, in particular, the circumstances that led to the error.

(2) In exceptional cases of absolute and justifiable ignorance and good faith and where criminal intent is not apparent, the Court may impose no punishment.

(3) The person who committed the breach of the law shall remain civilly liable for the injury caused.

The mistake of fact provisions of the Ethiopian Penal Code follow closely the provisions relating to criminal intent and criminal negligence. When there is no criminal intent, there is no offense, but criminal negligence is punishable in all cases where it results in an offense, regardless of a mistake of fact.

Article 76. Mistake of Fact

(1) Whosoever commits an offence under an erroneous appreciation of the true facts of the situation shall be tried according to such appreciation.

Where there is no criminal intention the doer shall not be punishable. Where he could have avoided the mistake by taking such precautions as were commanded by his personal position and the circumstances of the case (Art. 59), he shall be punishable for negligence in cases where such negligence is penalized by law.

(2) Mistake as to a fact which constitutes a specified offence shall not exclude the punishment of the doer for another offence constituted by the act he performed.

(3) The offence is committed where there is a mistake as to the identity of the victim or the object of the offence.

QUESTION 11

It should be pointed out that the Proposed Federal Code is unduly repetitious in the matter of separation of the jurisdictional base upon which federal prosecution rests from the definition of the offense. Rather, it fails to accomplish its stated objective. In a true code there is no reason to repeat what has already been stated elsewhere. For example, §1001(4) refers to §203 and is absolutely unnecessary. The most that is called for is perhaps a passing reference to §1001 in the "comments." This repetition permeates the Proposed Code. An example of unnecessary repetition is found in §1002(4). Why not include the word "federal" in front of the word "felony" in §1002(1)? Another example is found in §210(e) of the proposed Code, which speaks of any "key containing deposits of guano." If this phrase could not be omitted entirely by the legislator, would not the term "guano island" be more concise?

In Ethiopia the jurisdictions of various courts over the trial of offenses defined in the Penal Code are specified by means of a "schedule" which is an appendix to the Criminal Procedure Code. Each article of the Penal Code which defines a crime is listed in the schedule by number, then the name of the offense and the court having jurisdiction is indicated.

QUESTION 12

The substance of the Ethiopian provisions on extraterritorial jurisdiction is similar to that of the Proposed Federal Code. The methodology differs. Instead of repeating or listing many instances of extraterritoriality, one article makes reference to certain crimes which are given extraterritorial treatment.

Article 13. Offences Committed in a Foreign Country Against Ethiopia

This Code shall apply to any person who in a foreign country has committed one of the offences against the Emperor and the Empire, their safety or integrity, its institutions or essential interests as defined in Book III, Title I, Chapter I, and under Title V of the Special Part of this Code (Art. 248–272 and Art. 366–382).

Other instances of extraterritorial jurisdiction are covered by separate articles: offenses committed in a foreign country by an Ethiopian enjoying immunity (Article 14); offenses committed in a foreign country by members of the Armed Forces (Article 15); offenses committed in a foreign country against international law or universal order (Article 17); and other offenses committed in a foreign country by or against Ethiopians when the offense is also a crime in Ethiopia and has not been prosecuted in the foreign country (Article 18).

QUESTION 13

Only in certain instances is conspiracy to commit a crime considered to be an offense without some other offense actually being carried out. Only in cases of conspiracy against national security (Articles 248–269), or conspiracy to commit genocide or war crimes (Articles 281–286) or to raise a mutiny of the armed forces (Article 313) is conspiracy per se defined to be criminal conduct. Otherwise, the conspiracy must "materialize" before there is a crime (Article 472). In such cases, anyone who helped plan or prepare for the commission of the offense is guilty of the separate offense of conspiracy. In addition, for those who commit the planned offense, criminal conspiracy is treated as an aggravating circumstance for which the court must increase the penalty of the primary offense (Article 37).

QUESTION 14

Ethiopia does not have a "felony murder" doctrine. The individual must have an intent to commit the homicide before he may be found liable for it. He may be held liable, however, if he concurs in the homicide while in the company of others who actually perform the act.

Article 32. Principal Act: Offender and Co-Offenders

(1) A person shall be regarded as having committed an offence and punished as such if:

(a) he actually commits the offence either directly or indirectly, for example by means of an animal or a natural force; or

(b) he without performing the criminal act itself fully associates himself with the commission of the offence and the intended result; or

(c) he employs a mentally deficient person for the commission of an offence or knowingly compels another person to commit an offence.

(2) Where the offence committed goes beyond the intention of the offender he shall be tried in accordance with Article 78(3).

(3) Where several co-offenders are involved they shall be liable to the same punishment as provided by law.

The Court shall take into account the provisions governing the effect of personal circumstances (Art. 40) and those governing the award of punishment according to the degree of individual guilt (Art. 86).

Article 36. Accomplice

(1) An accomplice is a person who knowingly assists a principal offender either before or during the carrying out of the criminal design, whether by information, advice, supply of means or material aid or assistance of any kind whatsoever in the commission of an offence.

(2) An accomplice in an intentional offence shall always be liable to punishment.

(3) The punishment to be imposed shall be the punishment for the offence whether attempted or completed insofar as such offence does not go beyond the accomplice's intention (Art. 58(3)). The Court may, taking into account the circumstances of the case, reduce the punishment in respect to an accomplice within the limits specified by law (Art. 184).

Organized armed robbery is specified in the homicide article as an aggravating circumstance which can justify the death penalty for a homicide committed during its course.

Article 522. Aggravated Homicide—Homicide in the First Degree

(1) Whosoever intentionally commits homicide:

(a) with such premeditation, motives or means, in such conditions of commission, or in any other aggravating circumstances, whether general (Art. 81), or particular duly established (Art. 83), as to betoken that he is exceptionally cruel or dangerous; or

(b) as a member of a band or gang organized for carrying out homicide or armed robbery; or

(c) to further or to conceal another crime; is punishable with rigorous imprisonment for life, or death.

(2) Death sentence shall be passed where the offender has committed murder in the first degree while serving a sentence of rigorous imprisonment for life.

But even in Article 522 the individual intent requirement is retained.

Ethiopia does not have a federal system. Some comparable provisions of the Ethiopian Penal Code are as follows.

Article 474. Public Provocation to or Defence of a Crime

Whosoever publicly, by word of mouth, writing, image, gesture or otherwise:

(a) provokes others to commit acts of violence or grave offences against the community, individuals or property; or

(b) defends or praises such offence or its perpetrator; or

(c) launches an appeal or starts a collection for the payment of pecuniary punishments pronounced by due process of law, with the intention of making common cause with the convicted person or of upholding his deed or of showing disapproval of the authorities, or who knowingly takes part in such activities, is punishable with simple imprisonment or fine.

Article 475. Prohibited Traffic in Arms

(1) Whosoever:

(a) apart from offences against the security of the State (Art. 254), makes, imports, exports or transports, acquires, receives, stores or hides, offers for sale, puts into circulation or distributes, without special authorisation or contrary to law, weapons or munitions of any kind; or

(b) without indulging in trafficking, knowingly sells, delivers or hands over arms to suspect or dangerous persons, is punishable with simple imprisonment, without prejudice to the imposition of a fine, where he has acted for gain or has made a profession of such activities, and to confiscation of material seized.

(2) Occasional violations of police regulations, and the carrying or use of prohibited weapons, are subject to the penalties for petty offences (Art. 763 and 764).

Article 478. Forbidden Assemblies

(1) Whosoever forms, organizes or commands, on the public highway or in a public place, assemblies forbidden by law, or of his own free will takes part in them, is punishable with a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars. Ringleaders, organizers or commanders are punishable with simple imprisonment not exceeding one year.

(2) Where the unlawful assembly is armed, simple imprisonment shall be for at least three months, and may be increased up to the general maximum in the case of ringleaders, organizers and commanders and those who have carried weapons or knew that weapons were being carried.

Article 479. Alarming the Public

(1) Whosoever spreads alarm among the public:

(a) by threat of danger to the community; or to the life, health or property of individuals, especially that of invasion, assassination, fire, devastation or pillage; or

(b) by deliberately spreading false rumours concerning such happenings or general disturbances, or imminent catastrophe or calamity, is punishable with simple imprisonment or fine.

(2) In more serious cases likely to cause, or having caused, serious disturbances or disorder, the punishment shall be rigorous imprisonment not exceeding three years, subject to the application, as appropriate, of more severe specific provisions where there are criminal consequences.

Article 480. False Rumours and Incitement to Breaches of the Peace

Whosoever, apart from offences against the security of the State (Art. 252, 269(e) and 273(a)):

(a) starts or spreads false rumours, suspicions or false charges against the Government or the public authorities or their activities, thereby disturbing or inflaming public opinion, or creating a danger of public disturbances; or

(b) by whatever accusation or any other means foments dissension, arouses hatred, or stirs up acts of violence or political, racial or religious disturbances, is punishable with simple imprisonment or fine.

Article 482. Rioting

(1) Whosoever, of his own free will, takes part in an unlawful assembly in the course of which violence is done collectively to person, estate or property, is punishable with simple imprisonment for at least one month, or fine.

(2) The organizers, instigators or ringleaders are punishable with fine and with simple imprisonment for not less than six months or, in grave cases, with rigorous imprisonment not exceeding five years. All persons who have individually committed acts of violence against person or property are punishable with rigorous imprisonment not exceeding three years, where their act does not constitute an offence subject to more severe punishment under any other provision of this Code.

QUESTION 16

The Ethiopian Penal Code does have articles the object of which are similar to §1104 (Para-Military Activities) of the Proposed Federal Code, except that "political purposes" are not required as the object of the activity. These articles are designed to be supplemented by administrative regulations.

Article 476. Forbidden Societies and Meetings

Whosoever:

(a) founds, organizes or commands a society, band, meetings or assemblies forbidden, either generally or from time to time by law, by the Government or by the competent authority; or

(b) knowingly takes part in such activities: or

(c) knowingly places premises or land at the disposal of forbidden societies, meetings or demonstrations, whether for consideration or free of charge, is punishable with a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars. Ringleaders, organizers or commanders are punishable with simple imprisonment not exceeding six months.

Article 477. Secret Societies and Armed Bands

Where unlawful societies whose activities and meetings are secret, or unlawful armed societies or bands, especially for military training or shooting, or ostensibly sporting in character, are involved, the punishment shall be simple imprisonment and a fine, which may be up to the general maximum in the case of organizers, commanders or active members.

QUESTION 17–A. DRUGS

Book IV of the Special Part of the Ethiopian Penal Code is entitled "Offences Against the Public Interest or the Community." Title VIII of Book IV, "Offences Against Public Health," contains an article concerning drugs.

Article 510. Production, Making or Distribution of Poisonous or Narcotic Substances

(1) Whosoever, without lawful authority, produces or makes, transforms, imports, exports or transports, acquires or receives, stores, offers for sale or distributes, or procures for another, poisons, drugs or narcotic substances, is punishable with simple imprisonment for not less than three months, and with fine not exceeding twenty thousand dollars.

(2) The same punishment may be inflicted upon anyone who knowingly places at the disposal of another, even privately, premises where the taking of drugs or narcotic substances is practised.

(3) The court may pass sentence of rigorous imprisonment not exceeding five years and impose a fine not exceeding thirty thousand dollars:

(a) where the offence is committed by a band or association organized for this traffic, or by a person who makes a profession of such felonious activities; or

(b) where such forbidden toxic substance or access to the premises is furnished knowingly, for gain or for an improper motive, to an infant or young person, a mental defective or a drug addict.

Section (2) appears designed to encourage landlords to inform police authorities of drug abuse discovered on their premises.

QUESTION 17–B. ABORTION

The Ethiopian Penal Code contains extensive provisions relating to abortion (Articles 528–536). Generally, the deliberate termination of a pregnancy is an offense (Article 528). The nature and extent of the punishment (Article 529) depends upon whether the abortion is procured by the pregnant woman herself or by another person, in which case the penalty is greater, and in the latter case according to whether or not she gave her consent (Article 530). If the woman's consent was not voluntary, the penalty is increased.

The advertising for contraceptives or abortive means is punishable under the code of petty offenses (Articles 528(2) and 802). An attempt to procure an abortion on a woman wrongly supposed to be pregnant is an offense, but the court may, without restriction, reduce the punishment (Articles 532 and 529). Where the abortion has been performed as the result of "an exceptionally grave state of physical or mental distress, especially following rape or incest, or because of extreme poverty," the court may mitigate the punishment without restriction (Article 533).

In addition, there is provision for the termination of pregnancy on medical grounds (Article 534). Two physicians must concur, in writing, of the necessity "to save the pregnant woman from grave and permanent danger to life or health which it is impossible to avert in any other way." The second doctor must be qualified as a specialist in the alleged defect of health from which the pregnant woman is suffering. In addition, the woman's consent, or, where she is incapacitated, her legal representative's consent must be obtained and "duly substantiated" (Article 534). The confirming physician is obligated to report his findings to health authorities within a time provided by law and the terminating physician must report the abortion "forthwith." Penalties, including a temporary suspension of the right to practice medicine, are provided for failure to comply with the reporting requirements (Article 535). Special provisions cover emergency situations (Article 535).

QUESTION 17–C. PROSTITUTION

Prostitution is not a crime in Ethiopia. However, there are provisions against the exploitation of prostitution by another.

Article 604. Habitual Exploitation for Pecuniary Gain

Whosoever, for gain, makes a profession of or lives by procuring or on the prostitution or immorality of another, or maintains, as a landlord or keeper, a disorderly house is punishable with simple imprisonment and fine.

There are also provisions against trafficking in women, infants and young persons (Article 605), and organization of traffic in persons (Article 607). The former includes keeping a disorderly house and the latter includes the making of "arrangements or provisions of any kind" for such traffic.

QUESTION 17–D. OBSCENITY

With respect to obscenity, there are several detailed provisions in the Ethiopian Penal Code in a section entitled "Offences Tending to Corrupt Morals." The deliberate performance in a public place or within sight of the public of "the sexual act or any other obscene act or gesture grossly offensive to decency or morals" is prohibited (Article 608). Trafficking or trading in obscene or indecent publications is also forbidden (Article 609).

QUESTIONS 17–E. HOMOSEXUALITY

Section II of Title IV, Book V, of the Sepcial Part of the Ethiopian Penal Code is entitled "Sexual Deviations." Homosexual activity between consenting adults is criminal conduct.

Article 600. Unnatural Carnal Offences

(1) Whosoever performs with another person of the same sex an act corresponding to the sexual act, or any other indecent act, is punishable with simple imprisonment.

(2) The provisions of Art. 597 are applicable where an infant or young person is involved.

There are provisions for aggravation of the offense (coercion, use of violence, etc.) and prohibition of other unnatural acts. This section of the Code concludes with the following article:

Article 603. Demonstrable Pathological Deviations Reserved

Nothing in this section shall prevent the application of curative or protective measures (Art. 134 and 135) in pathological cases where, according to expert opinion, the offender is partially irresponsible.

QUESTION 18

The Ethiopian Penal Code has one article which prohibits unauthorized gun traffic and one provision which prohibits criminal use of explosives and incendiary or poisonous substances. They are drafted in a broad fashion. The arms trafficking article is drafted to be used in conjunction with a regulatory scheme of gun control. Gun traffic is prohibited "without special authorization or contrary to law."

Article 475. Prohibited Traffic in Arms

(1) Whosoever:

(a) apart from offences against the security of the State (Art. 254), makes, imports, exports or transports, acquires, receives, stores or hides, offers for sale, puts into circulation or distributes, without special authorisation or contrary to law, weapons or munitions of any kind; or

(b) without indulging in trafficking, knowingly sells, delivers or hands over arms to suspect or dangerous persons, is punishable with simple imprisonment, without prejudice to the imposition of a fine, where he has acted for gain or has made a profession of such activities, and to confiscation of material seized.

(2) Occasional violations of police regulations, and the carrying or use of prohibited weapons, are subject to the penalties for petty offences (Art. 763 and 764).

Article 494. Illicit Making, Acquisition, Concealment or Transport

(1) Whosoever makes explosives, incendiary or poisonous substances, knowing that they are intended for unlawful use, is punishable, according to the circumstances, with rigorous imprisonment not exceeding ten years, or with simple imprisonment for not less than six months.

(2) Whosoever, knowing that another wishes to make unlawful use of such substances, furnishes him with means or instructions for making them, is punishable with rigorous imprisonment not exceeding five years, or with simple imprisonment for not less than three months.

(3) Whosoever, knowing that they are intended for unlawful use, imports, acquires or procures explosive, incendiary or poisonous substances or the materials used in their manufacture, hands them over to or receives them from another, or stores, conceals or transports them, whether for consideration or free of charge, is punishable with rigorous imprisonment not exceeding five years, or with simple imprisonment for not less than three months.

Ethiopia employs the death penalty extensively in matters of state, including attempts against the emperor's life or against the imperial dynasty, war crimes, espionage, treason, and so forth. Usually the death penalty is an alternative to a prison sentence and is to be applied only "in cases of exceptional gravity." These offenses are found in Book III of the Code, "Offences Against the State or Against National or International Interests."

The death penalty may be imposed for aggravated homicide (homicide in the first degree) (Article 522). The death sentence is compulsory "where the offender has committed murder in the first degree while serving a sentence of rigorous imprisonment for life" [Article 522(2)].

The aggravated robbery article also contains captial punishment for gangsters, as follows:

Article 637. Aggravated Robbery

(2) The court may order rigorous imprisonment for life, or in the most serious cases, the death penalty, where the offender has acted together with a gang, used dangerous weapons, means imperilling collective security or means of particular cruelty, or where the acts of violence committed have resulted in permanent disability or death.

Armed robbery committed habitually by a gang is punishable with death.

There is no special provision for sentencing in capital cases. In all cases where the accused is found guilty, the court must ask the prosecutor whether he has anything to say as regards sentence by way of aggravation or mitigation (Article 149, Criminal Procedure Code). The prosecutor may call witnesses as to the character of the accused. Where the prosecutor has made submissions on sentence, the accused is entitled to reply and may call witnesses as to his character. It is provided that "where the accused does not admit any fact regarding his antecedents, the prosecutor shall be required to prove the same." In addition, the court itself may at any time before giving judgment call any witness whose testimony it thinks is necessary in the interests of justice (Article 143, Criminal Procedure Code).

The sentencing provisions of the Ethiopian Penal Code contain alternative or flexible penalties for almost every crime. Article 86 of that Code provides that "the penalty shall be determined according to the degree of individual guilt, taking into account the dangerous disposition of the offender, his antecedents, motive and purpose, his personal circumstances and his standard of education, as well as the gravity of his offense and the circumstances of its commission." The absence of a jury system does not make separate sentencing hearings superfluous. The sentencing process assumes that guilt has been established. At that time the court may hear testimony from all sources in order to properly exercise its duty under Article 86.

QUESTION 20

The Ethiopian Penal Code takes an approach similar to that taken by §703 to the problem of prosecution for multiple related offenses in that it limits the sentences which can be imposed under such circumstances.

Article 192. Simultaneous Breach of Several Provisions

Where by one and the same act the offender committed a breach of several criminal provisions (notional concurrence Art. 82(a)), the Court may aggravate the penalty according to the provisions of Art. 189 where the offender's deliberate and calculated disregard for the law justifies aggravation; it shall be bound to do so in cases of aggravation expressly provided by law (Art. 63(2)).

In other cases, the Court may only impose the maximum penalty prescribed by the most severe of the relevant provisions.

Article 189. Circumstantiated Aggravation in Case of Concurrent Offences

(1) In case of material concurrence of offences (Art. 82(a)) the court shall determine the penalty on the basis of the general rules set out hereafter, taking into account, for the assessment of the sentence, the degree of guilt of the offender:

(a) where capital punishment is provided for one of the concurrent offences this penalty shall override any other penalties entailing loss of liberty;

(b) in case of several penalties entailing loss of liberty being concurrently applicable the court shall pass an aggregate sentence as follows: It shall impose the penalty deserved for the most serious offence and shall increase its length taking into account the provisions of the law or the concurrent offences; it may, if it thinks fit, impose a penalty exceeding by half the basic penalty without, however, being able to go beyond the general maximum fixed by law for the kind of penalty applied;

(c) in case of concurrence between a penalty entailing loss of liberty and a fine the court may impose both penalties taking into account the various provisions applicable or the concurrent offences; it may not exceed the general maximum prescribed by law for each kind of penalty;

(d) in cases where several fines have to be applied the Court shall impose a single fine the amount of which shall not exceed the aggregate amount of the separate fines, nor the general maximum amount provided by law, save in cases where the offender acted for gain (Art. 90).

(e) Where the court orders the forfeiture of the property owned by the offender it may not, in case of concurrence, impose a fine either as principal or as secondary penalty.

(2) Any secondary penalty or preventive, corrective or safety measure may be applied even though its application is justified under only one of the relevant provisions or in respect of only one of the concurrent offences.

The effect of Article 189 is to mitigate the penalty for concurrent offenses. These provisions focus, in the disposition stage of the proceedings, upon the problem of the defendant's criminality and the need for rehabilitation rather than upon piling up the maximum punishment possible.

The problem of double jeopardy and the related doctrines of res judicata and collateral estoppel are partially provided for by Article 2(3) of the Ethiopian

Penal Code, which simply states that "nobody shall be punished twice for the same act."

Article 60 affords a measure of protection from double jeopardy in that it "merges" certain acts into a single offense so that multiple crimes do not result where, in many instances, several offenses could be charged under American practice. Conviction of "lesser included offenses" is allowed if proof of the most serious offense fails (Article 113(2), Criminal Procedure Code).

Article 60. Unity of Guilt and Penalty

(1) The same criminal act or a combination of criminal acts against the same protected right flowing from a single criminal intention or act of negligence, cannot be charged under two or more concurrent provisions of the same nature.

(2) Successive or repeated acts against the same protected right flowing from the same initial criminal intention or act of negligence and aiming at achieving the same purpose constitute one offence; the offender shall be charged with the said offence and not with each of the successive acts which constitute it.

(3) In cases of offences resulting from injury to property, the putting into circulation of counterfeit coins, or the use of forged documents, the subsequent acts performed by the offender himself after the commission of the main offence for the purpose of carrying out his initial criminal scheme shall not constitute a fresh offence liable to punishment and are merged by the unity of intention and purpose.

Once it is decided that multiple offenses have been committed, because those offenses are not "merged" into a single liability under Article 60, then we speak of the offenses as being "concurrent." There are two types of concurrence defined in Article 82, previously discussed in the answer to Question #9. "Concurrence" should be thought of as the relationship between offenses committed by an offender if they are not merged under Article 60.

In Ethiopia the English doctrine of "autrefois acquit" has been adopted and is analogous to our "double jeopardy." Acquittal of any concurrent offense will not be the basis of autrefois acquit. Likewise, conviction of any "offenses" is not implied, and autrefois acquit does not apply, in the case of concurrence.

The problems resolved by §706 and §709 of the Proposed Federal Code do not exist in Ethiopia because there is a unitary legal system. Military offenses are also included in the Ethiopian Penal Code.

Ethiopia does not recognize a conviction or acquittal in a foreign country as a bar to a fresh prosecution in Ethiopia for cases in which Ethiopia considers itself to have "principal jurisdiction." Principal jurisdiction includes those crimes committed within Ethiopian territory (Article 10), and certain crimes over which extraterritorial jurisdiction is specifically recognized (see answer to Question #12).

Article 16. Effect of Foreign Sentences

(1) In all cases where an offender who is subject to Ethiopia's principal jurisdiction, (Art. 11, 13, 14 para (1) and 15 para (2)) has been sentenced in a foreign country, he may be tried and sentenced again on the same charge in Ethiopia, if he is found in Ethiopia or was extradited to her.

(2) His discharge or acquittal in a foreign country shall be no bar to a fresh sentence being passed in Ethiopia in accordance with the Ethiopian Code.

(3) Where by reason of the offence committed, the offender has already been convicted in a foreign country and has undergone the whole or part of the punishment, the court shall deduct the punishment already undergone from the new sentence to be passed.

In cases where Ethiopian courts have a "subsidiary jurisdiction" only, the offender cannot be tried and sentenced in Ethiopia if he was "regularly discharged or acquitted for the same act in a foreign country" (Article 20). "Subsidiary jurisdiction" exists:

1. Where a member of the Ethiopian Armed Forces in such capacity commits an offense against the ordinary law in a foreign country, excepting offenses against international law and specifically military offenses contained in the Ethiopian Penal Code (Article 15);

2. Over offenses against international law or treaty and offenses against public health or morals as contained in the Ethiopian Penal Code (Article 17); and

3. Over other offenses committed in a foreign country as specified in Article 18.

Article 18. Other Offences Committed in a Foreign Country

(1) This Code shall also apply to any person who has committed an offense in a foreign country against an Ethiopian national or to any Ethiopian national who has committed in a foreign country an offence of another kind than those specified in the foregoing Articles, if the offender was not tried in the foreign country for the offence, provided that:

(a) the act to be tried is prohibited by the law of the State where it was committed and by Ethiopian law; and

(b) it is of sufficient gravity under the latter law to justify extradition.

(2) In the case of all other offences committed in a foreign country by a foreign national, the offender shall, save as otherwise expressly provided, failing extradition, be prosecuted and tried only if the offence is punishable under Ethiopian law with death or with rigorous imprisonment for not less than ten years.

If the offender was tried and sentenced in a foreign country but did not undergo his punishment, or served only part of it in the foreign country, the punishment, or the remaining part of it, may be enforced in Ethiopia if it is not barred by limitation [Article 20(2)]. Should the punishments differ as to their nature or form, such punishment as is the closest to that imposed in the foreign country is enforced in Ethiopia [Article 12(3)]. When extraterritorial jurisdiction is involved, the punishment to be imposed cannot be more severe than the heaviest penalty prescribed by the law of the country of commission, where such country is recognized by Ethiopia [Article 19(3)].

Ethiopia does not require provisions similar to those of §709 because, at least in cases involving its "principal jurisdiction," it does not recognize the former prosecution as a bar. It will only deduct punishment already served in the case of a prior foreign conviction (Article 16). In addition, as previously stated, there is currently no federal system in Ethiopia.

France

The French Penal Code of 1810 does not enjoy the same fame as the Napoleonic Civil Code of 1804. It consists of short preliminary provisions (Arts. 1–5) and four books.

Punishable offenses are divided into three groups according to penalties: major crimes (crimes), minor crimes (délits), and contraventions (Art. 1). Articles 2 and 3 deal with attempts. Article 4 reaffirms the principle of nulla poenae sine lege penale, and Article 5 is devoted to the computation of penalties for several major and minor crimes and to certain aspects of clemency.

Book I covers punishments in general for major and minor crimes and their effects; Book II, persons criminally responsible, excusable for major and minor crimes; Book III, major and minor crimes and their punishments; and Book IV, contraventions and their punishments.

The Penal Code was greatly modified by several ordinances of December 1958 (Nos. 58–1296 to 58–1300) and by the Ordinance of June 4, 1960. These amendments deal with the range of penalties, major and minor crimes against the State, and riots.

Since 1810 considerable additions have been made so that today the Penal Code actually consists of three parts: the first part is legislative (including Books I–IV mentioned above) the second, regulatory (public administration regulations and decrees issued by the Council of State, as instituted by Decree No. 58–1303 of December 23, 1958), and the third part, covering decrees, instituted by Decree No. 60–896 of August 24, 1960.

The second part consists of 43 articles preceded by the letter R. Articles R1 to R23 deal with penalties pertaining to sojourn, Article R24, with members of the European Community and the security of the allies in France, Articles R24–1 to R24–13 concern the measures directed against violators of morality, Articles R24–14 to R24–31 regulate scientific research on live animals, and Articles R25 to R41 determine certain contraventions and penalties applicable to them.

The third part contains decrees issued by the executive power and consists of only 15 articles preceded by the letter D.

According to P. Bouzat and J. Pinatel, the basic features of the French Penal Code are as follows:[1]

The Penal Code is a code that is:

(A) Severe. The compilers of the Code, in fact, learned from experience and were influenced by the Napoleonic tendency toward harshness (see infra No. 94), endeavored to strengthen the repression which the constitutent assemblies, nourished by philosophical illusions, had weakened by imprudence. Thus, the Code reestablished certain penalties abolished in 1791 (general confiscation, branding iron, mutilation of the hand before execution for parricide), perpetual penalties, and increased cases of the application of capital punishment. However, as a concomitant to the reestablishment of perpetual penalties, it reassured the right to clemency.

(B) Penetrated by the utilitarian spirit. The compilers of the Penal Code, inspired by the ideas of Beccaria (which they misinterpreted), made social utility the dominating idea, voluntarily relegating the idea of justice to second place. This point of view also contributed to the harshness of the penalties prescribed by the Code. It also explains the slight immorality of certain skillfull measures of criminal policy such as the absolving excuse given to those who, having participated in an attempt against State security or the counterfeiting of money, denounced their accomplices (Art. 105 ff., Art. 138).

(C) Having a transitional character concerning the determination of the power of judges. The compilers of the Code adopted a solution midway between the arbitrariness of the old regime and the system of fixed penalties. Refusing to give entire freedom to judges to establish the amount of the penalty, they abolished fixed penalties, leaving the judges a certain power of discretion between minimum and maximum; they increased this power in correctional matters, introducing mitigating circumstances when the prejudice did not exceed 25 Fr. (Art. 363).

(D) Based on abstractions. The Criminal Code, and this is without doubt the most serious objection which can be made, is a purely legal construction dominated by abstract rules and fictions. It considers the criminal an abstract being conceived by reason, but not a real being subject to variable motivations. It considers an offense, not an act of a delinquent manifesting his criminal temperament, but a pure legal abstraction having a proper and unchangeable nature. Consequently, penal responsibility is purely objective, calculated according to the nature of the offense and not to the personality of the delinquent. The Criminal Code considers all delinquents identical and in the face of the same offense punishable by the same penalty.

From the point of view of legislative technique, the Code suffers from the many shortcomings observed by R. Merle and A. Vitu:[2]

The Criminal Code, on the other hand, is an imperfect work. Technically it is inferior to the Civil Code, its senior by 6 years. Its technique is mediocre, because certain provisions of penal law, properly so-called, were unskillfully inserted in the Code of Criminal Investigation (for instance, rules on the application of penal law in space, or the principle of nonaccumulation of penalties, or rules on the period of limitations of penalties). It is divided into four Books according to an illogical plan. . . .

General theories are absent from the Code, such as fault or state of necessity, or barely formulated. Others were written concerning only major or minor crimes and the courts extended them to contraventions (such as concepts of insanity, absolute necessity, Art. 64).

Others are hidden in the special part of the Code, concerning certain groups of contraventions, while they should be included in the general part; for instance, justifying facts (Arts. 327 to 329) and excusable provocation (Arts. 321 to 326) appears only on homicides, assault and battery, while their importance is much greater.

Under the influence of dominant ideas in the 19th century, the Criminal Code underwent several profound reforms. Among these should be mentioned the great Law of April 28, 1832, which modified 162 articles of the Code generally directing the moderation of penalties. The said Law abolished certain penalties, confiscation of property, branding iron, iron collar, the mutilation of hands, and restricted the application of capital punishment, and defined attempt more precisely. The Law of May 31, 1854, abolished civil death and a great number of violations considered minor crimes were qualified as contraventions (the so-called correctionalization) by the Law of May 13, 1863.

The other measures taken from 1875 to 1914 were directed toward the individualization of penalties for the different categories of delinquents, such as the Law of May 27, 1885, which instituted exile (relégation) for professional and habitual delinquents, the Law of March 26, 1891, called the Law of Berenger, which permitted the application of suspended sentences for first offenders, and more severe penalties for recidivists, and the Law of July 22, 1912, which instituted probation for juvenile delinquents.

The third period is characterized by a return to harsh penalties for offenses against: a) economic interests (more energetic repression of commercial and fiscal fraud), b) family and social interests (abandonment of the family, Law of February 7, 1924; abortion, Law of March 27, 1923; bigamy, Law of February 17, 1933; infanticide, Law of September 2, 1941), c) State security (Decree-Law of July 29, 1939).

Despite the humanitarian tendencies to soften the penalties which dominated the French government after the liberation, in the opinion of Bouzat and Pinatel, the following factor contributed to the return to severe punishment:[3]

Unfortunately, the long persistence of the black market, a general increase in delinquency, and especially armed aggression, contributed, on the contrary, to severity. (a) It is characteristic that the regime of economic violations instituted by the ordinances of June 30, 1945, enacted during the period of the black market, took a definitive place in our penal law. (b) It is characteristic, while one part of public opinion asked for the abolition of capital punishment, legislation, under pressure from the other side of public opinion, established new cases for the application of capital punishment. For instance, the Law of November 23, 1950, punished armed robbery with capital punishment; the Law of April 13, 1945, prescribed capital punishment for habitual mistreatment of a child, even without the intention to kill. (c) The anxiety for national defense and the defense of the regime entailed the rigorous repression of offenses against State security. (d) The development of a greater sense of solidarity led the legislator to make the omission to give assistance a crime.

QUESTION 2

The articles of the Criminal Code are numbered in sequence. The original numbering remains unchanged although some articles have been abolished.

QUESTION 3

Marc Ancel in his introduction to the translation of the French Penal Code[1] observed that the Penal Code:

> . . . is based exactly upon the essential premises of classical law, legality, mens rea and retributive punishment. . . . It states abstract rules defining crimes objectively viewed, but is only concerned with crime as defined by penal law; the criminal as viewed by both the Napoleonic and the revolutionary legislator, is an abstract being, always equal to himself and identical in every criminal event. The idea of individualization is profoundly alien to the Penal Code as presented in its text of 1810. This idea was introduced into French penal law only through an evolution precipitated by the revision of 1832, and followed by enactment of several special laws which were not incorporated in the Penal Code.

The classical doctrine ignored criminal intent, attaching basic importance to violations and their external elements. Exegetic methods of interpretation were also unfavorable to the theory of intent.[2]

That attitude changed when the legislator, under the influence of the new approach to the delinquent, leaned more and more toward the individualization of penalties. Thus, the elements of criminal intent and motivation, in French theory and practice, acquired greater importance.[3]

The honorary first President of the Court of Appeals of Angers, Pierre Mimin, observed the following:[4]

> French law does not furnish any general idea of intention. It is the same, more or less, for all the concepts reported in this study. There are no texts providing information on motivation in criminal law, error of law, error of fact, or on the relationship between result and qualification. The necessity for a separate will from intent does not appear.

He concluded that efforts to provide an adequate definition of criminal intent had been unsuccessful.

According to P. Bouzat the best definition of criminal intent was provided by Garçon:[5] "Criminal intent, i.e., the knowledge of the delinquent that he has performed an illegal act."

It is generally admitted that there are intentional and unintentional offenses. Almost all major crimes are intentional offenses. Article 75 of the Penal Code is an exception.

Minor correctional crimes consist in part of intentional offenses (mainly those established in the Penal Code) and of unintentional offenses, mainly established by special laws. Before the reform of 1958, almost all police contraventions were unintentional offenses. However, by the Decree of December 23, 1958, the fifth class of contraventions which before had been considered minor crimes was established.

In French practice a distinction is made between criminal intent and fault. According to G. Stevani and G. Levasseur:[6]

When the perpetrator wanted the act and its consequences and performed an act to produce them, it is said that he had criminal intent or penal dolus (murder, assassination, robbery). When the perpetrator wanted an act but not its consequences, which he should have foreseen or could have avoided, then it was a criminal fault (homicide by injury, imprudence, or contravention).

The terms "intention" or dolus and "fault" are seldom used in the Penal Code or in later legislation. For the designation of criminal intent the terms: deliberately, fraudulently, knowingly, with purpose, or even willfully are used. And, for the description of a criminal fault, several expressions are used: lack of skill, imprudence, inattention, negligence or nonobservance of the rules (concerning homicide and involuntary injuries, Art. 319, 320, R.40-4, Penal Code), lack of precaution, or lack of repair or maintenance (Art. R.34-3, 4, Penal Code).

Criminal intent is not always of the same degree. Classical penal law makes a distinction between general and special, simple and aggravated, determined and undetermined, direct and indirect. General intent consists in the will to accomplish an act prohibited by law. Sometimes the law subordinates the offense to a specific will (Art. 379, "whoever fraudulently takes away" or Art. 417, "whoever prejudices French industry"), when it is special intent. Simple as opposed to aggravated intent is connected with premeditation. According to Article 297: "Premeditation consists of a decision arrived at beforehand to make a homicidal attack on a certain person or anyone encountered, regardless of any of the circumstances or conditions on which the act may depend."

In spite of the different terminology used to designate fault, according to A. Vitu and R. Merle:[7]

Penal fault consists either in not foreseeing the injurious consequences of the accomplished act, or in not believing that they will occur, or in not taking the necessary measures to prevent them. The result is not imputable to the will of the perpetrator, but rather to the fault of the intelligence or inertia of the will.

Criminal fault is different from contraventional fault which is not a result of imprudence or negligence, but simply consists of the violation of regulations. Therefore, a very important difference follows from the point of view of evidence. Criminal fault must be proven by the prosecution, whereas no such evidence is necessary on the part of the prosecution in contraventional fault. It is also of great importance for the reparation of damage.

As pointed out by G. Stefani and G. Levasseur, "The French Penal Code is loyal to the classical concept, considering only intent, and not taking motivation into account at all." [8]

If motivation has no effect on the punishment in theory, in practice it is different. In order to avoid the harshness of the law, the courts take mitigating circumstances into account (Art. 463, Penal Code).

QUESTION 4

In cases of intentional offenses, the penalty is not subject to the results of the offense. In certain cases, even the attempt is punishable. The situation is quite different in unintentional offenses. Even the most serious fault is not sufficient to entail a sanction; it is necessary that causation exists between the fault and the results. As an illustration, the provisions of Article 309 of the Penal Code could be mentioned.

For a long time the courts considered that the causality had to be direct and immediate; actually such a correlation is no longer required.[1]

According to R. Merle and A. Vitu [2] actually the ritual formula in all decisions is as follows:

> . . . considering that the provisions of Articles 319 and 320 punish any person who involuntarily was the cause of a homicide or wounds, it is not required that this cause be direct and immediate.

The authors concluded that it is possible to connect most of the decisions either to the theory of adequate causality, or to the approximative equivalence of the conditions and that the Supreme Court is leaning more toward the thesis of the equivalence of conditions.[3]

QUESTION 5

Article 64 of the Penal Code reads as follows "If the person charged with the commission of a major crime was insane at the time of commission or acted out of absolute necessity, there shall be no major or minor crime."

According to Stafani and G. Levasseur: [4]

In penal law the term démence (insanity) designates all forms of mental alienation. It applies to congenital (cretin, idiot, imbecile) afflictions of the intelligence as well as those acquired as a result of illness (general paralysis, early insanity).

The determination of insanity is a question of fact. When there is any doubt about mental capacity, a medical examination by psychiatrists may be requested by the prosecution or by the parties concerned. The experts are chosen from a national list established by the office of the Court of Cassation or from a list prepared by the courts of appeal after consultation with the General Procurator (Art. 157 of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

In order to apply the clause of insanity, it must be established that the condition existed at the time of the commission of the offense and that it was total. If insanity is established during the preliminary investigation, the investigating judge must issue an ordinance that there is no ground for prosecution. In the court of assizes, the question of insanity is included in the general questionnaire of guilt. If the defendent is acquitted, the court must release him. Only the prefect or members of the family may ask to have the person concerned put in a mental institution.

Insanity is the subjective cause of nonresponsibility which affects only the insane person, but not others who collaborated in the commission of the offense, i.e., joint perpetrators, accomplices. If the accused is acquitted by reason of insanity, the court may charge all or part of the costs to him (Art. 474 C.C.P.).

QUESTION 6

Intoxication may result from the drinking of alcoholic beverages or from the use of narcotics (morphine, cocaine, etc.).

In case of alcoholic intoxication, several situations may occur. If the intoxicated person is in a state of delirium tremens then there is veritable insanity in the meaning of Article 64 of the Penal Code. Except for this extreme case, this type of intoxication does not constitute a cause of irresponsibility. On the contrary, according to the provisions of Article L.1 of the Traffic Code (Code de la route), the fact of intoxication constitutes an aggravating circumstance in a case of homicide or involuntary injury and the penalties are doubled.[1]

Also, according to the provisions of Article 65 of the Beverage Code (Code des mesures concernant les débits des boissons et la lutte contre alcoholisme, Journal officiel, Febr. 10, 1955, p. 1575) anyone who is found in the streets, roads, plazas, cafés, cabarets, or other public places in an evident state of intoxication shall be punished with a fine of from 200 Fr. to 1200 Fr. In case of relapse, the penalty may be doubled and connected with the deprivation of certain rights: the right to vote, to be elected, to be appointed to public duties, to carry arms (Art. 66).

Dangerous alcoholics may be placed under the surveillance of a public health authority (Art. L335-1) under the conditions established in Article L.35-2 of the Code of Public Health.[2]

Similar problems arise concerning drug addicts. Addicts accused of any of the minor crimes specified in Articles L.627 and L.628 of the Code of Public Health may be compelled by an order of the examining magistrate, upon the advice of a special commission, to undergo treatment to correct the addiction. Failure to comply with this order may be punished by imprisonment for from 6 days to 2 months and a fine of from 360 Fr. to 10,000 Fr.

Decisions taken for the cure of addicts are not entered in the judicial register.[3]

QUESTION 7

The French Penal Code considers self-defense a right and therefore the use of force is justified. The pertinent articles read as follows:

Art. 328.—When homicide, wounding, or striking was compelled by the immediate and actual necessity to defend oneself or another no major or minor crime has been committed.

Art. 329.—Circumstances of immediate and actual necessity include the following:

1. Homicide, wounding or striking, committed at night, in repelling a person who is scaling or breaking down fences, walls or entrances of inhabited dwelling houses or apartments, or of their enclosed yards.

2. Acts committed in defending oneself or another against violent burglars or pillagers.

The Penal Code did not establish the conditions for their application. The opinions of authors vary on the subject.

Articles 328 and 329 of the Penal Code make a distinction between so-called self-defense, properly speaking, and "privileged" cases, when the ordinary conditions for their application are not required.

The Code put self-defense and the defense of others on the same level.

If Article 328 is interpreted literally, self-defense is justified only in cases of homicide, wounding or striking. However, it is generally admitted that it is also justified in less serious cases.

Self-defense may be used only under certain conditions. At first an actual attack and the immediate necessity to defend oneself was necessary. The attack could be directed against personal integrity or, under certain conditions, also against property. The attack had to be unjust. On the other hand, the defense must be proportional to the attack.

[3] G. Stefani and G. Levasseur, Droit pénal général et criminologie, Paris, Dalloz, 1957, p. 533. See English translation in attached Appendix.

Thus the basic elements of self-defense are established in Article 328 of the Penal Code. The question arises as to the meaning of the provision of Article 329. P. Bouzat provides the following explanation : [1]

It was suddenly admitted that Article 329 has established the presumptions of self-defense for the following reason:

As a general rule, anyone who practices self-defense must prove before the investigating jurisdiction or, if he does not convince them, before the trial jurisdictions, that the conditions of self-defense have been met. Thus, he must establish that the defense was a reply to unjust aggression, that it was absolutely necessary, and that it was in proportion to the aggression. When there is a presumption of self-defense, the person who benefits from it no longer has to establish the conditions of self-defense; it is sufficient for him to prove that he acted under one of the conditions specified in Article 329, which is obviously much easier.

This point being accepted, the question arises whether the presumptions of self-defense must be considered simple presumptions, subject to contrary evidence, or as absolute presumptions, irrefutable.

Bouzat concluded that the Criminal Chamber of the Court of Cassation, in its decision of February 19, 1959, declared that these presumptions are simple presumptions.

Among other justifications for the use of force, or other illegal interference, French scholars and courts admit necessity. The Criminal Code does not have any general provisions on the state of necessity but does contain some particular provisions regarding it. For instance, Article R. 40-9 states that persons who kill domestic animals without need shall be punished, and Article R. 38-11 enumerates punishment for persons who obstruct public roads without need, or Article 87 of the Decree-Law of July 29, 1939, authorizes a therapeutic abortion if necessary to save the life of a pregnant woman.

Bouzat gives the following definition of the state of necessity : [2]

It is the state of a person who, to preserve his freedom of decision, has no other means of escaping the danger which threatens him or another, than to commit an offense which may affect an innocent third party.

A distinction must be made between necessity and constraint. While constraint annihilates the will, an act of necessity allows it to subsist, only obliging [the person] to make a choice.

It must also be distinguished from self-defense. In the case of self-defense, harm is inflicted on a guilty aggressor, while in the case of necessity, it touches a completely innocent person.

In certain cases, necessity is justified by the courts by moral coercion, in others, by the lack of criminal intent.

As well as self-defense, necessity is subject to certain conditions. First it is necessary that the person who commits the offense be in actual and immediate danger. Then the gravity of the offense and the danger to be avoided must be proportional: the sacrificed interest must be inferior to the preserved interest.

There are no provisions as to the extent that force may be used by parents or those who take care of children.

Article 357-I of the Penal Code provides punishment only for the abuse of parental authority :

> [the following] shall be punished for from 3 months to one year and a fine of from 300 Fr. to 6,000 Fr.: . . .
> 3. a father and mother, regardless of whether the loss of their parental rights has been decreed, endanger the health, safety or morals of one or several of their children by illtreatment, pernicious examples of habitual drunkenness or overt misconduct, a lack of care of necessary control.

QUESTION 8

The French Penal Code relies on a threefold division of offenses, as established in Article 1 :

Art. 1.—An offense which the law punishes by regulatory punishments shall be a contravention.

An offense which the law punishes by correctional punishments shall be a minor crime.

---

[1] P. Bouzat and J. Pinatel. Traité de droit pénal et de criminologie. v. 1. Paris, Dalloz, 1970. p. 97.

An offense which the law punishes by deprivations or infamous punishments shall be a major crime.

QUESTION 9

Provisions on parole suspension and probation and imprisonment for payment are included in Articles 729-749 of the French Code of Criminal Procedure. See the Xerox copy attached as Appendix A.

Several of the procedural questions referred to in Question 9 are explained by G. L. Kock in the introduction to his translation of The French Code of Criminal Procedure which went into force on March 2, 1959, and by R. Vouin in his article "French Criminal Procedure" in The Accused. A Comparative Study, edited by J. A. Coutts. London, Stevens and Sons, 1966, a Xerox copy of which is attached as Appendix B.

QUESTION 10

The rule Nemo jus ignorare censetur applies with particular vigor to penal law. A mistake in penal law has no influence on criminal responsibility. The only exception to this rule was established by the Decree-Law of November 5, 1870, Concerning the Promulgation of Laws: "the administrative military authorities and the courts may, according to the circumstances, accept the exception of a mistake alleged by the delinquents, provided that the contravention was committed within 3 days after the promulgation." [1]

In general the courts apply this rule strictly. It is true that in some recent decisions the courts admitted that excuse.[2]

A mistake of fact may exclude, under certain conditions, criminal responsibility. In this respect a distinction is made between intentional and unintentional offenses.

In case of unintentional offenses the error of fact has no influence. However, as G. Stefani and G. Levasseur have observed: [3]

> . . . our jurisprudence [i.e., case law] imitating Belgian jurisprudence, which admits the exclusion of criminal responsibility even in unintentional offenses in cases of an unsurmountable mistake, shows a tendency to acquit because of the mistake of fact when it was unforeseeable and inevitable, the same constituting a real force majeur or when a reasonable person would commit [a similar act] under the same circumstances.

The situation is different in cases of intentional offenses. A mistake of fact excludes intentional offenses because an intentional offense presupposes bad faith and a mistake of fact implies good faith. Several situations may arise. Sometimes the mistake of fact makes the offense disappear: a man was killed instead of a wild animal. In such a case, the perpetrator cannot be convicted of murder, because he had no criminal intention. Sometimes, the mistake of fact transforms an intentional offense into an offense of imprudence. A person who killed another person instead of an animal may be prosecuted for homicide by imprudence. Sometimes it may serve as a mitigating circumstance (for instance when a seller of alcoholic beverages made a mistake as to age of the purchaser). However, there are certain cases when the mistake of fact does not change the character of the offense: when the perpetrator does not care who the victims are or when an individual who wanted to kill X, killed Y who was erroneously taken to be X (a mistake as to the person), or an individual wanted to kill X, but because of bad aim, killed Y (aberratio ictus). In both cases the perpetrator is prosecuted for willful homicide.[4]

QUESTION 11

The problem specified in Question 11 does not arise in France.

QUESTION 13

The French Penal Code uses different terms, "complot," "association," or "entente," to designate conspiracy.

According to the provisions of Article 87, paragraph, "A conspiracy (complot) shall exist as soon as the resolution to act is contrived and decided in concert between two or several persons."

Four elements are necessary for the presence of conspiracy: (a) the resolution to act, (b) the resolution must be contrived in concert between several persons, (c) the resolution must be decided, and (d) the purpose of the resolution must be to commit the crimes specified in Article 86.[1]

The resolution to act must be precise. Conspiracy exists only if the resolution was made by several persons united to attain the same purpose. It is not enough that the resolution was contemplated, it is necessary that all participants agreed on the purpose of the conspiracy and the means to be applied. And finally, the purpose of the attack should be one of those defined in Articles 86 and 93.

Conspiracy, as specified in the above-mentioned Articles, is different from that defined in Article 265, which reads as follows:

Every combination (association) formed, regardless of its duration or the number of its members, and every agreement (entente) for the purpose of planning or committing major crimes against persons or property, shall be a major crime against the public peace.

The terms used in Article 265, "combination formed" or "agreement reached," are very broad and leave the courts great discretion in evaluating the circumstances. The purpose of the combination or agreement must be to commit major crimes against persons or property. And finally the criminal intent must be established.

Article 267 of the Penal Code also punishes persons who knowingly and willfully favor a combination or agreement by furnishing their members with tools for the commission of major crimes, as well as means of communication or lodging and meeting places.

Closely connected with the problems discussed here are the provisions of Article 123 concerning combined unlawful activities of public employees acting in concert, and Articles 109 and 110 dealing with major and minor crimes against the Constitution, committed by prearrangement (plan concerté).

QUESTION 14

The transfer of felonious intent is rejected by the French Penal Code.

QUESTION 15

France is a unitarian State and therefore the problems raised in Question 15 do not arise in France.

QUESTION 16

In 1960, the Penal Code was amended and several detailed provisions concerning major and minor crimes against State security were introduced. Provisions similar to Section 1104 are included in Article 86 which reads as follows:

A criminal attempt with the aim of either destroying or changing the constitutional regime, or incitement of the citizens or inhabitants to arm themselves against State authority or to arm one part of them against the other or against national territorial integrity, shall be punished by hard labor for life.

QUESTION 17

Criminal provisions on drugs are included in the Code of Public Health. See the attached Appendix for the translation of the pertinent provisions.

Provisions concerning gambling are included in Article 410 of the Penal Code. In addition, the provisions of the special laws pertaining to gambling should be mentioned. See the Code pénal, Dalloz, 1971–2, p. 225–230.

Offenses against morals by press and print are defined by Articles 283-290.

Provisions dealing with prostitution are included in Articles 334 to 335-6.

---

[1] Répertoire, op. cit., "Complot," p. 612.

QUESTION 18

There are several laws dealing with firearms and explosives. Among them, the Decree-Law of April 18, 1939, regulatory provisions of August 14, 1939, pertaining to the Decree-Law of 1939, Ordinance No. 62-1021 of August 29, 1962, Law No. 63-760 of July 30, 1963, and Law No. 70-575 of July 3, 1970, should be mentioned.

For the texts, see the Code pénal, 171–2. p. 294–310.

There is no special provision in the Code pertaining to the offense of the supplying of arms. However, there are provisions on the supplying of arms attached to particular crimes, for instance, Article 95 pertaining to crimes against the security of the State.

QUESTION 19

The Penal Code provides capital punishment in several situations especially for crimes committed against State security and for crimes committed against persons: murder, assassination, parricide, and poisoning.

According to the provisions of Article 698 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, major and minor crimes against the security of the State in a time of peace are to be referred to the Court for State Security. Rules of procedure of the Court for State Security are established by Law No. 63-23 of January 15, 1963, which differs basically from the rules on common law offenses.

QUESTION 20

The main problem which arises concerning multiple related offences is the application of penalties. To this effect the following rules are established by Article 5 of the Penal Code:

In case of conviction for several major and minor crimes, only the severest of all applicable punishments shall be imposed.

Thus, in cases when the offense constitutes a contravention, the cumulation of penalties is admitted.

The cumulation of offenses may be real or ideal. There is real cumulation when different offenses were committed, and ideal when the same material fact is susceptible to different qualifications. When the prosecution of different offenses is covered by the same indictment, then the problem of punishment does not raise many difficulties. The severest punishment shall be imposed for all offenses according to the rules established in Articles 7-9. In the case of the penalties of the same degree there must be taken into account the duration. When there are several actions of prosecution, then several situations may arise: the second offense may be punished more severely than the first one, or less severely than the first one. Detailed rules were elaborated by the court decisions.*

Other problems raised in question 20 pertain to federal states.

French criminal jurisdiction is based on the principle of territoriality as defined in Article 3, paragraph 1 of the French Civil Code:

The laws of police and public security shall be binding upon all those who live on the territory.

According to Article 72 of the French Constitution, the territory of the French Republic consists of the metropolitan territory and the overseas departments and territories. For the application of the penal laws, the territorial sea, French ships and airplanes are considered a part of French territory.

If the offense is committed on French territory, or when one of the constituent elements of it has been accomplished on French territory, the offense in all its aspects is French.

The territorial principle is not absolute. Title X of the French Code of Criminal Procedure covers offenses committed abroad by both French citizens and foreigners.[1]

---

[1] Dalloz, Répertoire droit et de procédure pénale, vol. 1. Paris, Jurisprudence Générale Dalloz, 1967, p. 597–98.

The French Code makes a distinction between major crimes (crimes), minor crimes (délits), and contraventions (contraventions).

I. Offenses Committed by French Citizens Abroad

A French citizen who commits abroad an act qualified as a major crime may be prosecuted and tried by French courts (Art. 689), provided that he is a French citizen at the time of the prosecution (it is of no importance what nationality he had at the time when he committed the major crime), that he was not tried abroad, and in case of conviction and sentencing did not serve the sentence or obtain clemency, or that the penalty has not been extinguished by the statute of limitations (Art. 692).

However, if the act committed abroad by a French citizen is qualified by French law as a minor crime then the prerequisites for the French courts to assume jurisdiction are stricter.

At first, the minor crime must be punishable not only under French law, but also under the law of the country where it was committed (Art. 689, par. 2). French court practice concerning this requirement was summarized in the French legal encyclopedia as follows:[2]

Under penalty of cassation, the trial judge must ascertain in his sentence that all elements of foreign law necessary for the accusation are established again (Crim. Jul. 2, 1927. S. 1929. 1. 360).

However it is of no matter that the foreign qualification of the crime is different from the French qualification; it does not much matter that the penalty is not the same as that prescribed in France (see, for instance, Trib. corr. Colmar, May 11, 1950. Gaz. Pal. 1950, ibid. 1950.2.189, Rev. science crim. 1950.592 Caron. L. Hugeney).

The Court of Cassation does not review the interpretation of foreign law given by the trial judge (Carrive, Rev. science crim. 1937, 309). This judge is not duty bound to quote the text of the foreign law, and the Supreme Court refers to his statements (Crim. Dec. 17, 1887, D. 88.1.330).

It must be taken into consideration that the act must be punishable by the law of the country where it was committed not only at the time when it occurred but also at the time when the complaint was lodged (Aix, Sep. 30, 1959, Gaz. Pal. 1959.2.291); that there is no incrimination according to the foreign law when the act, also incriminating according to this [French] law, is covered by the law of amnesty of the foreign country (Crim. Dec. 31, 1936, Gaz. Pal. 1937.1.420; Trib. corr. Toulon, May 17, 1963, Gaz. Pal. 1963.2.387) . . . that, in general, the statute of limitations of public action against offenses committed abroad is regulated by French law (Trib. corr. Montbéliard, July 3, 1964. D. 1965.69. Public Prosecutor Petit's charge).

Thus, in case of a minor crime, it is necessary to refer to the foreign law unless it concerns offenses against the security of the State or counterfeiting its seal or current national monies. These minor crimes, even if committed outside of the territory of the Republic, are punishable as minor crimes committed on French territory.

If the minor crime was committed against a private person, the complaint of such person, or the official denunciation by the authority of the country where the crime was committed, must precede the prosecution undertaken by the public prosecutor.

Certain minor crimes and contraventions committed in neighboring States, as defined in Article 695 of the Criminal Code, are subject to the rule of reciprocity.

II. Offenses Committed Abroad by Foreigners

As a general rule, and subject to the provisions of Articles 690 and 693, offenses committed by foreigners in a foreign country are not punishable in France. An exception is made for the major and minor crimes specified in Article 694, which appears in the Appendix.

According to Professors G. Stefani and C. Levasseur,[3] the exceptions specified in Article 121-6 of the Code of Civil Aviation of March 30, 1967, which in part read as follows, must be added to the exceptions specified in Article 619:[4]

The legal relations between persons who are on board a foreign airplane engaged in traffic shall be regulated by the law of the flag of that airplane in all cases where the territorial law is normally applied.

However, in case a major crime or minor crime is committed on board the foreign airplane, the French courts shall be competent provided that the perpetrator or the victim is a French national or the airplane landed in France after the major or minor crime was committed.

APPENDIX: CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE*

Title X

Major and Minor Crimes Committed Abroad

Article 689.—Any French citizen who outside the territory of the Republic renders himself guilty of an act qualified as a major crime punished by French law may be prosecuted and tried by French courts.

Any French citizen who outside the territory of the Republic renders himself guilty of an act qualified as a minor crime by French law may be prosecuted and tried by French courts if the act is punished by the legislation of the country where it was committed. With reference to minor crimes against the security of the State or counterfeiting the seal of the State or of current national monies, a minor crime committed outside the territory of the Republic shall be punishable as a minor crime committed within the territory.

The provisions of paragraphs 1 and 2 are applicable to the perpetrator of an act who has become a French citizen only after the act that is imputed to him. [2-13-60]

Article 690.—Whoever on the territory of the Republic becomes an accomplice to a major crime or a minor crime committed abroad may be prosecuted and tried by the French courts if the act is punished by both the foreign law and by the French law, on condition that the act qualified as a major or minor crime was established by a final decision of the foreign jurisdiction.

Article 691.—In case of a major crime committed against an individual the prosecution may be undertaken only at the request of public prosecution; it must be begun by a complaint by the offended party or by an official denunciation to French authorities by the authorities of the country where the act was committed.

Article 692.—In the case envisaged in the preceding articles, when a major or minor crime is concerned no prosecution shall take place if the accused proves that he was definitely tried abroad and, in case of conviction, that the punishment has been served or has been extinguished by the statute of limitations or that he has obtained clemency.

Article 693.—Every offense of which an act constituting one of the constituent elements has been accomplished in France is deemed to be committed within the territory of the Republic.

Article 694.—Every foreigner who outside the territory of the Republic renders himself guilty, either as perpetrator or as accomplice, of a major or minor crime against the security of the State or the counterfeiting of the seal of the State or current national monies may be prosecuted and tried according to the provisions of French law if he is arrested in France or if the Government obtains his extradition.

Article 695.—Every Frenchman who renders himself guilty of minor crimes and contraventions in forest, rural, fishing, customs, or indirect tax matters on the territory of an adjacent state may be prosecuted and tried in France according to French law if that state authorizes the prosecution of its nationals for the same acts committed in France.

The reciprocity shall be legally established by international conventions or by decree.

Article 696.—In the cases provided in the present title the prosecution shall be undertaken at the request of public prosecution of the place where the accused resides or of his last known residence or of the place where he is found.

FRENCH CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

(R. Vouin)

It has become a commonplace of discussions relating to criminal procedure to contrast, on the one hand, the public interest, which requires prompt and efficient suppression of criminal activities, with, on the other, the interest of the individual, whose liberty must be protected against the abuses of power. However, the matter must be looked at more closely.

It is certain, in fact, that individual liberty is always threatened by disorders and by anarchy itself, which an excessive slackening of repressive action encourages. It is equally certain, on the other hand, that a legal system which does not assure the protection of individual liberty is always in jeopardy, is precarious and does not serve the public interest.

A system of criminal procedure, in order to be satisfactory, must be seen to be at once adequate, efficient and liberal.

It is equally true that this ideal balance appears difficult to achieve, and that the criminal institutions of a country like France have fluctuated, in the course of its history, under the influence of a liberal tendency and of an authoritarian tendency, each dominating in turn.

Between the two world wars, the consummation, the "Swan Song," of a liberal era in France was, in so far as criminal procedure is concerned, a law of February 7, 1933, dealing with the protection of individual liberty. But the next year, 1934, was marked by the troubles of February 6, at home, and in international relations, by the events which confirmed the seizure of power in Germany by Hitler and revealed the imminence of a new war. Further, the first law of reactionary tendency, the law of March 25, 1935, inaugurated a period of authoritarian criminal legislation by abandoning a large part of the reforms resulting from the law of February 7, 1933.

Nearer our time, the last year of the Fourth Republic has seen the French Parliament discuss and vote in conditions which do great honour to it, a law of December 31, 1957, laying down the first 230 articles (preliminary title and first book) of a Code of Criminal Procedure, aimed at replacing the old Code of Criminal "Instruction" of 1808. But this new Code was only completed, with a total of 801 articles, and put into force, on March 2, 1959 by an order of December 23, 1958, which was made following, and with the favour of, a change of régime.

The authors of this Code of 1958 sought to reconcile the requirements of suppression and the protection of individual liberty. In particular, they drew up proposals clearly protective of the rights of the accused at the same time as they reinforced the authority of the public prosecutor entrusted with enforcing, by judicial process, the criminal law, and assured the independence of the two investigating jurisdictions (the investigating magistrate and, on appeal, the chambre d'accusation of the Court of Appeal).

But this Code has had the misfortune of coming into force at a particularly critical period in our national life.[1] The military and political events which accompanied Algeria's accession to independence soon brought about a reinforcement of penal suppression in the form of the orders of February 13 and June 4, 1960, altering the Code of Criminal Procedure or derogating therefrom: then the setting up, on May 3, 1961, of a special Military Tribunal and on April 27, 1961, of a High Military Tribunal, suppressed on May 26, 1962, and replaced, on June 1, 1962, by a Military Court of Justice, the legality of which the Conseil d'Etat challenged, by its order of October 19, 1962; and finally the promulgation of an order of September 1, 1962, with particularly formidable provisions.[2]

[1] See R. Vouin, "L'Application du Code de procédure pénale et le malheur des temps" [The Enforcement of the Code of Criminal Procedure and the Misfortunes of our Times], Revue de Science Criminelle, 1962, p. 65.

[2] Cf. A. Vitu, "un text inquiétant . . ." [a disquieting text], Revue de Science Criminelle 1963, p. 9.

French life has meanwhile becomer calmer. Two laws of January 15, 1963, have put an end to the enforcement of the order of September 1, 1962, and suppressed the exceptional juridictions of 1961-62, by setting up, on a permanent footing, a Court of State Security whose organisation and procedure have been specially studied in order to give satisfaction to the different interests to be taken into account.[3]

Since then, a revision of our 1958 Code has been prepared in the same spirit of conciliation and wisdom, by a Committee for Criminal Legislation set up alongside the Keeper of the Seals, Minister of Justice, the intention of which is shortly to place an important Bill before the French Parliament (the rules concerning criminal procedure only being capable of being fixed by law, according to Article 34 of the Constitution of October 4, 1958).

If one considers the matter, the question of safeguarding the public interest and the interests of the accused, in a given system of criminal procedure can only be studied in a complete account of the system of procedure. French criminal procedure is especially difficult to explain when one is mainly addressing lawyers of countries whose system of criminal justice does not possess either a public prosecutor or a preliminary investigation.

It is therefore necessary to make a choice and to stick to clearly defined points which are particularly likely to interest the foreign observer who wants to study French institutions.

The account which follows will therefore be limited to pointing out—distinguishing between the three successive phases of criminal procedure—some questions where the public interest appears to be in conflict with private interests, considered essentially from the point of view of the rights of the accused in accordance with the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1958 and the two laws of January 15, 1963, dealing with the Court of State Security.

Before Trial, French criminal procedure has, according to the case, on the one hand a preliminary investigation or committal proceedings, and on the other, police inquiries of various sorts.

The preliminary investigation implies the setting in motion of the legal process, that is, the opening of the process of suppression by the Public Prosecutor or the victim of the infraction of the law. It is otherwise in the case of the hearing of witnesses (before trial).

The preliminary investigation, as a rule, is compulsory in the more important criminal matters, optional in the case of misdemeanours and may equally take place in the case of petty offences, but only at the instance of the Public Prosecutor.[4]

However, there are two cases in which the preliminary investigation is always compulsory before trial, because in France it is considered a guarantee of justice and a protection of the rights of the accused.

It is compulsory, in the first place, in the case of minors of less than eighteen years of age, who are triable in juvenile courts. It has, then, the dual purpose of allowing an attentive study of the person of the minor, who only undergoes a punishment, properly speaking, if his personality and circumstances require it (medical—psychological and social examinations) and to inform the judge who, on occasions, may make an order himself, without sending the matter before the juvenile court, of which he is president.[5]

But the preliminary investigation is also compulsory in the case of persons who are to be judged by the Court of State Security. No one can be summoned to appear before this political jurisdiction (composed of three civil judges, of whom one is the president, and of two military judges) without an order of committal for trial left to the responsibility of the Government, but this order can only be made if the investigating magistrate has previously, by a legal decision, recognised as regards the person charged that the charges of crime or misdemeanour amount to that class of offences which are among those that are within the jurisdiction of the Court of State Security.[6]

On this question it has been considered that committal for trial before a political jurisdiction should remain an act of government but that the individual citizen should have the guarantee that he will never be prosecuted before this jurisdiction in the absence of a judicial decision previously recognising the existence of sufficient charges. One can think what one likes of the investigation, but the fact of its existence deserves to be remarked on.

In so far as the legal system of preliminary investigation is concerned, there can be no question of analysing here the provisions of Articles 79 to 230 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. But there is one point on which one must dwell.

It has been said [7] that the protection of the suspected person is well assured in France from the moment when the person appears before the investigating magistrate as a person who has been charged.[8] Therefore, the whole question is to know at what moment this "charging" occurs which guarantees that the charged person shall be interrogated by a judge without taking the oath and with the assistance of his lawyer.

In this respect Article 105 of the Code of 1958 prohibits the investigating magistrate (and the judges or judicial police officers delegated by him) from hampering the rights of the accused by hearing as a witness (on oath and without a lawyer) any person against whom there exists "weighty and uncontradicted evidence of guilt." Since it was first drawn up, under the law of December 31, 1957, the text of Article 105 was modified in 1960, at the request of the police, who greatly complained of this provision. But the decisions of which this is the fruit still have great force, and, without expecting Article 105 to be redrafted in its original form (as is requested by the Committee for Criminal Legislation), it is certain that proceedings at a preliminary investigation must be quashed in France, if as a result of the charge being made late the rights of the accused have been infringed.[9]

The question of the invalidity of a preliminary investigation in general is of great legal and practical importance in France from three points of view, namely, grounds, procedure and effects of quashing. The person charged obviously has an interest in being able to adduce at any moment in the case, numerous and extensive grounds for quashing. But the interest of the good administration of justice may perhaps require, on the contrary, that the opportunities for quashing the investigation be limited, both in number and effects, and should not be invoked after a certain point in the trial.

In the face of these divergent requirements, the 1958 Code first of all makes a distinction. On the one hand, every infringement of the legal provisions relating to the first appearance, examination and identification of the person charged (that is to say of the rules formerly enacted in the law December 8, 1897) is penalised by the invalidity of the irregular act and of all subsequent proceedings.[10] On the other hand, there is equally ground for quashing in the case of an infringement of rules recognised as "substantial" by decisions and, "in particular in the case of infringement of the rights of the accused;" but then, it is for the Bench to decide if the quashing is limited to the irregular act or must be extended to all or part of the subsequent proceedings.[11] Further, the Code has reserved to the examining magistrate and to the Public Prosecutor the right to ask the trial court during the preliminary investigation for the formal quashing of the void acts, which will then be struck from the record.[12] But once the preliminary investigation has ended and trial procedure has begun, it authorised the courts of summary jurisdiction of police courts [13] to declare the invalidity of irregular acts in the investigation and of all or part of the subsequent proceedings.[14]

As the 1958 Code stood originally, the person charged could not ask for irregular acts in the preliminary investigation to be quashed during the course of that investigation. But he could ask for this at the trial before courts of summary jurisdiction or police courts, on condition that this was done before making a defence on the merits.[15] Now this last possibility has itself been taken away in principle from the person charged by the order of June 4, 1960, already mentioned, when the courts of summary jurisdiction or police courts have before them an order transferring the case to the trial court.[16] This solution is now being studied by the Committee for Criminal Legislation, and is much criticised by professional lawyers, who take exception to it as sacrificing the interests of the accused to the fear of dilatory procedure. But many judges, on the contrary, consider it necessary for the protection of the public interest, as they conceive it. . . .

In any case, it is well established that a violation of the rights of the accused must bring with it the quashing of the proceedings at the preliminary investigation, even if no formal provision of the law has been violated. A decision of the Supreme Court decided this, in a case where a telephone conversation had been astutely organized and recorded by a police superintendent.[17] The Code of 1958 confirms this in Article 172 and at the request of the Committee for Criminal Legislation the drafting of this text is most probably going to be improved, so that the solution which it propounds may be absolutely certain.

The inquiries which precede the preliminary investigation and which can sometimes dispense with it are of an altogether different nature, and each presents particular problems. However, there is one question common to all three: that is the garde à vue.

The prefects of the departments (and, in Paris, the prefect of the police) had received from the 1808 Code[18] the right of doing, personally, or of having performed by the officers of the judicial police, all acts necessary for the purpose of ascertaining crimes, misdemeanours and minor infractions of the law, and of arresting those who committed them. Considered dangerous for the republican régime, and too perilous for the liberty of the individual members of the public, this possibility of acting in the way that an investigating magistrate would was taken away from the prefects in 1933, but restored to them in 1935, limited, however, to the investigation of crimes and misdemeanours against internal or external security of the state.[19]

The 1958 Code[20] preserved the powers of the judicial police for the prefect in the field of crimes and misdemeanours against the security of the state (no longer distinguishing, since 1960, between the internal and external security of the state), but on condition that this be not brought before the judicial authority, by obliging the prefect to inform the Public Prosecutor immediately and limiting the exercise of his powers to a period of twenty-four hours, "all this upon penalty of quashing the proceedings."

However, the events already referred to[21] led the Government to extend to five days,[22] then to as much as fifteen days[23] the length of the period fixed in 1958 at twenty-four hours, and at the same time the sanction of quashing the proceedings, in the case of failure to observe the legal rules, was suppressed in the text of the Code.

But the setting up of a Court of State Security[24] fortunately provided an opportunity for redrafting the text. Since the laws of January 15, 1963, Article 30 limits to forty-eight hours the period for the exercise of the powers of the judicial police by prefects, and again defines the conditions for the exercise of these powers, in peace time or war time, "all this upon penalty of quashing the proceedings."

An inquiry into a flagrant délit is an inquiry which must be preceded with, without opening a preliminary investigation, in the case of a crime or a misdemeanour (punishable by imprisonment) which is "flagrant"—it being understood that a crime or a misdemeanour is said to be "flagrant" when it is actually being committed, when it has just been committed or even when, at a time that is very close to that of the infraction of the law, the suspected person is followed by public rumour, or leaves traces which show that he participated in an infraction of the law.[25]

In such cases the 1808 Code entrusted the Public Prosecutor with the task of making an inquiry, but it authorised every judicial police officer assisting the Public Prosecutor to proceed on his own initiative and allowed the investigating magistrate to place the matter before himself personally, by opening the preliminary investigation himself. On the other hand, since the 1958 Code, the investigating magistrate can only proceed with the inquiry into a flagrant délit, without opening a preliminary investigation in its proper sense, on condition that he then hands the file to the Public Prosecutor "for all necessary purposes," [26] and this inquiry is normally carried out by the first judicial police officer who is informed of the infraction of the law.[27]

The inquiry into a flagrant délit—the rules of which would take too long to set out here—gives every judicial police officer very extensive powers, such as that of making a search of the house of persons "who appear to have participated in the crime or seizing articles and objects relating to incriminating matters," [28] or of "calling for and hearing all persons likely to furnish information concerning the matters or the articles and documents which have been seized." [29] One may think that in giving such powers to every judicial police officer,[30] the 1958 Code to some extent sacrificed the liberty of individual members of the public and the rights of the accused to the satisfaction of the public interest, which requires that the circumstances surrounding a flagrant breach of the law be elucidated in the shortest possible time.

On the other hand, the provision must be noted by which the suspected person, whom the Public Prosecutor has ordered to be brought before him, can only be heard in the presence of his counsel if the suspected person appears voluntarily, with his counsel, before the judge.[31]

The preliminary inquiry was previously known under the name of an "unofficial" inquiry and the officers of judicial police proceeded without authority from a judge, but also without particular powers and without other authority than the prestige which attached to their occupation; persons interrogated by them were not obliged to reply, and the officers could only enter the house of a member of the public with his permission, freely given and with the knowledge of the right to refuse it (according to the decisions).

The criminal law relating to minors had already recognised the advantage of sometimes proceeding by way of the unofficial inquiry, instead of opening the judicial investigation.[32] The 1958 Code devoted several articles to the preliminary inquiry, in order to avoid abuses of it. In doing this, it maintained the principle according to which this inquiry is based on the good will of the interested parties: in particular, it specifies that searches and seizures cannot take place without express written agreement.[33] But coercion is, however, introduced, by authorising the judicial police officer "to detain" persons "for the requirements of the preliminary investigation" [34]: this is the "garde à vue," which must now be considered.

The garde à vue consists of detaining a person—apart from any arrest properly so called, or detention under remand—for the requirements of an inquiry into a flagrant délit,[35] or of preliminary inquiry,[36] or for the undertaking of a "rogatory commission" entrusted by an investigating magistrate to a judicial police officer.[37]

The provisions which the 1958 Code devoted to the garde à vue—for the first time in the history of our legislation—have been much criticised. M. Maurice Garçon, the well-known lawyer, in particular, has often blamed them for having opened the way to all sorts of abuses, by reintroducing into our French criminal justice the system of secret investigation without full argument on both sides, during which the person held is left without the assistance of his counsel, at the discretion of the police officer.

However, it is certain that the garde à vue has always occurred in fact, and that it is a practical necessity which it is better to recognise than to try to ignore. Its procedure must be correctly carried out, and a person should be brought before a magistrate because of the evidence of guilt which appears against him must not be left under the control of a policeman; further, its duration must be strictly limited.

Concerning the first condition, it would take too long to analyse here the texts of the Code. Concerning the second, the rule established by Article 105 [38] has already been seen. As for the duration of the garde à vue, it is limited in principle to twenty-four hours, but may possibly be extended for a new period of twenty-four hours by the written decision of the Public Prosecutor or of the investigating magistrate. Is this too much? Is it too little?

In the matter of crimes and misdemeanours against state security, this double period of twenty-four hours has been held to be too short. During the difficult years, there was an increase in this field, and the period was extended in the last instance to fifteen days.[39] But when the Court of State Security was set up, a lively debate took place in Parliament on this point and, finally, the period for a garde à vue was fixed at forty-eight hours, with the possibility, however, of a double extension carrying it, under judicial control, to a total duration of ten days (or of fifteen days in "a state of emergency" [40]).

But apart from offences against state security, police officers persist in asking for an extension of the double 24-hour period, which they consider too short in all cases where a question arises of identifying and seizing all the members of a criminal gang. In order to reconcile the protection of individual liberty with the public interest, it seems that a longer period of garde à vue could be provided for in cases of counterfeiting and drug traffic, for example.

At the trial proceedings, the occasions when there may be a conflict between the public interest and the interest of the accused are also very numerous. Here again, we cannot say everything. A choice must be made, and we shall only examine some questions relating to our common law assize courts and to the Court of State Security.

(a) The assize court, in France, has been the object of numerous reforms since the Code of Criminal Investigation in 1808.[41]

To confine ourselves to the principal dates in a history of 150 years, the laws of June 25, 1824, and of April 28, 1832, allowed the introduction of mitigating circumstances in all crimes and placed the question of the admission of these circumstances, which always exclude the death penalty, to a jury of twelve, who decide by a majority.

Then, the law of June 19, 1881, abolishing the summing-up by the president, at one stroke removed the possiblity of an association between the court (professional judges) and the jury.

But a law of March 5, 1932, provided that the three judges should decide the amount of the punishment, by a majority, the twelve jurors having previously deliberated alone on the question of guilt. Finally, there was the law of November 25, 1941, which fully achieved the association of the court with the jury, the latter being reduced to six jurors for the purpose of deliberating together both on guilt and then on punishment.

After the end of the war, an order of April 20, 1945, raised the number of jurors from six to seven, but still preserved the system of 1941. However, the question of the relationship of the judges and the jury presented itself to the draftsmen of the Code of Criminal Procedure. How should this question be resolved? On the one hand there is an authoritarian view of the assize court, on the other a liberal one, that is to say there are two views taken of public interest and of guarantees of individual liberty.

The return to the 1932 system (a jury deliberating alone on the question of guilt, then joining the court in order to fix the punishment) was insistently demanded by the majority of French barristers, one of whom did not hesitate in denouncing the 1941 law as a law "of rare hypocrisy," by which "the Vichy Government, at the servile instance of a dictatorship, dealt a fatal blow to the jury because it was guilty of being independent," and since when "there is no longer a jury in France." [42]

However, this interpretation is historically inaccurate, for the 1941 reform, the outcome of a draft presented in 1938 by the Committee over which Paul Matter presided, has been approved by two great liberal lawyers, Professors H. Donnedieu de Vabres and Louis Hugueney, and then confirmed clause by clause, immediately after the Liberation, by the order of April 20, 1945.[43]

From a legal point of view, also, French juries do not have the task of handing over criminal justice to the whim of popular emotion by introducing an element of romanticism or judicial democracy which the men of the Revolution never thought of. Our juries assure the accused at the assize courts the safeguard of being judged by men like themselves, by their equals. But they decide according to their judgment, according to the evidence produced before them [44] and, like all professional judges, have the duty of applying the law to the facts of the case. It is therefore perfectly reasonable that they should be associated with the judges of the court.[45]

In fact, the 1958 Code maintained the association of court and jury so that they should deliberate together concerning guilt and then punishment, but increased the number of jurors from seven to nine and provided that the accused could be declared guilty by a majority of eight votes against four.[46] This numerical requirement guarantees that there may only be a finding of guilty against the accused with the approval of the majority of the jury. As for the deliberation together of court and jury, it corresponds to the desires of the average juror and Frenchman, at the same time as it assures, as experience proves, a more equal and regular justice.

If it is true that the principle or essence of an assize court is to be found in a certain association of court and jury,[47] one may think that French law, which persists in not allowing the presiding judge to sum up,[48] has achieved this association in a manner suitably adapted to the French temperament.

Less important at first sight, but in practice very serious, is the question of the examination of the accused by the president of the assize court.

The 1808 Code did not provide for this examination. It invited the representative of the public prosecutor's department to open the proceedings by presenting the case for the prosecution [49] and only called upon the president to put possible questions to the accused after each witness had given evidence.[50] But the custom was quickly established whereby the Public Prosecutor no longer presented his case, and it was the presiding judge who opened the proceedings by making the accused undergo an examination with the object of revealing his past to the jury, and also his personality and "the nature of his defence."

The law of November 25, 1941, changed nothing here, neither the text nor well established custom and the question therefore arose of finding out if the new Code of Criminal Procedure had retained or abolished the examination.

It was easy to appreciate that this had too readily the appearance of being a presentation of the case for the prosecution by the presiding judge of the assize court.[51]

Finally, the 1958 Code decided that "the president shall examine the accused and take note of his declarations (but) is under a duty not to disclose his opinion as to guilt." [52]

This solution is certainly not satisfactory. But it must be recognised that it is hallowed by long tradition, corresponds to the wishes of French judges and jurors, and appears perfectly admissible as in fact applied by our presiding judges in the assize courts.

The examination to which the accused is subjected also leaves the accused the freedom not to reply. This examination may thus reach the point where it becomes, in fact, a monologue delivered by the presiding judge of the assize court, based on documents from the preliminary investigation. . . . Therefore, from the beginning of a French criminal trial, the record of the preliminary investigation has a great practical importance, and has a notable effect on the proceedings.

However, in order to limit the influence of the record and ensure respect for the oral examination in the proceedings, the 1958 Code decided that the record, at the closure of the proceedings, must be placed in the hands of the clerk of the court, the court and the jury taking with them to the room where they deliberate only the order for committal for trial, concerning which there is certainty that it has been read and debated at a public hearing.[53]

This reform, which has had a mixed reception in France, may appear a modest one. Nonetheless, it does amount to a first step tending to reduce the weight of the written proceedings in the interest of the accused.

Among all the questions which assize procedures still presented to the draftsmen of the 1958 Code, that of expert opinion was certainly one of the most delicate. It must be recognised, unfortunately, that it has been only imperfectly solved by this Code.

Efforts have been made to distinguish from witnesses the experts appointed under the jurisdiction of the courts making the preliminary investigation or that of the trial court.[54] But the fact remains that scholars or technicians called by the accused appear at the hearing of the assize courts as witnesses, not as experts, and that in the case of a conflict of opinion between the official experts and these "witnesses," the French assize court has no other recourse than to decide "either that it be overridden in the proceedings, or that the matter be adjourned to a later date."[55]

The points of law which arose in the trial of Marie Besnard can be observed, and it must certainly be recognised that the rights of the accused in matters of criminal expert opinion are not satisfactorily protected in France.

The Court of State Security, for its part, tries a case according to the rules which apply in general to courts of summary jurisdiction,[56] but nevertheless follows at the close argument a procedure which is very similar to that of assize courts and of military tribunals.[57]

In so far as the jurisdiction of this exceptional court is concerned, the only question which is worth raising here is that of the errors or inadequacies which the barrister may be guilty of in the course of the proceedings—a question whose legal and practical importance was shown when Maitre Isorni was penalised by the military court.

It would appear reasonable that a barrister should be disbarred if he failed in the duties which his professional oath imposes upon him. By this oath he promises "to say or publish nothing, as counsel or legal advisor, contrary to the laws, regulations, public morals, state security and the peace of the republic and to public authorities."[58] But it is obviously a very serious matter ruthlessly to place a barrister in a position where it is impossible for him to practice his profession, as though he were an accused person obliged to appeal to another barrister so as at once to ensure his own defence. It is even very serious to fetter the freedom of speech of a barrister by the threats of possible sanctions.

In the face of these contradictory requirements, the regulations concerning the discipline of the Bar provide that "every error, every failure in the obligations imposed on the barrister by his oath, committed at a hearing by him, may at once be checked by the court having jurisdiction in the matter, upon the findings of the Public Prosecutor's department, if such error or failure exists, "the punishments ranging, according to the case, from a simple warning to temporary suspension (to a maximum of three years) and to permanent disbarment.[59]

The texts relating to the Court of State Security repeat these provisions, but add two important details to them.

On the one hand, a barrister who is at fault must not be able to evade punishment by his absence, and it is correct to give him a period of time for reflection in order to prompt him to have himself represented and to allow him to prepare his defence. It is therefore decided that "if, at the time of the address of the Public Prosecutor to the court, the barrister is absent from the disciplinary action, the proceedings relating to this action are automatically adjourned to the first hearing of the court without further formality."[60]

On the other hand, and in particular, it was a question of finding out if the sanction of temporary suspension or of disbarment would be, or could be, immediately put into force, despite the possibility or the exercise of a right of appeal. Here, the law allows the Court of State Security to declare the sanction to be immediately enforceable, but two conditions are placed upon this: in essence, the lapse committed by the barrister must be inexcusable, and must allow his presence at the proceedings; in so far as procedure is concerned, the court cannot deliver judgment until after hearing the president of the Bar, or his representative.[61]

It is in this fashion that a problem, which the violence of passion may quite often raise in political trials, has been solved. As has been said, "if the barrister has the right to maintain an opinion which differs from that of the state, it seems unreasonable that he should be able to profit by the immunity enjoyed as a barrister in order to make a platform from which he might try to stir up social disorders and encourage or justify subversion."[62]

After judgment, the basic question which arises concerns the right of appeal which may be exercised against the judicial decision. The interest of the accused is to be able to rectify all the errors of law or of fact which may have vitiated the decision. But the public interest is to avoid procedural abuses or delays, for a judgment of a court in practice derives its social value for the most part from the authority of a res judicata.

From this point of view, it is not necessary to dwell here on the system of appeals in French criminal procedure at common law: this is set out in all the standard works. A lot could be said about the successive solutions which French law applied to the question of appeal, and of appeal to the highest court from judgments and decisions (called "d'avant-dire-droit"), ruling on a variety of points, in the course of the proceedings. But this question is too complicated to be tackled here.[63] On the other hand, it is interesting to take note of the procedure applicable to decisions of the Court of State Security.

The judgments of the Court of State Security are unappealable, and this is explained—as for decisions of the assize court—by the high standing of the jurisdiction, and the fact that a matter only goes before the court after a preliminary investigation.[64] But the procedures for a stay of execution, against a decision obtained by default, by way of appeal to the highest court, on the ground of violation of the law and for an appeal in the case of an adverse verdict founded on an error of fact, have been declared available, under the conditions in the Code of Criminal Procedure, against the judgments of the Court of State Security.[65]

In conclusion, may I be allowed to suggest that criminal procedure is not satisfactory if it does not ensure respect for the rights of the accused, but that is just as bad if it sacrifices the defence of society to an excessive desire to protect the individual's freedom.[66]

CONTROL OF DRUG DEPENDENCE AND OF POISONS

Law No. 70-1320 of 31 December 1970 relating to the health measures for the control of drug dependence and the suppression to traffic in, and illicit use of, poisons. (Journal officiel de la République française, 3 January 1971, No. 2, pp. 74-76)

1. Book III of the Public Health Code is hereby extended as follows:

PART VI

CONTROL OF DRUG DEPENDENCE

Article L.335-14

Any person making illicit use of substances or plants classified as narcotics shall be placed under the surveillance of the health authority.

CHAPTER I—SPECIAL PROVISIONS APPLICABLE TO PERSONS REPORTED BY THE PUBLIC PROSECUTOR

Article L.355-15

Whenever the public prosecutor [procureur de la République], in pursuance of Article L.628-1 of the Public Health Code, orders a person who has made illicit use of narcotics to undergo disintoxication treatment [cure de desintoxication] or to submit to medical surveillance, he shall inform the competent health authority. The latter shall make arrangements for a medical examination of the person and an investigation into his family, professional and social life.

Article L.355-16

(1) If it appears from the medical examination that the person is an addict, he shall be ordered by the health authority to attend an approved establishment of his choice or, if he fails to exercise this right, an officially designated establishment, in order to undergo disintoxication treatment.

(2) Once the person has begun the required course of treatment, he shall remit to the health authority a medical certificate indicating the date of commencement of care, the probable duration of treatment, and the establishment in which he is to be hospitalized or under whose surveillance he is to undergo out-patient treatment.

(3) The health authority shall follow the progress of the treatment and shall at regular intervals inform the public prosecutor's office of the medical and social situation of the person.

(4) In the event of treatment being interrupted, the director of the establishment or the physician responsible for treatment shall immediately inform the health authority which in turn shall notify the public prosecutor's office.

Article L.355-17

(1) If the health authority considers, on the basis of the medical examination, that the person's condition is not such as to necessitate disintoxication treatment, the authority shall order him to submit for as long as is necessary to medical surveillance, either by a physician of its choice or by a social hygiene clinic [dispensaire d'hygiene sociale] or approved health establishment, either public or private.

(2) Once the person has submitted to the required medical surveillance, he shall remit to the health authority a medical certificate indicating the date of commencement of surveillance and its probable duration.

(3) The health authority shall follow the progress of the treatment and shall at regular intervals inform the public prosecutor's office of the medical and social situation of the person.

(4) In the event of medical surveillance being interrupted, the physician responsible for treatment shall immediately inform the health authority which in turn shall notify the public prosecutor's office.

CHAPTER II—SPECIAL PROVISIONS APPLICABLE TO PERSONS REPORTED BY THE MEDICAL AND SOCIAL SERVICES

Article L.355-18

The case of a person making illicit use of narcotics may be referred to the health authority either by the certificate of a physician or by the report of a social worker. In this event, the health authority shall make arrangements for a medical examination of the person and an investigation into his family, professional and social life.

Article L.355-19

If it appears from the medical examination that the person is an addict, he shall be ordered by the health authority to attend an approved establishment of his choice or, if he fails to exercise this right, an officially designated establishment, in order to undergo disintoxication treatment, and to provide proof of compliance.

Article L.355-20

If it appears from the medical examination that the person's condition is not such as to necessitate disintoxication treatment, the health authority shall order him to submit for as long as is necessary to medical surveillance, either by a physician of its choice or by a social hygiene clinic or approved health establishment, either public or private.

CHAPTER III—SPECIAL PROVISIONS APPLICABLE TO PERSONS ATTENDING PREVENTIVE OR CURATIVE ESTABLISHMENTS OF THEIR OWN ACCORD

Article L.355-21

Drug-dependent persons who of their own accord attend a clinic or hospital establishment for purposes of treatment shall not be subject to the above provisions. If they specifically request, their identity may be kept secret at the time of admission. Their identity may be revealed only on grounds other than the suppression of the illicit use of narcotics.

Persons who have received treatment under the conditions provided for in the preceding paragraph may request the physician who treated them for a personal certificate specifying the period(s), duration and purpose of treatment.

2. Chapter I of Part III of Book V of the Public Health Code shall read as follows:

CHAPTER I—POISONS

Article L.626

All persons who contravene the provisions of the public administrative regulations concerning the production, transportation, import, export, possession, offer, cession, acquisition and use of substances or plants, or the cultivation of plants, classified as poisonous by statutory provisions, shall be sentenced to two months to two years' imprisonment and/or a fine of 2,000 F to 10,000 F, the same penalties being applicable to any act associated with the aforementioned operations.

The regulations referred to above may likewise prohibit all operations connected with the said plants and substances.

The courts shall also be empowered, in all the cases provided for in this Section, to order the confiscation of seized substances or plants.

Article L.627

All persons who contravene the provisions of the public administrative regulations provided for in the preceding Article and concerning poisonous substances or plants classified as narcotics by statutory provisions, shall be sentenced to two to ten years' imprisonment and/or a fine of 5,000 F to 50,000,000 F. The period of imprisonment shall be ten to twenty years where the offence consists of the illicit import, production, manufacture or export of the said substances or plants.

A person attempting to commit any of the contraventions covered by the preceding paragraph shall be liable to the same punishment as an actual offender. The same shall apply to conspiracy to commit the aforesaid contraventions.

The penalties prescribed in the two preceding paragraphs may be imposed even if the various acts making up the contravention were committed in different countries.

The following shall likewise be sentenced to two to ten years' imprisonment and/or a fine of 5,000 to 50,000,000 F—(1) persons who with or without payment have aided others to use the said substances or plants, either by making available premises for these purposes or in any other way; (2) persons who have acquired or attempted to acquire the said substances or plants by means of forged prescriptions or prescriptions issued as a favour; (3) persons who have supplied the said substances or plants on presentation of such prescriptions, although aware that the latter are forged or were issued as a favour.

The period of imprisonment shall be five to ten years where aid in the use of the said substances or plants has been rendered to a person or persons less than 21 years of age or where the latter have been supplied such substances or plants under the conditions referred to in item 3 above.

In all the cases mentioned in the preceding paragraphs, the penalty of deprival of civil rights for a period of five to ten years may also be imposed by the courts.

The courts may sentence any person convicted under this Section to restrictions on residence [interdiction de sejour] for a period of not less than two years and not more than five years. They may likewise order the withdrawal of the passport of any such person and the suspension, for a period not exceeding three years, of his driving licence.

The provisions of Section 59 (second paragraph) of the Criminal Procedure Code [1] shall be applicable to premises in which group use is made of narcotics and to premises in which the said substances or plants are illicitly manufactured, processed or stored.

Visits, searches and seizures may be made only for purposes of investigation and verification of the offences covered by this Article. The prior written authorization of the public prosecutor shall be required for such visits, etc., where they involve dwelling houses or apartments, unless they have been ordered by the examining magistrate. Any charges preferred on other grounds shall be rendered null.

Article L.627-1

[Period of detention in custody; medical examinations of detainees at 24-hour intervals, the medical certificates being appended to the file]

Article L.628

All persons who make illicit use of any of the substances or plants classified as narcotics shall be sentenced to two months' to two years' imprisonment and/or a fine of 500 to 5,000 F.

Article L.628-1

Persons who have made illicit use of narcotics may be ordered by the public prosecutor to undergo disintoxication treatment or to submit to medical surveillance, under the conditions prescribed by Articles L.355-15 to L.355-17.

Persons who have complied with the medical treatment prescribed for them and have continued the treatment until its termination shall not be liable to prosecution.

Similarly, proceedings shall not be initiated against persons who have made illicit use of narcotics where it is established that, since their reprehensible conduct, the persons have undergone disintoxication treatment or have submitted to medical surveillance, under the conditions prescribed by Articles L.355-18 to L.355-21.

In all the cases provided for in this Article, the confiscation of seized plants and substances shall be imposed, where appropriate, by order of the president of the high court [tribunal de grande instance] on the request of the public prosecutor.

The provisions of the second and third paragraphs above shall apply solely to the first recorded contravention. In the event of a second contravention, the public prosecutor shall determine whether or not proceedings should be initiated, where appropriate under the conditions of the first paragraph.

---

[1] Cases in which searches, domiciliary visits and seizures are permitted at any time during the day or night are listed in the paragraph cited. — Ed.

Article L.628-2

Persons charged with the offence referred to in Article L.628 and for whom medical treatment is found to be necessary may be obliged, by writ of the examining magistrate or the juvenile court magistrate [juge des enfants], to undergo disintoxication treatment accompanied by all medical surveillance and rehabilitation measures appropriate to their condition.

The enforcement of the order prescribing this treatment shall be proceeded with, where appropriate, after the termination of the inquiry, the rules laid down by Article 148-1 (second to fourth paragraphs) of the Criminal Procedure Code being applicable in appropriate cases.

Articles L.628-3 — 628-4

[Various legal provisions relating to the disintoxication treatment]

Article L.628-5

The disintoxication treatment prescribed by Articles L.628-2 and L.628-3 shall be undergone either in a specialized establishment or under medical surveillance. The legal authority shall be informed of the progress and results of the treatment by the physician in charge. The conditions under which the treatment is to be carried out are to be laid down by public administrative regulations.

The expenses incurred in the fitting out of treatment establishments and the costs of hospitalization, treatment and medical surveillance incurred in the implementation of Articles L.628-1 to L.628-3 shall be borne by the State. The regulations referred to above shall lay down the procedures for implementing this provision.

Article L.628-6

Once the examining magistrate or the authority dealing with the case has ordered a defendant to be placed under medical surveillance or has obliged him to under go disintoxication treatment, the enforcement of the measures in question shall be subject to the provisions of Articles L.628-2 to L.628-5 above, which, insofar as they relate to disintoxication, shall constitute an exception to Article 138 (item 10 of the second paragraph) et seq. of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Article L.629

In all the cases covered by Articles L.627 and L.628, confiscation of seized substances or plants must be ordered by the courts. Confiscation may however not be imposed where the offence has been detected in a pharmaceutical dispensary if the offender is merely the manager, unless the proprietor of the dispensary has been an accomplice or the possession of the substances or plants in question is illicit.

In the cases covered by the first paragraph and item 3 of the fourth paragraph of Article L.627, the courts may prohibit the convicted person from practising, for a period not exceeding five years, the profession under the cover of which the offence was committed.

In the cases referred to in the first paragraph of Article L.627, the confiscation of equipment and installations which have been used in the processing and transport of substances or plants must be ordered.

In the cases referred to in item 1 of the fourth paragraph of Article L.627, the courts may order the confiscation of utensils, equipment and furniture with which the premises are stocked and/or decorated, and may prohibit the offender from practising, for a period not exceeding five years, the profession under the cover of which the offence was perpetrated.

Whosoever contravenes the prohibition of professional practice imposed under the second and fourth paragraphs of this Article shall be sentenced to not less than six months', and not more than two years', imprisonment and/or a fine of not less than 3,600 F and not more than 36,000 F.

Article L.629-1

[Provisions governing the closure of hotels, restaurants, clubs, places of entertainment, etc., in which offences under Articles L.627 and L.628 have been committed]

Article L.630

[Penalties for incitement to commit offences under Articles L.627 and L.628]

Article L.630-1

Without prejudice to the implementation of Sections 23 et seq. of Ordinance No. 45-2658 of 2 November 1945,[2] any alien who has been convicted of an offence covered by Articles L.626, L.628-4 and L.630 may be prohibited by the courts from entering French territory for a period of two to five years. Any alien who has been convicted of an offence covered by Article L.627 may be permanently prohibited from entering French territory.

The convicted person shall in all cases be subject to the provisions of Sections 27 and 28 of the above-mentioned Ordinance.

Article L.630-2

The penalties prescribed in this Chapter shall be doubled in cases of recidivism, under the conditions of Articles 58 of the Penal Code.

3. [Expenses of preventive measures, hospitalization and care]

4. [Applicability to Overseas Territories]

The French Code of Criminal Procedure

(Translated and with an Introduction by Professor Gerald L. Kock, A.B., J.D., LL.M., Emory University)

INTRODUCTION

The reform of French criminal procedure begun in 1957[1] was filled out in 1959[2] and has been modified several times since it came into force.[3] It is our purpose here to describe the procedure that now exists for the trial of a criminal case in France.[4]

French penal law recognizes three classes of offenses (infractions): felonies (crimes), misdemeanors (delits) and petty offenses (contraventions de simple police). The gravity of an offense is measured by the severity of the punishment prescribed for it. Thus, a petty offense (contravention) is one punishable by imprisonment for not more than two months and a fine of not more than 2,000 new francs (une peine de simple police)[5]; a misdemeanor (delit) is an offense punishable by jailing or imprisonment for not more than five years and a fine of more than 2,000 new francs (une peine correctionnelle)[6]; and a felony (crime) is an offense punishable by more severe penalties, such as death or imprisonment at hard labor[7] (une peine criminelle or une peine afflictive et infamante).[8]

The first step in the prosecution of an offender for most offenses is an investigation (information) conducted by an examining magistrate[9] (juge d'instruction).[10] A different procedure is provided for the prosecution of each class of offense. The different procedures are designed to provide a measure of protection for the accused commensurate with the severity of the penalty that may be incurred should a conviction result.

[10] Because the police investigation (enquete preliminaire) is not an immediate part of the prosecution procedure, it is not here discussed, though it is subject to supervision by the prosecutor (procureur de la Republique), Arts. 75–78. The police investigation, which is conducted much as in common law countries, is useful to the prosecutor in deciding whether prosecution is appropriate or not. For a more detailed discussion of these investigations before trial, see Anton, "L'instruction Criminelle," (1960) 9 Am.J.Comp.L. 441–457.

Before Trial. The preliminary investigation conducted by the examining magistrate is a regular part of the judicial process. Its function is the very important one of channeling cases to the trial court that has jurisdiction over the type of offense of which the accused can most reasonably be expected to be convicted. This function is not known in the common law as a separate step for at least two reasons. First, and probably most significant, is the earlier intervention of judicial personnel into the inquiry under the French criminal procedure. Second is the fact that in most common law jurisdictions there is but one court for the trial of any but the smallest offenses.

There are two ways in which a case may be initiated.[11] If a complaint is filed accompanied by a claim for civil damages the magistrate has jurisdiction to proceed with his investigation.[12] If a claim for damages is not filed with the complaint it must be forwarded to the local prosecutor. If he decides to pursue the matter he so notifies the examining magistrate. It is upon this initial application (réquisitoire introductif) that the jurisdiction to investigate is based.[13] Once the investigation is begun, the magistrate is free to inquire into any offense related to that stated in the complaint or application and may proceed to investigate any person who may appear to be involved.[14] Persons who are ordered to appear and give evidence must do so, subject to a penalty for nonappearance, as for contempt.[15] The subject of the investigation is not put on his oath as are other witnesses,[16] and he may have the assistance of counsel if he chooses.[17] Witnesses other than the civil claimant are not entitled to the assistance of counsel at these hearings unless they are advised that they are being investigated. The magistrate is required to warn them should that be the case.[18] The proceedings are not open to the public,[19] are in writing or promptly reduced to writing,[20] and are not adversary in form (sans contradictoire), except in a very limited sense.[21]

The investigation need not end in a formal charge against anyone. During his investigation, the magistrate may find that the statute of limitations has run (prescription pénale) and that he has, therefore, no jurisdiction (ordonnance de refus d'informer).[22] The magistrate may, in his order closing the investigation, find that there are not charges enough to justify prosecution, that the facts as shown do not constitute an offense, or that it is not appropriate to prosecute (ordonnance de non-lieu).[23]

Appeals may be taken from orders of the examining magistrate to the indicting chamber of the local court of appeal. The prosecutor may appeal from any order of the magistrate. The accused may appeal orders assuming jurisdiction, permitting civil claims to be filed, allowing extended jurisdiction, permitting civil claims to be filed, allowing extended preventive detention, or refusing provisional release (bail). A civil party may appeal from an ordonnance de non-lieu, orders refusing to investigate, and other orders that he can show will prejudice his civil interests.[24]

If the magistrate finds that it is an appropriate case for prosecution, he issues an order for transfer (ordonnance de renvoi). If the offense charged is a petty offense the case is transferred to a police court (tribunal d'instance, sitting for penal matters) for trial.[25] If the offense is a misdemeanor, it is transferred for trial to the appropriate court of primary jurisdiction (tribunal de grande instance).[26] If a felony is involved, the case is not transferred to a trial court but goes first to the indicting chamber of the local court of appeal.[27]

The indicating chamber (chambre d'accusation) of the court of appeal has exclusive jurisdiction to order the trial of felonies. The action of the indicting chamber is designed to be expeditious. The attorney general of the court of appeal is required to submit the case to the court within ten days, and the court is supposed to dispose of the case as promptly as possible.[28] The court considers only the report of the magistrate's investigation, petitions of the prosecutor, and briefs submitted by the civil parties and the accused. Under the new Code of Criminal Procedure, counsel for the civil party and the accused may appear to argue their clients' positions, and the court may summon the accused. No other witnesses are heard, however.[29]

There are four courses open to the indicting chamber once the case has been submitted to them. First, the court may decide that further investigation is necessary before action can be taken.[30] If this course is chosen, an order is rendered (arrêt de plus ample informé) committing the case to one of the judges (conseillers) of the court or to an examining magistrate for action.[31] Secondly, the court may decide that it is an inappropriate case for prosecution because of the nature of the offense or the evidence available. If this course is chosen the court issues an arrêt de non-lieu, which is substantially the same as the ordonnance de non-lieu that can be rendered by an examining magistrate.[32]

The third course open to the indicting chamber is to decide that the offense of which the accused is subject to conviction is not a felony. In this event the court renders a decree (arrêt de renvoi) transferring the case to a court of primary jurisdiction (for a misdemeanor) or a police court (for a minor offense).[33]

The fourth, and most usual, course that may be taken by the court is to render a decree of indictment (arrêt de mise en accusation), transferring the case to the assize court for trial.[34] This decree has extraordinary qualities. The decree vests jurisdiction of the case in the assize court even if it is not a proper case for that court. Issuance of the decree serves as well to cure all the flaws in the investigating procedure that has gone before.[35]

The Trial Court. The court having jurisdiction over the smallest offenses (tribunal d'instance, called the tribunal de police when hearing criminal cases) consists of a single judge.[36] There are several ways in which a case can be brought before the court.[37] The culprit and the accuser may voluntarily appear before the court where justice will be rendered rather summarily. Another, and the most usual, way for offenses to come in is by petition of the victim or the local prosecutor (member of the ministère public attached to the local court of primary jurisdiction, the tribunal de grande instance). On receipt of a petition, an order to appear (citation directe) is issued by the court and is served on the accused or at his domicile by the bailiff of the court.[38] The accused must be given not less than five days in which to appear, failing which he can be tried in absentia, subject to his right in some cases to demand a rehearing at a later date.[39] Of course, if the prosecution was begun before the examining magistrate the accused is already well aware of the pendency of the action and the necessity for appearing for trial. When the examining magistrate issued his order remanding the case for trial before a police court, he so notified the accused and, if he had been held in custody, released him.[40]

The trial will be conducted in much the same way as for a misdemeanor[41] except that there is but one judge, and the local police commissioner is charged with pressing the interests of the public if the penalty that can be assessed is less than ten days in jail and a fine of 400 new francs, since there is no prosecutor (procureur) assigned to this court.[42] The trial is open to the public unless the court finds that this would endanger the public order or welfare, but minors may always be excluded by the judge if he sees fit to do so.

If there is one, the transcript of the examining magistrate's investigation is read aloud by the recorder. The judge then questions the accused and asks if he has a statement to make. The witnesses are put on oath and testify under questioning by the judge. The civil claimant, if there is one, and prosecutor then argue their cases. The defense is then heard in argument. The prosecutor argues his position followed by the civil claimant, who may offer further observations. The defense may always have the last word if it wishes. The judge then announces his decision on both the criminal prosecution and the civil claim or announces that he will do so at a later hearing, and the trial is closed or recessed, as the case may be.

An appeal may be taken to the local court of appeal by any party whose interests have been infringed.[43]

Misdemeanors may be brought into court by citation directe, just as are petty offenses, but in the usual case they are transferred after an investigation by the juge d'instruction.[44] The court that has jurisdiction over most misdemeanors (the criminal chamber of the tribunal de grande instance) always consists of three judges.[45]

After the procureur has filed the case file (dossier) compiled by the examining magistrate with the recorder (greffier) of the trial court in compliance with an order of that magistrate, or after a proper return has been made to the citation directe, the court has jurisdiction to decide the case. The hearings must be public except that the court may vote to close them if the public order or welfare is endangered, and the president of the court may prohibit the admission of minors.[46]

The procedure is much like that in the police court. The recorder reads the police reports or magistrate's transcript, if there are any; the accused testifies (not under oath), unless he chooses to stand silent; witnesses are heard and demonstrative evidence is examined; the prosecutor, civil party and accused sum up; and counsel for the civil party and the prosecutor may reply to the defense arguments.[47] Again, the defense has the right to have the last word.[48]

After the last of the arguments, the court considers first the question of its jurisdiction. If the court finds that the offense should have been prosecuted before the police court, it may enter a final decision.[49] If the court finds that the offense was a felony, it must enter an order transferring the case to the prosecutor for further action. The court may also order that the accused be taken or held in custody for further proceedings.[50]

Appeals from convictions for misdemeanors may be taken to the local court of appeal by the accused, the civil party (but only to the extent necessary to protect his civil interests), the prosecutor (procureur) attached to the trial court, and the attorney-general (procureur général) attached to the court of appeal.[51] (He is the immediate superior of the prosecutor and is free to exercise many of the same powers.) Notice of appeal, setting forth grounds on which the appeal is based, must be filed with the recorder of the trial court, or the equivalent court in the place where the defendant is detained, within ten days of judgment (except that the procureur général of the court of appeal has two months).[52] If one party appeals, the others have five additional days in which to file cross appeals.[53] Execution of the sentence (jugement) is suspended during these periods and remains suspended until after an appeal is heard if notice is filed in time.[54]

A much more elaborate machinery exists for the trial of felonies than for lesser offenses. The assize court (cour d'assises) has full jurisdiction to try any case transferred to it by the indicting chamber of the local court of appeal, and it may try only such cases.[55] The assize court is an anomaly in the French system. Its jurisdiction is limited as has been indicated; it consists, in part, of a jury;[56] it holds quarterly sessions;[57] and its decisions are not subject to appeal to the court of appeal.

Once the decree for trial has become final, the accused is transferred to the jail in the place where the assizes are to be held.[58] If he has not been detained, he is notified that he is to appear before the president of the assize court on a certain date.[59] As soon as possible thereafter, the president (or a judge delegated by him) interrogates the accused about his identity and assures himself that proper notice of the decree for trial was given.[60] The accused is then asked to designate counsel to assist in his defense.[61] If he does not have, or does not choose, counsel, one is appointed for him from among the attorneys (avocats or avoués) admitted to practice before the court.[62]

Unless the accused waives the delay, the trial may not begin within five days of the first interrogation by the president of the court.[63] If, as a result of his interrogation of the accused or his study of the examining magistrate's report, the president feels that further investigation is required he may conduct such an investigation or order another judge of the court or an examining magistrate to do so.[64] In addition, the president may order the joinder or severance of trials if associated offenses or defendants have been brought for trial at the same term.[65]

The trial begins with the selection of trial jurors from the panel called for the term of court.[66] The jurors are chosen by lot, but the prosecution is allowed four and the defense (no matter how many defendants there are)[67] is allowed five peremptory challenges. No reason may ever be given for a challenge.[68] If the trial promises to be a long one the court may order that one or more alternate jurors be selected.[69]

As is true in the other courts, the trial must be public, unless the judges on the court decide that it would endanger the public order or welfare, and the president may prohibit the attendance of minors.[70]

The trial once begun must continue without interruption to judgment unless it is ordered held over to the next term of court, except that it may be recessed to allow the court to eat and sleep.[71] The president of the court is responsible for maintaining the orderly progress of the trial and has power to do whatever he may deem necessary to discover the truth.[72] The trial proper begins with a reading by the recorder of the decree of indictment.[73] The president then interrogates the accused and tells him he may make any statement he wishes, but the president is not supposed to indicate any opinion on his guilt or innocence.[74] The witnesses called by the prosecution, civil claimant, and accused are then heard.[75] The witnesses may be kept separated until after they have testified.[76] Before giving his statement, the witness is asked by the president of the court to state his name, age, occupation, domicile, if he knew the accused before the alleged offense, and whether he is related to or employed by the accused or civil claimant.[77]

Unless a witness is related to the accused or a civil claimant or is under sixteen years old, he is required to swear that he will speak without hatred or fear and tell nothing but the truth.[78] The witness then makes his statement. He may not be interrupted, except that the president may prevent him from compromising the dignity of the trial or from prolonging it without contributing to the certainty of its outcome.[79] After the witness has finished he may be questioned by the president and prosecutor. The other judges and the jurors may, with the president's approval, ask questions, and counsel for the accused and civil claimant may submit questions to be asked by the president.[80] The witness must remain in the courtroom until the court retires to deliberate unless he is excused by the president.[81]

After the last witness is heard counsel for the civil claimant argues his position. The prosecutor then presents his arguments. The accused and his counsel follow with the arguments for the defense. If the prosecutor or civil claimant replies to the defense, the accused has another opportunity to speak. The defense has a right always to have the last word.[82]

The arguments finished, the court, judges and jurors, retire to deliberate. Before the court retires, however, the president must instruct them that they should ask themselves in silent reflection whether the impression of the evidence on their minds leaves them thoroughly convinced (Avez-vous une intime conviction?) of the guilt of the accused.[83] Nothing may be considered by them that has not been presented orally at the trial.[84] The court, after a period of deliberation, votes by secret ballot.[85] The accused cannot be convicted unless eight of the twelve members vote for conviction.[86] This means that at least five of the nine jurors must vote for any conviction. If the vote is for conviction the court proceeds to vote on a penalty. Each member proposes a penalty by secret ballot, and the penalty must receive a majority of the votes to prevail. The members continue to ballot until they arrive at a penalty. On the third and subsequent ballots the most severe penalty proposed on the preceding ballot is stricken from the list of penalties available.[87]

A penalty arrived at, the court returns to the courtroom, and after the accused is brought in, the president announces the decision and the penalty, if the accused was not acquitted.[88] If a civil claim has been tried along with the criminal charges the three judges then decide that part of the case and hand down their decision.[89] Civil damages may be awarded even if the accused has been acquitted.[90]

No appeal may be taken from the decision of an assize court, but review by the Court of Cassation may be petitioned for by the prosecutor or any aggrieved party.[91]

Appeal and Review. In France, appeal and review differ rather more than in most common law jurisdictions. Appeals are heard by courts of appeal established in districts throughout the country; review is granted only by the Court of Cassation, sitting in Paris. Appeal amounts to a trial de novo based on the record of the trial court. If the trial court decision is reversed on appeal the appellate court enters a final judgment, which supplants the judgment appealed from. Review is limited to consideration of specific points of law enumerated in the petition for review. If the lower court decision is found to have been based on an erroneous understanding of the law, it is set aside, and the case is returned to another court of the same rank for re-trial.

Appeals may be taken from all convictions that involve more than five days' imprisonment or 60 new francs fine,[92] except that no appeal may be had from the decision of an assize court. In general, the procedural rules applied in the tribunal de grande instance apply in the court of appeal as well,[93] except that on appeal one judge is assigned to give the case special study and to report his findings but not his opinions to the court orally at the hearing. The defendant is interrogated by the court, but other witnesses are not heard, as a rule.[94]

If the appeal has been taken by the prosecutor, the court may affirm the judgment below or set aside all or any part of it. If the accused appeals, the court may not increase his punishment. If a civil claimant appeals, the court may not reduce his recovery, but they may increase it.[95] If the court finds that the act charged was not a penal offense or cannot be imputed to the defendant, it will set aside the judgment and may grant the defendant damages.[96] If the court finds that the offense was a felony, it will set aside the judgment and dismiss the appeal, because it has no felony jurisdiction.[97] Since all proceedings after the examining magistrate's investigation were void, the accused may properly be prosecuted before an assize court. If the court determines that the trial was void because of a violation of law or some fatal procedural omission, it will vacate the first trial and decide the case de novo itself.[98]

Final decisions of the indicting chamber, police court, court of primary jurisdiction, court of appeal, and assize may be taken before the criminal chamber of the Court of Cassation (chambre criminelle de la Cour de cassation) for review.[99] Judgments of acquittal rendered by an assize court may be reviewed only for the purpose of clarifying the law; the acquittal may not be in any way affected.[1] Decisions not on the merits of the case may be reviewed only if they terminated the proceedings.[2]

The public sessions of the Court of Cassation are much like those of the courts of appeal. One judge reports on the case, and counsel for the parties present their arguments. If he desires to do so, the attorney general attached to the court may address his views to the court.[3] In the court's deliberations the judge who reported the case states his opinion first, and the president states his last. The other members indicate their opinions in the order of their seniority on the court.[4] The court may reverse a decision only because of a misinterpretation or misapplication of law. It may not consider whether the evidence is sufficient to support the decision.

If, before considering the merits, the court decides that the procedures prescribed for perfecting a review before the court have not been complied with, the court dismisses the petition (by arrêt d'irrecevabilité or arrêt de déchéance).[5] If the court finds that the case has become moot it renders an arrêt de non-lieu and does not reach the merits.[6] After its deliberation on the merits the court either rejects the petition for review (by arrêt de rejet) or reverses the decision below.[7] Unless there remains nothing to be decided (as is the case where an acquittal is being reviewed on the prosecutor's petition) the court must remand the case to a lower court for a new decision on the merits. This remand is not to the court whose decision has been reversed but to another court of the same rank, e.g., court of appeal, police court.[8] If a conviction for a misdemeanor or petty offense is reversed because the court had no jurisdiction the remand is to the court that does have jurisdiction to decide the case. If the error found by the court is not one that vitiates the entire proceeding, the Court of Cassation may grant the petition in part only and remand only that part of the case for re-trial.[9] The Court of Cassation has no jurisdiction ever to render a final decision on the merits of the case.

Title III—Parole

Article 729

Convicts having been subject to one or more penalties privative of liberty may benefit from a parole if they have given sufficient proof of good conduct and present serious indications of social readaptation.

Parole shall be reserved to convicts who have served three months of their penalty, if that penalty is less than six months, and half of the penalty in other cases. For convicts who are legal recidivists within the terms of Articles 56, 57 or 58 of the Penal Code the time before release shall be increased to six months if the penalty is less than nine months and to two-thirds of the penalty in other cases.

For those sentenced to solitary confinement with hard labor for life, the time before release shall be fifteen years.

For persons sentenced to a mixed temporary penalty of solitary confinement, it shall be four years longer than that corresponding to the principal penalty if that penalty is correctional, and six years longer if that penalty is a felony penalty.

Article 730

The right to grant parole belongs to the Minister of Justice.

The recommendation file shall contain the advice of the chief of the establishment in which the interested person is detained, the judge for the application of punishments, official counsel attached to the court that pronounced the conviction, the prefect of the department in which the convict intends to fix his residence or, in cases provided by decree, the prefect of the place of detention, and of a consultative committee instituted within the Ministry of Justice the composition of which shall be fixed by decree.

Article 731

The benefit of parole may be mixed with particular conditions such as measures of assistance and control destined to facilitate and verify the readjustment of the freed man.

Those measures shall be placed in operation under the direction or under the surveillance of committees presided over by the judge for the application of punishments, with the concurrence of the charitable associations authorized for that purpose.

A decree shall determine the measures envisaged in the present article, the composition and powers of the said committees and the conditions for authorization of the charitable association. It shall also fix the condition of financing indispensable to the application of these measures and to the functioning of the committees.

Article 732

The decree for parole shall fix the manner of execution, the conditions to which the grant or the maintenance of parole is subordinated and the nature and duration of the measures of assistance and control.

That duration may not be less than the duration of the part of the penalty not served at the time of release, if a term punishment is concerned; it may exceed it for a maximum of one year.

However, when the punishment in course of execution is a life penalty or a mixed punishment of solitary confinement, the duration of the measures of assistance and control shall be fixed for a period that may not be less than five years nor greater than ten years.

During all the duration of parole the provisions of the decree of release may be modified on the recommendation of the judge for the application of punishments on advice of the consultative committee.

[9] Ibid., Art. 612.

Article 733

In case of a new conviction, notorious bad conduct, violation of the conditions or failure to observe the measures set out in the decision for parole, the Minister of Justice may pronounce the revocation of that decision on advice of the judge for the application of penalties and of the consultative committee.

In case of urgency, arrest may be provisionally ordered by the judge for the application of penalties of the place where the freed man is found, after hearing official counsel and subject to immediately placing the matter before the Minister of Justice.

After revocation the convict must serve, according to the provisions of the decree of revocation, all or part of the duration of the penalty that remained for him to serve at the time of his release on parole, cumulatively, if appropriate, with any new penalty that he has incurred; the time during which he was placed in provisional arrest shall count for the execution of his penalty, however.

If the revocation does not intervene before the expiration of the time provided in the preceding article the release shall be final. In that case the penalty is deemed to be terminated from the day of release on parole.

Title IV—Suspension

Chapter 1—Simple Suspension

Article 734

In case of sentence to imprisonment or to a fine, if the convict has not been the object of an earlier sentence to imprisonment for a common law felony or misdemeanor the courts may order, by the same judgment and by decision stating reasons, that the execution of the principal punishment shall be suspended.

Article 735

If during five years, dating from the judgment or decree, the convict has not incurred any prosecution followed by sentence to imprisonment or to a more serious punishment for a common law felony or misdemeanor the conviction shall be deemed to be void.

In other cases, the first punishment shall be executed first without confounding it with the second, subject to the eventual application of the provisions of Article 738.

Article 736

The suspension of the punishment shall not extend to payment of costs of the trial and damages.

Nor shall it extend to accessory punishments or to incapacities resulting from the conviction.

However, the accessory punishments and the incapacities shall cease to have effect on the day on which, by application of the provisions of Article 735, the conviction has been deemed void.

Article 737

After having pronounced the decision of conviction provided in Article 734, the president of the court must advise the convicted person that in case of a new conviction the first punishment will be executed without confusion with the second being possible and that the punishments for recidivism will be incurred in the terms of Articles 57 and 58 of the Penal Code.

Chapter 2—Suspension With Probation

Article 738

In case of a sentence to imprisonment for a common law offense, if the convicted person has not been the object of an earlier conviction for a common law felony or misdemeanor and a sentence of imprisonment or if he has been sentenced only to a punishment of jailing less than or equal to six months, the courts may, in ordering that the execution of the principal punishment be suspended for a time which may not be less than three years or greater than five years, place the convicted person under the regime of probation.

However, if the earlier conviction was pronounced with the benefit of suspension with probation added the provisions of the first paragraph of the present article shall be inapplicable.

If the earlier conviction was pronounced with the benefit of simple suspension the first punishment shall be executed, by derogation of the provisions of Article 735, only if the second falls under the conditions and times provided in Article 740 or Article 742. That first punishment shall be void if the second punishment itself comes to be declared or deemed void under the conditions and in the periods provided in Article 743 or in Article 745.

Article 739

The regime of probation shall require for the convicted person the observation of the measures of surveillance and assistance provided by an administrative regulation with a view to social readjustment of delinquents as well as the observation of those obligations provided by the same administrative regulation that have been specially imposed by the decree or judgment of conviction.

Article 740

If in the course of the time fixed in application of Article 738 the convicted person has incurred a prosecution followed by a sentence to imprisonment or a more serious punishment for a common law felony or misdemeanor, the first punishment shall be executed first without being confounded with the second.

Article 741

If in the course of the same period it appears necessary to modify, increase or reduce the obligations to which the convicted person is subject, the judge for the application of punishments of the place of his residence may, either on his own motion or on application of official counsel or at the request of the interested person, order their modification, their increase or their suppression.

Article 742

If in the course of the same period the convicted person does not satisfy the measures of surveillance and assistance or the obligations imposed with reference to him, the judge for the application of penalties may place the matter before the court of primary jurisdiction of the place where the convicted person resides, that it may order the execution of the penalty. The same right belongs to official counsel.

The judge for the application of penalties may, after hearing official counsel, decide by order stating reasons that the convicted person be taken to and retained in a jail. In that case, the court must decide within three days of the imprisonment.

The decisions of the court may be appealed from by official counsel and the convicted person.

Article 743

If in the course of the same period the convicted person satisfies the measures of assistance and surveillance and the obligations imposed with regard to him, and if his readjustment appears accomplished, the judge for the application of penalties may place the matter before the court of primary jurisdiction of the place where the convicted person resides, that the conviction may be declared void. The same right belongs to official counsel and the convicted person.

The court may not be called upon for that purpose before the expiration of a period of two years counting from the day on which the conviction became final.

The decision of the court may be appealed from by official counsel and by the convicted person.

Article 744

When the convicted person placed on probation is otherwise the object of measures prescribed by an earlier decision rendered in application of Articles 15, 16 and 28 of the Ordinance No. 45–174 of February 2, 1945, the juvenile judge who first decided or who presided over the juvenile court that rendered the decision or, on delegation of competence, that of the place of the residence of the convicted person, shall exercise the power devolved on the judge for the application of punishments by Articles 741 to 743 of the present code.

When the convicted person reaches twenty-one years of age, those powers shall be exercised by the competent judge for the application of punishments.

Article 745

If at the expiration of the period fixed in application of Article 738 the execution of the punishment has not been ordered under the conditions provided in Article 742 and if the convicted person has not incurred a prosecution followed by a sentence to imprisonment [or jailing] or to a more serious punishment for a common law felony or misdemeanor, the conviction shall be considered as void.

Article 746

The suspension of the punishment shall not extend to the payment of the costs of the trial and damages.

Nor shall it extend to the accessory punishments and to incapabilities resulting from the conviction.

However, the accessory punishments and the incapacities shall cease to have effect on the day on which, by application of the provisions of Articles 743 and 745, the conviction has been declared or deemed void.

Article 747

The president of the court must, after having pronounced the decision of conviction provided in Article 738, give the advice prescribed in Article 737, informing the convicted person of the sanctions to which he is subject if he fails to conform to the measures ordered and of the possibility that he may, on the other hand, see his conviction declared void by observing perfect conduct.

Title V—Recognizing the Identity of Convicted Individuals

Article 748

When after an escape followed by a retaking or in any other circumstance the identity of a convicted person is contested, that contest shall be settled following the rules established for matters of incidents of execution. However, the hearing shall be public.

If the contest is raised in the course of and on the occasion of a new prosecution, it shall be settled by the court dealing with that prosecution.

Title VI—Imprisonment For Payment

Article 749

When a sentence to a fine or to costs or to any other payment for the profit of the public Treasury is pronounced by a criminal jurisdiction for an offense not having a political character and not including a life punishment, it shall fix, for the case in which the sentence remains unexecuted, the term of imprisonment for payment within the limits provided below.

When the imprisonment for payment guarantees the recovery of several debts its duration shall be fixed according to the total of the liabilities.

Article 750

The duration of the imprisonment for payment shall be regulated as follows:

from two to ten days when the fine and the pecuniary liabilities do not exceed 100 new francs; from ten to twenty days when, greater than 100 new francs, they do not exceed 250 new francs; from twenty to forty days when, greater than 250 new francs, they do not exceed 500 new francs; from forty days to sixty days when, greater than 500 new francs, they do not exceed 1,000 new francs; from two to four months when, greater than 1,000 new francs, they do not exceed 2,000 new francs; from four to eight months when, greater than 2,000 new francs, they do not exceed 4,000 new francs; from eight months to one year when, greater than 4,000 new francs, they do not exceed 8,000 new francs; from one year to two years when they exceed 8,000 new francs.

In police matters the duration of imprisonment for payment may not exceed two months.

Article 751

Imprisonment for payment may not be pronounced either against individuals less than eighteen years old at the time of the acts that led to the prosecution or against those who began their seventieth year at the time of the conviction.

It shall be reduced by half for the benefit of those who at the latter time are in their sixty-second year, without prejudice to the application of the provisions of the following article.

Article 752

It shall also be reduced by half, without its duration ever being less than twenty-four hours, for those convicted who prove insolvency by producing—(1) a certificate of the tax collector of their domicile suggesting that it not be imposed; (2) a certificate of the mayor or the police commissioner of the commune of their domicile.

Article 753

It may not be utilized simultaneously against husband and wife, even for the recovery of sums arising out of different convictions.

Article 754

It may be utilized only five days after a demand made of the convicted person at the request of the prosecuting party.

If the judgment of conviction has not been earlier served on the debtor the demand shall be at the head of an extract of that judgment, which shall contain the name of the parties and the disposing parts. After examination of the return of service of the demand and on the demand of the prosecuting party, the prosecuting attorney shall address the necessary applications to the agents of the police and other functionaries charged with the execution of judicial warrants. The petition for incarceration shall be valid only until the expiration of the period of limitation for the punishment. That limitation occurring, no imprisonment for payment may be utilized unless it is under way or has been the object of an earlier order for confinement.

If the debtor is detained the order may be made immediately after the notification of the demand.

When, before the signature of the petition for incarceration, an entire year passes after the demand, it must be renewed.

[6-4-60]

Article 755

The rules on the execution of judicial warrants fixed by Articles 124 and 132, with the exception of the reference to Articles 133 and 134, paragraphs 1 and 2, are applicable to imprisonment for payment.

[6-4-60]

Article 756

If an already incarcerated debtor requires that he be referred to him, he shall be taken immediately before the president of the court of primary jurisdiction of the place where the arrest was made. That magistrate shall decide as a referee except to order, if appropriate, remand for decision under the forms and conditions of Articles 710 and 711.

The same right belongs to a debtor arrested or ordered to be confined who shall be taken immediately before the president of the court of primary jurisdiction of the place of detention.

Article 757

If the arrested debtor does not require that he be referred to someone, or if, in case of referral, the president shall order that the objection be passed over, the incarceration shall be undertaken in the forms above provided for the execution of punishments privative of liberty.

Article 758

Imprisonment for payment shall be served in a jail in the section destined for that use.

However, in case or order for confinement, if the debtor is subject to a punishment privative of liberty on the date fixed for final or conditional release he shall be held in the penitentiary establishment for the duration of his imprisonment for payment.

Article 759

Individuals against whom imprisonment for payment has been pronounced may prevent it or any of its effects either by paying or by setting aside a sum sufficient to extinguish their debt or by furnishing a security recognized as good and valid.

The security shall be approved by the receiver of finances. In case of dispute, it shall, if appropriate, be declared good and valid by the president of the court of primary jurisdiction acting as referee.

The surety ought to liberate himself within the month, failing which he may be prosecuted.

Subject to the reservation of the provisions of Article 760, when complete payment has not been made, imprisonment for payment may be required anew for the sums remaining due.

Article 760

When the imprisonment for payment has come to an end for any reason whatever it may not be further utilized either for the same debt or for convictions prior to its execution unless those convictions involved on their part an imprisonment longer than that already submitted to, in which case the first incarceration must always be deducted from the new constraint.

Article 761

The detained debtor shall be subject to the same regime as convicted persons, without being required to work, however.

Article 762

A convicted person who has submitted to imprisonment for payment is not freed of the amount of the liability for which it was utilized.

QUESTION 1

To avoid any misunderstanding it must be stated at the outset that there exists no 1969 German Criminal Code effective 1973, so that it is not possible to answer the questions on the basis of the provisions of such a Code. On the other hand, among the many recent amendments of the German Criminal Code, which have been made within the framework of the reform of German Criminal law in general and the Criminal Code in particular, there stands out the Second Criminal Law Reform Law of July 4, 1969 (Zweites Gesetz zur Reform des Strafrechts (2.StrRG) vom 4.7.1969),[1] which provides an entirely new version of the Criminal Code's General Part (Secs. 1–79b of the Criminal Code), to become effective October 1, 1973. [It will be hereinafter quoted as the 1973 Code]. According to the opinion of a leading German criminal law scholar, who authored one of the most recent treatises on the General Part of German criminal law,[2] "the 2.StrRG simultaneously assumed the obligation—which, of course, could at any time be revoked—to adjust at least, if not extensively to reform, the new Special Part [of the Criminal Code] by October 1, 1973."[3]

The systematic structure of the German Penal Code, in the version which will become effective October 1, 1973, follows the European pattern of separating the code into a General Part and a Special Part: while the General Part (Secs. 1–79b) deals with crime and punishment in general, outlining general principles of the administration of criminal justice which are applicable regardless of the type of the offense involved: the Special Part (Secs. 80-370) defines the essential elements of the individual offenses.[4]

Thus, the tripartite division (general provisions; specific offenses; sentencing—a short survey of sentencing provisions appears at the end of the answer to Question 1) is not followed in the 1973 German Penal Code.

In the following portion, the detailed contents of the General Part of the 1973 Code are given, in order to show its structure, as well as to provide insight into a number of special topics—in particular, measures of rehabilitation and safety, as well as other measures—which cannot be covered in detail due to the shortness of time.

While the 1962 Draft of the German Penal Code had structured its Special Part into six Divisions corresponding to six legally protected interests,[5] at the present time the reform of the Special Part has not reached a state where such an innovation would have become law. Thus, the Special Part still consists of twenty-nine divisions, some of which have already been amended, while the rest—as has been pointed out above—are expected to be amended prior to October 1, 1973, i.e., the date on which the new General Part will enter into force. Several divisions: the Fifteenth Division (Secs. 201–210) Dueling, as well as the Twenty-fourth Division (Sec. 283) Bankruptcy, have become obsolete, having been replaced by other provisions or special legislation. The crimes against the State continue to rank first in the present version. Details are omitted inasmuch as reforms are to be expected to be forthcoming in the nearest future.

Sentencing—In addition to maximum, and sometimes minimum, penalty provisions contained in most provisions of the special crimes of the 1973 German Penal Code, Title Two of the Third Division of the General Part (Secs. 46–51) contains extensive regulations on judicial sentencing which, along with basic principles for fixing punishments, in particular an outline under which exceptional circumstances a short-term deprivation of liberty may be imposed, provide for rigid sentencing rules in case of recidivism, for particular statutory grounds for mitigation of punishment, for cases of concurrence of such punishment mitigation grounds, and finally for consideration of other confinement or fines. The list of factors for a judge to consider in pronouncing a regular, milder, or severer sentence include: the motivations and aims of the perpetrator; the state of mind which the act bespeaks and the exercise of the volition involved; the extent of the breach of duty; the manner of perpetration, and the culpable effects of the act; the prior life of the perpetrator, his personal and economic circumstances, as well as his conduct following the act, in particular his efforts to repair the damage caused (Sec 60, par. 2). These provisions

[5] Professor Gerhard O. W. Mueller has summed them up as follows: "The Special Part has six principal divisions, corresponding to six legally protected interests: First, the person; second, the moral order; third, property; fourth, public order; fifth, the state and its institutions; sixth, the society of peoples. It is of particular satisfaction for us to note that the human being has been given the uppermost rank in the order of protected values. The moral order and property rank a close second and third. Public order and the state, which hitherto had been ranked above all other values in Germany and elsewhere are properly designated to be of merely subsidiary significance. This is right and proper, for we should never forget that the state merely serves the subsidiary function of protecting the human being in the enjoyment and full development of his primary rights: physical integrity and the enjoyment of his moral and material qualities . . . The entire Special Part follows a rigorous order in a successful effort to cover even the unforeseen case. This Code is as free of loopholes as humanly possible. . . ." "The German Draft Criminal Code 1960—An Evaluation in Terms of American Criminal Law," University of Illinois Law Forum, v. 1961, p. 36–37.

however do not preclude the court from having a choice within a relatively wide frame of minimum and maximum punishments.

There are also special provisions for fixing punishment in case of the violation of several statutory provisions by the perpetrator. These provisions whose translation follows[5a] are, in the opinion of Professor Mueller,[6] "clear, proper, and humanitarian" and "will prevent a lot of unnecessary argument at trial or on appeal. In addition, they are a guard against any possible legislative ambition to cumulate punishments by carving several crimes out of the same typical fact pattern."

QUESTION 2

None of the versions of the German Penal Code[7] left any blank numbers for future statutes. More extensive amendments are incorporated in the Code by creating new Chapters and or Sections identified by adding a capital letter to the number of the particular Chapter and a small letter to the number of the Section.

The usual numbering system is that of consecutive numbers for the entire Penal Code.

The final wording of the 1973 Penal Code is not yet known, since the criminal law reform has not come to a close in the Federal Republic of Germany. Although the Second Criminal Law Reform Statute of July 4, 1969 (Bundesgesetzblatt I:717) included the full text of the "General Part" mentioned above, amended some Sections of the "Special Part," as well as added several new Sections (numbered by adding respective small letters to the number of the preceding Section), several later statutes introduced new provisions—both in the General Part [Sec. 4, par. 3 was amended by the Eleventh Criminal Law Amending Statute of December 16, 1971 (BGBl. I:1977)] and the "Special Part" [e.g., a new Section 316c was inserted penalizing highjacking of airplanes (Id.); Section 239a received a new version and a new Section 239b concerning abduction was introduced by the Twelfth Criminal Law Amending Statute of December 16, 1971 (BGBl. I:1979)].

In the opinion of Professor Eberhard Schmidhäuser, who authored a recent voluminous treatise on the General Part of German substantive criminal law [based on the Penal Code as amended until April 1, 1970, on the one hand and on the new version of the General Part to become effective October 1, 1973], the German legislator "by [passing] the Second Criminal Law Reform Statute has simultaneously committed himself—of course in an anytime revocable manner—to at least bring in, if not sweepingly to reform, the Special Part with this new General Part, until October 1, 1973." However, he also points out that the General Part will become law on that date only in the case if, in the meantime, no new statutes will amend it, or its entering into force will not be postponed.[8]

The two main forms of guilt are intent and negligence. They denote two kinds of the perpetrator's psychological relation to his conduct or act which, because of its blameworthiness, may subject him to punishment. As has been mentioned above, the doctrine of guilt in German criminal law has evolved by case law and the work of legal scholars. On the other hand earlier criminal law theory and practice preceding the promulation of the Code of 1871, has had a notable impact.[9] However the Criminal Code of 1871 contains only one Section (Sec. 59) exclusively devoted to the two forms of guilt: intent and negligence. The text of this Section has been preserved as originally conceived and remains in force until October 1, 1973. It reads:[10]

"Sec. 59. If a person in committing an offense did not know of the existence of circumstances constituting the factual elements of the offense as determined by statute or increasing the punishment, then these circumstances may not be charged against him.

"In punishing an offense committed through negligence, this provision applies only insofar as the lack of knowledge does not in itself constitute negligence for which the offender is responsible."

One of the best critical analyses of this provision was made in one of the standard German criminal law treatises, authored by two German authorities in this field.[11] Because of its relative conciseness in summing up the salient features of the German doctrine on the forms of guilt (culpability), it is incorporated in this report. To quote:[12]

"The written foundations of the doctrine of the forms of guilt (kinds of culpability) in the Penal Code itself, are, at first glance, quite scarce. They are dealt with exclusively in both paragraphs of Section 59. But for a person who knows how to obtain a deeper insight into the interrelationship of things, the wording of the statute tells more than this would seem to appear at first sight. And he who, furthermore, visualizes more precisely the historical evolution of this provision . . . to such a person, the true meaning of the entire doctrine will easily reveal itself in its details, it making no difference whether one tends to perceive in the finally remaining [text of] Section 59, paragraph 1 (as v. Hippel does it) more of a "result of legislative inefficiency" in Prussia and in the Imperial Penal Code following pace with [the Prussian Criminal Code] as its model, or [adopting what is a sounder view (Mezger)] a wise legislative restraint against overhasty doctrinal definitions in a statute. Considered from such a point of view, Section 59 tells us three things:

(a) the Statute starts from the statutory factual element of illegality and Its individual factual circumstances;

(b) the Statute deals in Section 59 especially with the personal "imputability" (Zurechnen) of this factual element of illegality, that is with questions of criminal law guilt;

(c) in the juxtaposition of paragraphs 1 and 2, the Statute concerns itself with two forms of guilt imputation, hence two forms of guilt, which simultaneously signify a graded scaling down of guilt. In addition, the more serious form of guilt (par. 1) bears no special name, but according to the preceding evolution . . . is called "Intent (Dolus)." The less serious form of guilt (par. 2) is, by the Statute itself, expressly termed "negligent" perpetration.

As a result, the law, which is in force now, deals with two basic forms of guilt: they are joined in scattered cases by a combination of both basic forms.

Thus, according to the learned authors quoted above, there actually exist three degrees of guilt: 1) the statutory regular form of guilt, called intent (dolus malus); 2) the lighter form of guilt, called negligence (culpa), denoting such a psychological attitude of the perpetrator toward his conduct which, although it is not intent, still constitutes a form of guilt; 3) the combination of both forms of guilt in circumscribed cases, where with respect to expressly mentioned characteristics of the criminal act, intent is required, while in other respects, mere negligence is sufficient to constitute such a particular criminal offense.

Hence, German legal theory and court practice has evolved the doctrine of guilt (Schuld). This term according to Professor Gerhard O. W. Mueller, corresponds almost exactly to our term mens rea and as such, was even made part of one of the first recent criminal code drafts (1958). Professor Mueller provides the following comparison between the German terms and the common law approach:[13]

"A previous draft (1958) had contained a remarkable and sweeping Section 2 which reads as follows: 'No punishment without guilt. Anybody acting without guilt cannot be punished. The punishment may not exceed the degree of guilt.' But 'guilt' was left undefined. . . . Actually, the German term 'guilt' (Schuld) corresponds almost exactly to our term 'mens rea' and the first sentence of the section stood for nothing more radical than the psychologically well-founded proposition that punishment for any act constellation or part thereof for which the defendant cannot be blamed is impermissible. As theoreticians we, in America, would regard any additional punishment as useless and absurd. The common law adhered to the same standard, and we began deviating only when American criminal-law scholarship did not perform its watchdog function of speaking up against legislative and judicial abuses during the second half of the nineteenth century. Similar concern, unquestionably, had caused the German draftsmen to include this command as a guard against judicial creation of absolute liability, vicarious liability, praeter-intentional liability (e.g., felony-murder) or the old versari in re illicita rule (intention to do any wrong as sufficient mens res for any criminal harm actually caused). However, in a series of sweeping decisions and through a number of statutes in the 1950's, German criminal law has been thoroughly cleansed of absolute liability in all its forms. The principle has become so fundamental as a natural proposition, resting on psychology as much as 2 equals 2 rests on mathematics, that it needed no longer any legislative affirmance. Hence, it was stricken. In all the specific instances of the General and Special Part, however, the principle is implicitly contained and explicitly explained without noteworthy exception."

Both the 1960 Draft of the German Penal Code[14] and the 1962 Draft of the German Penal Code,[15] contained definitions of intentional and negligent conduct, in particular, defining the following five terms denoting five different kinds of culpability: intentionally, purposefully, knowingly, negligently and wantonly. The pertinent Sections read as follows:

"Sec. 16. Intention.

"Anybody who seeks to effectuate the definitional elements of the act, or who knows or takes it for granted that he will effectuate them, or who considers such effectuation possible and does not mind it, acts intentionally.

"Sec. 17. Purpose and Scienter.

"(1) Anybody who seeks to effectuate a circumstance for which the law required purposefulness, acts purposefully.

"(2) Anybody who knows or takes for granted that a circumstance for which the law requires scienter is present or will come to pass, acts knowingly.

"Sec. 18. Negligence and Wantonness.

"(1) Anybody who fails to exercise that care which the circumstances and his personal condition require of him and of which he is capable and for that reason does not recognize that he is effectuating all the definitional elements of a crime, acts negligently.

"(2) Anybody who deems it possible that he will effectuate the definitional elements of a crime, but in violation of duty and in blameworthy fashion trusts that he will not effectuate them, also acts negligently.

"(3) Anybody who acts with gross negligence acts wantonly."

Neither of these provisions have been retained in the 1973 Penal Code. It is not devoid of interest to note that Horst Schroder, in an article published in 1965, voiced doubts concerning the retention of these provisions in the new Code. To quote:[16]

". . . nevertheless, the draft code contains several novel definitions. For example, intention and negligence are now defined. However, I am not sure that this will survive into positive law. The endless difficulty of attempting to differentiate between intention—in the form of dolus eventualis, an approving of chance—taking with respect to the result, and mere recklessness, the latter in Germany regarded predominantly as a form of negligence—makes it almost mandatory that the statute itself be silent on this point. A definition would impede development of a better definition by scholarly endeavor or case law."

The 1973 Code contains the general principle that, as a rule, only intentional conduct entails punishment, unless a statutory provision for the contrary. This general rule is expressed in Section which reads as follows:

"Sec. 15. Intentional and Negligent Conduct.

"Only intentional conduct shall be punishable, unless a Statute expressly threatens punishment for negligent conduct."

Further provisions on the question of mens rea are discussed under Question 10 (Mistake of Law and Mistake of Fact).

QUESTION 4

Although causation is not defined in the German Penal Code according to constant court practice, the causation theory is accepted, in particular with respect to such conduct which is punishable because it produces an unlawful result (e.g., the death of a person). Under this theory any factor is considered a "cause" the absence of which would have prevented the unlawful result. Thus, in the case of offenses by omission, a "cause" is the omission of any act which, if performed, would have prevented the fulfillment of the unlawful aim. "It is thus sufficient for an act to be one of the causes of an unlawful result even if the latter could not have been brought about without other factors. . . . The act of omission must always have a causal connection with the unlawful result."[17] In particular, the Code contains a provision concerning commissio per omissionem which is pertinent to this question. It reads as follows:

"Sec. 13. Commission by Omission.

"(1) anybody who fails to avert the consequence belonging to the definitional requirements of a penal statute, shall be punishable under this statute only in case if it is his legal obligation to see that such consequence does not occur, and if the omission is tantamount to effecting the definitional elements of such statute by commission.

"(2) The punishment may be mitigated in accordance with Section 49, paragraph 1."

QUESTION 5

The 1973 Code subscribes to the basic principle that any wrongful act must coincide with the wrongful state of mind in order to become punishable. Section 20 contains provisions defining in a general manner the mental elements of an offense, by providing general criteria under which a person may or may not be held responsible for his actions. As has been the case with earlier Penal Code provisions on capacity for penal responsibility, Section 20 does this in a negative way by indicating the mental defects which as a rule exclude the penal responsibility of a person for an act committed, which otherwise would subject him to punishment. Mental derangement or disturbed mentality is a valid defense under the present Code, as provided by the single provision (Sec. 51) which covers both mental disease and diminished capacity due to such disease,[18] and does not substantially differ from the 1973 solution of this problem. The 1973 Code deals separately with mental derangement as an absolute [17] K. Neumann. "Criminal Law," in Manual of German Law. v. II, London, Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1952. p. 77–78.

[18] This provision, in the Version of the Notice of the New Version of the Penal Code of September 1, 1969 (Bundesgesetzblatt I:1445) reads as follows:

"Sec. 51. Imputability; Diminished Imputability.

"(1) An act does not constitute an offense if the perpetrator at the time of the commission of the act, because of derangement of the senses, because of morbid disturbance of mental activity, or because of mental infirmity, was incapable to realize the forbidden nature of his act or to act in accordance with such understanding.

"(2) If the capacity to realize the forbidden nature of the act, or to act in accordance with such understanding, was considerably diminished at the time of the commission of the act, due to one of these reasons, the punishment may be reduced in accordance with the provisions for the punishment of attempt."

defense excluding any guilt (Sec. 20) and as a ground for mitigating punishment due to so-called diminished criminal responsibility as a result of mental defects (Sec. 21).

These provisions read as follows:

"Sec. 20. Lack of Capacity to Incur Criminal Responsibility by Reason of Mental Disturbances.

"Anyone who, at the perpetration of the act, is incapable of realizing the unlawfulness of the act or to act in accordance with such understanding because of a deep-seated disturbance of consciousness, or because of low mentality, or because of another mental abnormality, acts without guilt.

"Sec. 21. Diminished Capacity to Incur Criminal Responsibility.

"If the capacity of the perpetrator to realize the unlawfulness of his act or to act in accordance with such understanding, is substantially diminished at the commission of the act, by reason of one of the grounds specified in Section 20, the punishment may be mitigated in accordance with Section 49, paragraph 1."

Both provisions were already included in a slightly different version in the 1960 and 1962 Drafts of the German Penal Code. Therefore Professor Gerhard W. O. Mueller's comments with respect to the German insanity formula are of great interest. He points out that "Section 24 is properly phrased in terms of action without guilt, which leaves the (otherwise criminal) act of a demented person still "unlawful," so that measures in lieu of punishment, may be imposed." [19] He also notes that the reference to "unlawfulness" of the act rather than wrongfulness (used heretofore) is a notable improvement "since . . . today a statutory prohibition may well not fall in the category of moral wrong, although it may constitute a legal wrong and unlawfulness, and there is no reason why a defendant whose mind is clouded by disease to such an extent that he cannot appreciate such legal wrongfulness should not be excused." [20] With respect to diminished criminal responsibility, he properly states: [21]

"In case of severely impaired capacity there is no full 'guilt' and hence, the punishment must be mitigated (Sec. 25). The difficulty is not one of formulating the problem but of deciding whom one wishes to regard as having a severely impaired capacity and whom not. In this shady zone of law and human behavior, we meet the so-called psychopath, the neurotic, and the person suffering from a wide variety of behavioral disorders. At issue is really the question of focusing the appropriate correctional attention on such person. But to the extent that their ability to resist anti-legal temptations is merely impaired, they are obviously deserving some, though much less, blame, and thus it is a question of the substantive law of crimes. The German draft appears in order on that score."

One of the measures of rehabilitation and safety provided by the German Penal Code is the commitment to a psychiatric medical institution which the court must order with respect to persons who have committed an offense while lacking criminal responsibility because of mental disturbances (Sec. 20), or while in a state of diminished criminal responsibility (Sec. 21). The pertinent provision contained in Section 63 paragraph 1 has the following wording:

"Sec. 63. Commitment to a Psychiatric Medical Institution of Criminals.

"(1) If someone has committed an unlawful act in a state in which criminal responsibility is lacking (Sec. 20) or in a state of diminished criminal responsibility (Sec. 21), the court shall order him committed to a psychiatric medical institution if the total evaluation of the perpetrator and of his act indicates that serious unlawful acts are to be expected of him as a result of his condition, and that he, because of this reason, constitutes a danger to the general public."

Paragraph 2 of Section 63 further provides that under certain circumstances (outlined in Sec. 65, par. 3) the court must order commitment to a social-therapeutic institution.[22]

QUESTION 6

There are no specific provisions on alcohol or drug intoxication as a valid defense in a criminal trial, so that such intoxication would be treated like any other disturbance of consciousness under Sections 20 and 21 of the 1973 Criminal Code.

However, in case of conviction for an offense perpetrated in the state of such intoxication, coupled with the propensity of the perpetrator towards alcohol or drug addiction, the court is held to order a measure of cure and care-commitment to an institution for alcoholics or drug addicts.[23] The pertinent provision reads as follows:

"Sec. 64. Commitment to an Institution for Withdrawal Treatment.

"If someone has the propensity toward excessive consumption of alcoholic beverages or other intoxicants and is convicted for an unlawful act which he committed while intoxicated or which is traced to his propensity [toward intoxicants] or is not convicted solely because his criminal incapacity is shown or cannot be ruled out, the court shall order commitment to an institution for withdrawal treatment, if the danger exists that he will commit serious unlawful acts as a result of his propensity [toward intoxicants]."

QUESTION 7

Self-defense and necessity provisions have been codified in a special Title of the 1973 Code. The Fourth Title of the Second Division of the Code's General Part entitled "Self-defense and Necessity" (Secs. 32–35), outlines the limits within which the use of force for justifiable or excusable purposes is exempt from punishment.[24] Following long standing practice and legislative tradition, self-defense and its excess are delimited, while two kinds of necessity—justifying necessity and excusing necessity are distinguished. Self-defense with reasonable use of force remains lawful, while excessive use of force in self-defense does not relieve of criminal responsibility, unless occasioned by confusion, fear or fright leading to impunity. Out of the two kinds of necessity, the second—excusing necessity—includes the doctrine of duress and coercion which, however, is not specifically mentioned. In other words, necessity arising from intimidation is also dealt with.

The above-mentioned provisions have the following wording:

"Sec. 32. Self-Defense.

"(1) Anybody who commits an act which is compelled by self-defense does not act unlawfully.

"(2) Self-defense is such defense as is required to avert any present unlawful attack from oneself or another.

"Sec. 33. Exceeding Self-Defense.

"If the perpetrator exceeds the limits of self-defense by reason of confusion, fear or fright, he shall not be punished.

"Sec. 34. Justifying Necessity.

"(1) Anybody who commits an act in the event of a present and otherwise unavoidable danger to life, limb, freedom, honor, property, or another legally protected interest, in order to avert danger from himself or some other person, does not act unlawfully if, in weighing the conflicting interests, namely the affected legally protected interests and the degree of danger they are threatened with, the protected interest substantially outweighs the interest he infringes upon. This applies, however, only insofar as the act is an adequate means to avert the danger.

"Sec. 35. Excusing Necessity.

"(1) Anyone who commits an unlawful act in the event of a present and otherwise unavoidable danger to life, limb, or freedom, in order to avert the danger from himself, a relative or some other person close to him, acts without guilt. This [provision] shall not apply insofar as under the circumstances—namely because he himself has caused the [state of] danger or because he was in a special legal relationship—the perpetrator could have been expected to suffer the danger; however, the punishment may be mitigated under Section 49, paragraph 1, if the perpetrator has to suffer the danger not in connection with a special legal relationship.

"(2) If the perpetrator at the commission of the act erroneously assumes [the existence] of circumstances which under paragraph 1 would excuse his [conduct], he shall be punished only if he could have avoided the error. The punishment shall be mitigated under Section 49, paragraph 1."

QUESTION 8

While the original, as well as the present version of the German Penal Code follows the model of the French Penal Code in providing a tripartite classification of offenses (major crimes, minor crimes, petty offenses),[25] the 1973 Code has broken with this long-time tradition by adopting a bipartite classification (major and minor crimes) and leaving less serious offenses outside its provisions, to be dealt with, according to established practice, as infractions of regulations (Ordnungswidrigkeiten) entailing imposition of fines, but divested of their criminal nature.[26]

QUESTION 9

1. Sentencing. See Answer to Question 1, in fine.

2. Suspension of Punishment for Probation. Sections 56–58 of the 1973 Code cover this subject. They provide for suspension of execution of sentence rather than suspension of imposition of sentence. Thus, probation actually is a form of suspension of sentence. This appears from the pertinent provision of the German Code of Criminal Procedure:

"Sec. 268a. Announcement of the Decision Concerning Suspension of Punishment for Probation.

"(1) If the judgment provides for suspension of punishment during probation, the court, by decision, shall issue directives pertaining to the suspension of the punishment for probation (Secs. 24–24c of the Criminal Code [present version]); this decision shall be announced together with the judgment.

"(2) The presiding judge shall instruct the defendant as to the meaning of the suspension of the punishment for probation, the time, conditions and directives of probation, as well as to the possibility of revocation of the suspension paragraph 1."

Thus, the German criminal procedure does not follow the example of the common law countries where criminal procedure at this stage is split into two separate acts: that of acquittal or conviction; and the distinct second stage of determining the sentence, or sentencing—a method which also was considered for adoption in Germany at the outset of the criminal law and procedure reform (Sec. 25 of the Criminal Code). At the same time he shall be instructed to report any change of residence during the time of probation. The instructions shall, as a rule, be given at the close of the announcement of the decision under movement.[27]

---

[25] Section 1 of the Code (in the Version of the First Criminal Law Reform Law of June 25, 1969, which became effective April 1, 1970) reads as follows:

"Sec. 1. Tripartite Division of Criminal Acts.

"(1) Acts entailing as minimum punishment deprivation of liberty for a term of one year or more, are minor crimes [Verbrechen].

"(2) Acts entailing as punishment deprivation of liberty for a term not to exceed six weeks or a fine of up to five hundred DMarks are minor crimes [Vergehen].

"(3) All the other (alle übrigen) acts entailing as punishment deprivation of liberty or a fine petty offenses [Übertretungen].

"(4) Mitigation or aggravation [of punishment] provided for under the provisions of the First Part [of this Code] or, under mitigating circumstances, less serious, especially serious or similar generally circumscribed cases, shall not be taken into account for [the purpose of] this division."

[26] Section 1 of the Gesetz über Ordnungswidrigkeiten of May 24, 1968 (BGBl. I:481) in the Version of the Law of June 27, 1970 (BGBl. I:911) defines a [public] order violating act (Ordnungswidrigkeit) as follows:

"Sec. 1. Definition of Concept.

"(1) Any unlawful and reproachable art which realizes the definition elements of a statute which permits retribution by means of a fine shall be [considered] an infraction of regulations.

"(2) Any unlawful act, which realizes the definitional elements of a statute in the meaning of paragraph 1, even though it has not been reproachably perpetrated shall be [considered] an act for which a fine is threatened."

For details see Göhler, Erich. Gesets über Ordnungswidrigkeiten. 2nd ed. München, Beck, 1970. 991 p.; Peter Cramer. Grundbergriffe des Rechts der Ordnungswidrigkeiten. Stuttgart, Kohlhammer, 1971. 184 p.

The 1973 Code contains detailed provisions within the limits of which the court may exercise its judicial discretion with respect to suspension for probation of a sentence it has handed down after the trial of a criminal case (Secs. 56–58). In particular, it circumscribes the kinds of cases for which such suspension is available, the length of the probation periods, attaching conditions and directives which the court may impose upon the probationer; mandatory assistance by probation counselors which may be imposed by the court in its discretion; the revocation of suspension; and the remission of punishment. The first general precondition for suspension is that the length of the deprivation of liberty punishment imposed does not exceed one year, which condition, however, has to be coupled with the second condition "if it is to be expected that the convicted person will heed the conviction as a warning and that, even without the impact of the execution of the sentence, he will not in the future commit further criminal offenses" (Sec. 56(1) 1st sentence). The law also points out the circumstances which the court has to take into account in reaching its decision to suspend or not to suspend the sentence. To quote: "In so doing, the personal characteristics of the convicted person, his life, the circumstances of his act, his conduct after the act, his station in life, and the effects which are expected for him from the suspension, shall be considered" (Sec. 56(1) 2nd sentence).

In exceptional cases the court may suspend for probation even the execution of a deprivation of liberty punishment for up to two years (Sec. 56(2)).

The court is, however, barred from suspending any sentence for deprivation of liberty for a term of at least six months "if the protection of the legal order commands it" (Sec. 56(3) of the 1973 Code). The court also may not restrict the suspension to a part of the term to be served. On the other hand, suspension of execution is not excluded because of the fact that detention pending investigation or other deprivation of liberty has been counted toward punishment (Sec. 56(4)).

Supervision and guidance by probation officers, which are called probation counselors, may be directed by the court for the entire length of the probation period "if this is appropriate in order to have him abstain from committing criminal offenses" (Sec. 56d, par. 1). Such supervision is, as a rule, decreed by the court if the suspended deprivation of liberty punishment exceeds nine months and the convicted person has not yet reached the age of twenty-seven years (Sec. 56, par. 2). The tasks of the probation counselors are thus specified by the law (Sec. 56d, par. 3):

"The probation counselor shall look after him in a helpful and provident manner. He shall supervise in cooperation with the court the fulfillment of conditions and directives attaching [to the parole], as well as the offers and acceptances. He shall report on the mode of life of the convicted person after the lapse of periods of time to be determined by the court. He shall inform the court of serious or persistent violations of the attaching conditions or directives."

3. Determinate Sentences. The German Code of Criminal Procedure provides for determinate sentences of deprivation of liberty (Sec. 260). A sample of judgment, consisting of heading, pronouncement and grounds,[28] is reproduced below in a Xerox copy.

4. Recidivism. Stiffer deprivation of liberty sentences are provided in case of recidivism (Sec. 61 of the 1973 Code).

5. Mandatory Minimum Prison Sentences. They are provided for cases of recidivism (Sec. 61), as well as by the individual provisions of special crimes.

6. Release on Parole (Suspension of the Remaining Punishment). Section 57 of the 1973 Code contains detailed provisions on suspension of the execution of the balance of a term of deprivation of liberty. Three conditions must be met: 1) two-thirds of the imposed deprivation of liberty punishment, but not less than two months, must have been served; 2) the court executing the punishment must be satisfied that there is some justification to run the risk that the convicted person, apart from the execution of the punishment, will commit no criminal offenses, and 3) the convicted person has given his consent.

In making the decision to release a person on parole, the personal characteristics of the convicted person, his earlier life, the circumstances of the offense, his conduct during the execution of the sentence, his station in life, as well as the effects the parole is expected to have upon him if it is granted (Sec. 57, par. 1 of the 1973 Code) must be considered.

Under Section 57, paragraph 2, the court executing the punishment may suspend the remaining punishment already after one-half of the sentence is served, if:

(1) at least one year of the deprivation of liberty punishment has been served;

(2) there exist special circumstances with respect to the offense committed and the personal characteristics of the convicted person; and

(3) the remaining preconditions of [Sec. 57,] paragraph 1 have been fulfilled.

However, Section 57, paragraph 5 provides for a limitation of the above-mentioned rules: the sentencing court may at its discretion provide for terms not to exceed six months, prior to whose expiration the petition of the convicted person to suspend the remaining punishment shall not be granted.

It appears from the above-mentioned that in the Federal Republic of Germany prisoners are released on parole not by an administrative agency such as the United States parole board, but by the Court which has jurisdiction over the execution of the imposed sentence.

7. Notice or Appropriate Publicity to be Given to Conviction of any Organization. The Court may, as an additional sanction, provide for the publication of such a sentence. Thus, Sections 15 and 23 of the Law Against Unfair Competition of June 7, 1909 (Reichsgesetzblatt, p. 499), as amended by Law of June 23, 1970 (Bundesgesetzblatt 1970, I:805) provides for publication of a criminal sentence convicting for criminal libel and slander.

8. Persistent Misdemeanant. The German Penal Code provides for stiffer penalties in case recidivism (see above).

9. Reasons in Writing for Sentences Imposed. Section 267 of the German Code of Criminal Procedure provides in some detail that both in cases of conviction and acquittal the court must indicate the grounds for the judgment, such grounds having to include in case of conviction the facts considered proved in which the legal characteristics of the punishable act are found; but in case of acquittal—whether the commission of the act by defendant was not proved or whether and on what grounds the act considered proved was not considered punishable.

For a sample of grounds of judgment, see Appendix mentioned above.

10. Appeal. German criminal procedure provides for several means of review of a judgment: 1) Complaint (Beschwerde—Secs. 304–311); 2) Appeal (Berufung—Secs. 312–332 of the Code of Criminal Procedure); 3) Appeal on Points of Law only (Revision—Secs. 333–358). The permissible means of review are available both to the prosecution (government) and the accused: the prosecution may make use of them even in favor of the accused (Sec. 296 of the Code of Criminal Procedure). The appeals court may increase the sentence only if the prosecution has appealed; but the effect of any proceeding to review, initiated by the prosecution, is that the judgment may also be amended or reversed in favor of the accused (Sec. 301 of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

11. Multiple Offenses. This question is covered in Answer to Question 20. So is also the question on Compound Judgment.

12. Fines. Fines are collected by bailiffs executing court orders. No unsurmountable difficulties have been reported with respect to the collection of fines in the Federal Republic of Germany.

13. "Day Fines." The "day fine" system inaugurated by the 1973 Code does not provide for fines in a fixed amount in a sense that they are made to depend upon the gravity of the offense, or other factors, but means that the amount of the fines to be imposed upon a convicted defendant is determined according to his ability to pay. It has been said that the "day fine" is "a fictitious currency," inasmuch as "[i]ts real money value is computed only 'by taking into consideration the personal and economic circumstances of the perpetrator.'"[29] The basic provisions on day fines are contained in Sections 40–43 of the 1973 Code. They read as follows:

"Sec. 40. Imposition on a Per Diem Basis.

"(1) The fines shall be imposed on a per diem basis. It shall amount to at least five [per diem charges] and, if the statute does not provide otherwise, to not more than three hundred and sixty full per diem charges.

"(2) The amount of the per diem charge shall be determined by the court by taking into consideration the personal and economic circumstances of the perpetrator. The per diem charge shall be fixed, at least, at two and, at most, at not more than one thousand DMarks.

[29] Bauer, supra note 27 at 255.

"(3) The income of the perpetrator, his property and other bases for the per diem charge may be appraised.

"(4) In the judgment the number [of the days for which the fine is imposed] and the amount of the per diem charge shall be indicated.

"Sec. 41. Fine in Addition to Punishment by Deprivation of Liberty.

"If the perpetrator has acted with the specific intent to enrich himself, then, even though punishment by deprivation of liberty alone or deprivation of liberty and a fine in the alternative is threatened [for the offense], a fine may be imposed in addition to deprivation of liberty, if this appears to be appropriate, by taking into consideration the personal and economic circumstances of the perpetator, to impress him or to protect the legal order.

"Sec. 42. Facilitation of Payment.

"If the convicted person, according to his personal or economic circumstances, cannot be expected to pay the fine immediately, the court shall grant him a time for payment or shall permit him to pay the fine in fixed installments. In doing so, the court may order that the privilege to pay the fine in fixed installments shall lapse if the convicted person does not pay one installment in due time.

"Sec. 43. Substituting Deprivation of Liberty Punishment for a Fine.

"Deprivation of liberty punishment shall be substituted for a fine which cannot be levied. One day of deprivation of liberty shall correspond to one per diem charge. The minimum measure of the substitute deprivation of liberty punishment shall be one day."

QUESTION 10

Provisions on error of fact and error of law[30] are contained in Sections 16 and 17 of the 1973 Code. They read as follows:

"Sec. 16. Error Concerning Definitional Elements [of Offenses].

"(1) Anybody who in committing the act does not know a circumstance which belongs to the definitional elements [of an offense], acts unintentionally. Punishability because of negligent perpetration shall remain unaffected.

"(2) Anybody who, in committing an act mistakenly assumes circumstances which would make the definitional elements of a less severe statutory provision materialize, may be punished for intentional commission only under the less severe statutory provision.

"Sec. 17. Error Concerning Unlawfulness [of the Act].

"If the perpetrator, in committing the act, lacks the understanding to be acting unlawfully, he acts without guilt if he was unable to avoid this error. If the perpetrator could have avoided the error, punishment may be mitigated in accordance with Section 49, paragraph 1."

QUESTION 11

There are no analogues to this differentiation between crime and jurisdiction in the German Penal Code.

QUESTION 12

Extraterritorial Jurisdiction is already covered by an earlier report.

The provisions on the extraterritorial reach, application or jurisdiction of German criminal law are contained in Sections 3 through 10 of the German Penal Code in the version of the Second Criminal Law Reform of July 4, 1969, to become effective October 1, 1973.[31]

By providing in Section 3 of the Code that German criminal law shall be applicable to acts committed within the country, the Federal Republic of Germany has rejoined the majority of States where the territoriality principle plays the primordial role, while the other "principles" of international criminal law constitute its exceptions in explicitly formulated narrow fields. At the same time this approach constitutes a return to the original provision of Section 3 in the Code of the German Empire of 1871 which reads: "The Criminal Code of the German Empire is applicable to all offenses committed within the Empire, even if the offender be a foreigner." [32]

The present version of Section 3 is based on the personality principle under which a State applies its criminal law to all offenses perpetrated by its subjects irrespective of the place of perpetration.[33] It also contains the principle of double criminality (Sec. 3(2)) and provides criteria for the determination of the place where the act entailing the punishment occurred (Sec. 3(3)). In the 1973 Code, these two matters are dealt with in Sections 7 and 9, respectively.

In the opinion of one of the leading German law scholars "the [German] legislator has departed from the personality principle as the basis of the rule on the applicability of punishment in order that Germans should not be punished for such acts committed abroad which, at the place of the act, do not entail punishment, or are permitted, or, possibly are even called for." [34]

As it has been pointed out by the same authority, there is, however, no reason to exclude the application of German criminal law in cases where the act committed abroad is also a punishable offense under the law of the place of commission, or if the place of commission was not subject to any criminal jurisdiction (i.e., where there was no sovereignty exacting retribution).[35] Therefore, pursuant to Section 7, paragraph 2, No. 1 of the 1973 Penal Code, in these cases the personality principle of international criminal law applies: whoever at the time of commission of the offense was a German or became a German after the perpetration shall be subject to, and may be prosecuted under, German criminal law.[36] Moreover, some criminal offenses are considered by the framers of the new Code to be so serious that they are subject to German criminal law regardless of the law prevailing at the place of their commission. Thus, by virtue of Section 5, Number 6, German criminal law shall also apply to an abortion perpetrated abroad, provided the offender at the time of the act is a

Section 3 has been changed several times. The most sweeping change occurred when the Nazi legislators, by amending Sections 3–5, extended the application of German criminal law by making a larger group of crimes committed abroad by German nationals and foreigners punishable under German law than was provided for previously. As amended May 6, 1940 (Reichsgesetzblatt 1940, I, 754) Section 3 reads: The German Criminal Law shall apply to any act committed and not punishable under the law of the place of commission if such act does not appear to be a wrong deserving punishment when judged according to the sound sentiment of the German people, in view of the particular circumstances of the place where it is committed.

The act is considered to have been committed at the place where the offender acted and, in case of an omission, where he should have acted, or where the criminal effect of the offense took place or should have taken place." [33] Section 3, in the German Penal Code version of September 1, 1969 (BGB1, 1969, I: 1445) reads as follows:

(1) German criminal law shall apply to the act of a German citizen no matter whether he commits it within the country or abroad.

(2) German criminal law shall not be applicable to an act committed but not punishable abroad, if this act does not constitute a misdeed meriting punishment by reason of special circumstances [prevailing] at the place where the act is committed.

(3) An act is [considered to be] committed at every place where the perpetrator has acted, or in the case of omission, where he should have acted, or where the result became, or should have become, effective.

[36] The concept of "German" (Deutscher) is defined in Article 116 of the Basic Law (Constitution) of the Federal Republic of Germany of May 23, 1949, which reads as follows:

Art. 116. (1) Unless otherwise provided by law, a German within the meaning of this Basic Law is a person who possesses German citizenship or who has been admitted to the territory of the German Reich within the frontiers of 31 December 1937 as a refugee or expellee of German stock (Volkszugehoerigkeit) or as the spouse or descendant of such person.

(2) Former German citizens who, between 30 January 1933 and 8 May 1945, were deprived of their citizenship on political, racial, or religious grounds and their descendants, shall be regranted German citizenship on application. They shall be considered as not having been deprived of their German citizenship if they have established their domicile (Wohnsitz) in Germany after 8 May 1945 and have not expressed a contrary intention. German and derives his livelihood from the Federal Republic, including Western Berlin. Furthermore, German criminal law shall apply to all criminal offenses, irrespective of the law of the place of commission, if the perpetrator is a German holding a German public office, or a soldier of the German Armed Forces and commits the criminal offense within the scope or during the exercise of his official capacity (Sec. 5, No. 8).

With respect to several other criminal offenses, German legislative jurisdiction has been extended by preserving the personality principle as a jurisdictional basis, although this has been done so that even acts committed abroad and directed against persons or property protected by domestic (German) law entail punishment under German criminal law (the so-called protective principle, "Schutz" or "Real-Prinzip"). In the words of Professor Maurach:[37]

". . . The idea seems to be decisive here, the one that the act of a German against certain persons or property protected by domestic [German] law, which enjoy the protection of German criminal law, wherever the offense is committed, should not remain unpunished merely because of the fact that it has been perpetrated by taking advantage of the special circumstances prevailing at the place of commission. Cases of this kind are covered by Section 5, Number 2 (endangering the external security of the democratic constitutional State in the cases of Sections 89, 90b, 90a, paragraph 1; acts against national defense in the cases of Sections 109a–109d and 109h) and Section 5, No. 5 (lewd acts in the cases of Section 174, No. 1, Section 175, paragraph 1, No. 1, and of Section 176, paragraph 1, No. 3). Here the application of German criminal law is made dependent on the perpetrator's (and in the case of Section 5, No. 5 also his victim's) being a German and his deriving his livelihood from the area of effectiveness of [the law of] the Federal Republic, including Western Berlin."

The safeguarding of persons or property protected by domestic (German) law against violations may be determined by the nature of the domestic person or property under attack as well as the criminal law protection accorded to foreigners and property protected at the foreign place of commission. Proceedings from this classification, Professor Maurach states:[38]

"(a) Without regard to the law of the place of commission, criminal acts perpetrated by [Germany's] own subjects and foreigners and directed against persons and property protected by domestic [German] law are subject to German criminal law only in circumscribed, exhaustively enumerated cases.

"In this category belong, under Section 5, No. 1, treasonable acts endangering the peace (Section 80), acts of high treason and treason (Sections 81–83; Sections 94 ff . . .), furthermore endangering the democratic constitutional State in the cases of Sections 90, 90a, paragraph 2, as well as criminal acts against the national defense in the cases of Sections 109, 109e, 109f, and 109g; under Section 5, No. 3, acts of abduction (Section 234a) and of [casting] political suspicion (Section 241a) to the detriment of a German; under Section 5, No. 4, divulging business secrets of German enterprises; under Section 5, No. 7, the offenses connected with testimony (Sections 153, 154, 156) in a proceeding pending before courts located in the Federal Republic, including West Berlin . . .; under Section 5, No. 9, criminal acts perpetrated by a foreigner who is a holder of a German public office (a rare case in practice, e.g., passive bribing of a German honorary consul of foreign nationality) and, finally, under Section 5, No. 10, criminal acts which are directed against the holder of a German public office or against a soldier, to wit, in direct connection with such persons' capacity (e.g., unlawful compulsion against a German diplomat abroad under Section 240; insulting a German customs officer officiating in Basal as a "German customs bandit").

"(b) All other acts perpetrated abroad against a German (independently of his domicile in the Federal Republic) are, according to the protective principle, . . . subject to German law alone, if they are also punishable according to the law of the place of commission or if the place of commission is not subject to any criminal jurisdiction."

The German legislative jurisdiction under the universality principle is spelled out in Section 6 of the 1973 Penal Code bearing the title "Acts committed abroad against persons and property which are internationally protected." Here again German criminal law applies regardless of the law of the place of commission. The offenses belonging to this group include genocide, major crimes committed with explosives, slave traffic in children and women, unlawful narcotics traffic, traffic in obscene publications, and major and minor crimes of counterfeiting, as well as any act which the Federal Republic of Germany has undertaken to prosecute even when it is committed abroad.

The special provision of Section 9 provides the criteria to determine the place of the act constituting a criminal offense and, in particular, covers the problem with respect to accessories.

The German Penal Code[39]

General Part

First Division. The Penal Statutes (Das Strafgesetz)

Title 1 Scope of applicability

Secs. 1–2 [Irrevelant]

Sec. 3. Applicability to Acts Committed within the Country. German criminal law shall apply to acts which are committed within the country.

Sec. 4. Applicability to Acts [Committed] Aboard German Ships and Aircraft. German criminal law shall apply to acts committed abroad aboard a German ship or aircraft, independently of the law of the place of commission.

Sec. 5. Acts Committed Abroad against Persons or Property Protected by Domestic [German] Law. German criminal law shall apply to the following acts which are committed abroad, regardless of the law of the place of commission:

1. acts of treasonable endangering of the peace under Section 80, of high treason, of endangering the democratic constitutional State in the cases of Sections 90 and 90a, par. 2, of treason and endangering external security, as well as acts against national defense in the cases of Sections 109, 109e, 109f, and 109g;

2. acts endangering the democratic constitutional State in the cases of Sections 89, 90a, par. 1, and Section 90b, and acts against national defense in the cases of Section 109a-109d and 109h, if the perpetrator is a German who derives his living from the territory on which this law is in effect;

3. acts of abduction (Sec. 234a) and of [casting] political suspicion [upon another] (Sec. 241a), if the act is directed against a German who has his domicile or usual place of abode in the country;

4. divulging industrial or commercial secrets of an enterprise located within the territory on which this Law is in effect; of a business enterprise which has its seat there; or of a business enterprise with its seat abroad, which is dependent upon a business enterprise with a seat within the territory on which this Law is in effect and which forms a concern with the latter;

5. lewd acts in the cases of Section 174, No. 1, of Section 175, paragraph 1, No. 1, and of Section 176, paragraph 1, No. 3 if the perpetrator, and the person against whom the act is perpetrated, at the time [of commission] of the act, are Germans and derive their livelihood from within the territory on which this Law is in effect;

6. abortion, if the perpetrator at the time [of commission] of the act is a German and derives his livelihood from within the territory on which this Law is in effect;

7. perjury, false unsworn testimony and intentional false affirmation in lieu of an oath in any proceeding, within the territory on which this Law is in effect, pending before a court or any other agency of the German Federal Republic which is competent to administer oaths or affirmations in lieu of an oath;

8. acts which the German holder of a German public office, or a soldier of the German Armed Forces, commits while abroad in an official capacity or with respect to such official capacity;

9. acts committed by a foreigner while holding German public office;
10. acts committed by anyone against the holder of a German public office, or a soldier of the German Armed Forces, while in the performance of his official functions or with respect to his official functions.

Sec. 6. Acts Committed Abroad against Persons and Property which are Internationally Protected. German criminal law shall continue to apply, regardless of the law of the place of commission, to the following acts which have been perpetrated abroad:

1. genocide;
2. major crimes committed with explosives;
3. [slave] traffic in children and women;
4. unlawful narcotics traffic;
5. traffic in obscene publications;
6. major and minor crimes of counterfeiting;
7. acts which the Federal Republic of Germany, in a binding international agreement, has undertaken to prosecute even when they are committed abroad.

Sec. 7. Applicability to Acts Committed Abroad in Other Cases

(1) The German criminal law shall apply to acts which are committed abroad against a German if the act is punishable at the place of commission abroad, or if the place of commission is not subject to any criminal jurisdiction.

(2) The German criminal law shall be applicable to other acts which are committed abroad if the act is a criminal offense where committed or if the place of commission is not subject to any criminal jurisdiction and where the perpetrator

1. at the time of the commission of the act was a German, or became one after the act, or

2. at the time of the commission of the act was a foreigner, is found within this country and is not extradited, although by the nature of the act the [German] Extradition Act would permit his extradition, because an extradition request was either not made or rejected, or the extradition cannot be carried out.

Sec. 8. Time of the Act. An act shall be [deemed to have been] committed at the time when the perpetrator or accessory has acted, or, in case of omission, should have acted. When the result occurs shall not be decisive.

Sec. 9. Place of the Act

(1) An act shall be [deemed to have been] committed at every place where the perpetrator has acted, or in the case of an omission, where he should have acted, where the result implicit in the actual element of the crime occurs or [at the place] where the perpetrator imagined that it should occur.

(2) Complicity is committed at the place of commission of the [principal] act as well as at every place where the accessory has acted, or in the case of omission, should have acted, or where he imagined that it should occur. Where the accessory acted within the country by participating in an act committed abroad, German criminal law shall apply to the complicity even though the act is not punishable under the law of the place of commission.

QUESTION 13

The German Penal Code in its present version does not contain a general provision on conspiracy. Instead, there is, among the Sections dealing with complicity, a special provision (Sec. 49b) concerning conspiracy to commit murder. It reads as follows:

"Sec. 49b. Conspiracy to Commit Murder.

"(1) Anybody who participates in a combination which has for its purpose the commission of major crimes against [human] life, or which has [such crimes] in view as a means to other purposes, or who supports such combination, shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for from three months up to five years.

"(2) In especially serious cases the punishment shall be deprivation of liberty for from one year up to five years.

"(3) One who notifies the authorities or the person threatened so timely that the major crime against [human] life, intended to be committed in the pursuit of the endeavors of the combination, can be prevented, shall not be punished under these provisions."

This provision was introduced in the Penal Code in 1932 by the legislative decree of the President of the Reich of December 19, 1932,[40] penalizing participation in a combination "or an agreement." Subsequently these last three words "or an agreement" were deleted.[41] It has been argued by German legal writers that this Section, since it contains a special provision concerning crimes against life, belongs in the Special Part, namely in the Division (Abschnitt) dealing with homicide and murder.[42]

Some German commentaries to this provision have expressed the opinion that in order to be penalized under this Section 49b, there must have been a combination contemplated to exist for a longer time and that agreement to commit one single offense would not be sufficient;[43] and that at least two persons must have combined to form such conspiracy to commit murder, so that Section 49b would not be applicable, if one of them was an agent provocateur who only pretended to have the intention to form such a combination.[44]

In the General Part of the 1973 Code, no counterpart to Section 49b was included and so far this provision has also not been incorporated in the Special Part of the German Penal Code.

QUESTION 14

The felony-murder rule creating praeter-intentional criminal liability for murder with respect to manslaughter committed by one party to a felony is rejected by the 1973 German Penal Code in its absolute form. However, the provision of the Code providing for severer punishment in case of special consequences of the act contained in Section 22 "in effect, would limit our Anglo-American felony murder liability to cases in which during the commission of a felony, death results from negligence (in the German sense) on the part of the defendant."[45] This provision reads as follows:

Sec. 18. More Severe Punishment in Case of Special Consequences of the Act. Where the statutory provision links to a special consequence of an act a severer punishment, only the principal or accessory who can be charged at least with negligence with respect to this consequence can be subjected to such [severer punishment].

QUESTION 15

Despite its federal system of government, the Federal Republic of Germany does not have a dual system of laender (i.e., state) and federal courts comparable to that of the United States. Both land and federal courts are integrated into a single hierarchy, with state courts on the lower levels (both of original and appellate jurisdictions) and federal courts at the top. These federal courts are appellate courts of last resort to which an appeal lies (on questions of law only; or on the question of constitutionality in the case of the Federal Constitutional Court) from the state courts. Since the bulk of both the substantive and adjective criminal law rules are incorporated in federal criminal (Strafgesetzbuch), viz., criminal procedure (Strafprozessordnung) codes, no problem of concurrent or exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal government ever arises. The same is, as a consequence, true with respect to jurisdiction over riots, mass demonstrations and crimes—the jurisdiction is unlimited.

Until recently the German Penal Code included special provisions on engaging in a riot constituting a breach of peace (Sec. 115), as well as on the offense for disobeying orders to disperse given with a view of preventing a riot (Sec. 116). They read as follows:

"Sec. 115. Riot (Aufruhr).

"(1) Anybody who takes part in a public riotous gathering at which one of the acts specified in Sections 113 and 114[46] is committed with combined efforts, shall be punished for riot with deprivation of liberty for a term from six months up to five years.

"(2) The ringleaders, as well as those rioters who commit one of the acts specified in Sections 113 and 114, shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for a term from one year up to ten years; police surveillance may also be ordered. If there are extenuating circumstances, deprivation of liberty for from six months up to five years may be imposed.

"Sec. 116. Unlawful Assembly.

"(1) If an assembled crowd on public roads, streets or places is requested to disperse by the competent official or by the commander of an armed force, any member of such crowd, who, after the third request, fails to leave, shall be punished for unlawful assembly by deprivation of liberty for up to three months or with a fine.

"(2) If, in the unlawful assembly, with combined efforts, an act of resistance has been offered to, or violence committed upon, the officials or the armed force, the punishments imposed for riot shall apply as against those who participated in the commission of such acts."[47]

Sections 115 and 116 have been repealed by the Third Criminal Law Reform Law of May 20, 1970 (Bundesgesetzblatt I:505) which amended also Sections 113 and 114 of the Code.[48] Article 2 of this Law provided for a replacement of the repealed text concerning the offense of unlawfully assembling and failure to disperse following orders to do so. However, this was no longer considered a criminal offense, but an "infraction of regulations" (Ordnungswidrigkeit) [For a discussion of this term, see Answer to Question 8]. Article 2 has the following wording:

"Art. 2. Unlawful Gathering.

"(1) Anyone who joins a public gathering or who fails to leave it, although a bearer of sovereign authority has three times lawfully requested the crowd to disperse, shall be [considered] committing an infraction of regulations (ordnungswidrig handelt).

"(2) The perpetrator who negligently does not realize that the request [to disperse] is lawful shall also be [considered] committing an infraction of regulations.

"(3) The infraction of regulations may, in the case of paragraph 1, entail retribution by a fine of up to [one] thousand DMarks, in the case of paragraph 2—by a fine of up to five hundred DMarks."

On the other hand, along with a more lenient attitude towards less serious offenses disrupting public peace,[49] the Third Criminal Law Reform Law of May 20, has increased the penalties for rioting coupled with violence or threats of violence against persons or property, as well as for especially serious cases fraught with especially grave consequences (new Section 125a). These provisions read as follows:

"Sec. 125. Riot.

"(1) Any person who takes part as perpetrator or participant in 1. acts of violence against persons or property, or 2. threatening of persons with an act of violence, which are committed out of a crowd with combined efforts in a manner endangering public security or who influences the crowd in order to [46] Section 113 penalizes resistance against law enforcement officers or persons called to their assistance; against detachments of armed authorities, or local militia or defense squads, while in the exercise of their proper functions (deprivation of liberty from fourteen days up to two years, but in case of extenuating circumstances deprivation of liberty not to exceed one year or a fine. Section 114 contains provisions on the offense of use or threat of force against governmental functionaries—the punishment is: deprivation of liberty for from three months up to five years: in case of extenuating circumstances—deprivation of liberty not to exceed two years or a fine; in case of especially serious cases—deprivation of liberty for from one year up to ten years.

"In especially serious cases of Section 125, the punishment shall be deprivation of liberty for from six months up to ten years. An especially serious case shall, as a rule, exist, if the perpetrator

"2. carries another weapon, in order to make use of it while committing the offense,

"3. by an act of violence, puts another in danger of death or of a severe injury to body or health, or

"4. loots or causes significant damage to property not his own."

At the time the two following Sections (Secs. 126 and 127) also dealing with endangering of the public, have remained unchanged. They read as follows:

"Sec. 126. Disturbance of Public Peace by Threats.

"Any person who disturbs the public peace by threatening to commit a major crime involving a common danger, shall be punished by deprivation of liberty not to exceed one year.

"Sec. 127. [Unauthorized] Armed Groups.

"(1) Anybody, who without authority, raises or commands an armed group or who provides weapons or war materiel to members of a force which he knows to have been formed without authority shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for a term not to exceed two years.

"(2) Anybody who joins such armed group, shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for a term not to exceed one year."

QUESTION 16

The German Penal Code does not contain a Section similar to Section 1105 concerning Para-Military Activities. There are no quasi-military organizations in the Federal Republic of Germany at the present time.

QUESTION 17

1. Drugs

Possession for personal use of drugs is not penalized in the Federal Republic and the same is true with respect to purchase for personal use. Only illegal trafficking in drugs is a criminal offense.

Section 367 (1) No. 3 provides that "anyone who without permission of the police manufactures, offers for sale, sells or in any other way gives to other persons poison or drugs, insofar as they may not be freely sold," shall be punished by a fine of up to 500 DMarks or with deprivation of liberty not to exceed six weeks.

Commitment to an Institution for Withdrawal Treatment of a drug addict is ordered by the Court if the conditions specified in Section 64 of the 1973 Code are present (see Answer to Question 6).

2. Gambling
